First Church, Kansas City, Mo., is anchoring itself to its downtown site by the construction of a 3-story addition to the west that will house the Sunday school and institutional activities. This new building, which will be completed June 1, will be capped with a roof garden that will seat six hundred persons. Meanwhile the old building is to be remodeled and redressed and new art glass windows, a new organ and a modern heating plant installed. W. F. Richardson is pastor of this church, which is declining to follow the lead of many other former downtown churches in moving "out." The First Christian Church is the "mother" church of that denomination in Kansas City and is planning to take on new responsibilities as a downtown church. In addition to its new plant to the west, the present basement, which has been used by the Sunday school, is to be remodeled into a modern social center, with reception and reading rooms.

Women Make Social Survey.

The social service committee of the Women's Missionary Society of the Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., concluded one of the most unique religious and social service surveys ever undertaken in Des Moines. The committee members divided themselves into groups to call upon every woman in one section of Des Moines. Incidentally while making these social calls the church women made a survey of the religious needs of the community. They took a church census and compiled the data which they will use to determine what proportion of the families were not reached by the churches and what methods should be employed to adapt church life to their religious needs. According to the statistics compiled from the reports of the church women, who visited more than 300 families, two women of the committee having been made responsible for the families living within two blocks, there are fifty families in that section of the city which have no church interest. There are fifty-two families which belong to the Catholic church and a scattering number to the Protestant churches. The proportion of church affiliations is: Presbyterian 13, Lutheran 18, Methodist 8, Church of Christ 94. In this community there were fifty Russian families. As an outgrowth of the survey campaign the missionary society will have a permanent pastoral committee to look after the religious needs of these people and to continue the friendly relations with the women of the community. During their friendly visits the church found twenty-five families in need of food and clothing and these needs were supplied to them.

A. McLean Visits Yale.

A. McLean visited New Haven, Conn., Monday, March 2, and delivered two fine lectures before the students of the Department of Missions of the Yale Divinity School, writes J. C. Archer, President of the Campbell Club, at Yale. He dealt with the origin and development of the missionary enterprises of the Disciples, and gave a sketch of the present status of Disciples missions. His visit to New Haven, Mr. Archer believes, is a little further recognition of the work the Disciples are doing in the world. The Campbell Club of Yale gathered for supper, on the evening of March 2 in honor of Mr. McLean. Prof. and Mrs. Harlan P. Beach were also guests of the Club that evening. Thirty-one, all told, sat down to supper, after which Mr. McLean gave his paper on "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher," a striking and inspirational paper. Two-thirds of Yale's Disciples men were out, and most of the ladies. Mr. Archer writes further: "Our secretary was to have sent a notice of Doctor Ames' visit to us on January 19. If he did so, there was no account in the paper. The Club assembled in his honor. Dean C. R. Brown of the Divinity School was our other guest then. Dr. Ames gave a powerful address, a sober, honest message concerning some things vital to Disciples. We have a fine group of men here again this year. Yale is wonderfully free in the extension of her privileges to us. And Disciples are never without honor here. Mr. C. E. Reidenbach, Butler 1912, now of the Middle Class of Yale Divinity School, is captain of this year's University Debating Team that meets Harvard here on the question of Woman's Suffrage."

C. W. Dean Addresses "Fathers and Sons."

Charles William Dean, Sunday-school Field Worker for the churches in Colorado, was the chief speaker at the banquet of the Father and Sons Movement held in the spacious gymnasium of the Y. M. C. A. building at Grand Junction, Colo. The daily papers reported the speech at length, and a fine impression was made on the men of the city. Some of the gems from the speech as reported in the Daily Sentinel were: "It is a big responsibility to be a father, the head of the finest thing that God ever gave to man, the home." "Fathers, your son, to become the man that you wish him to be, must have three things—self-knowledge, self-reverence and self-control." "Your son's life is as yet wholly in the asset column, a large share of yours is gone to the liabilities column." "Instead of its being 'the hand that rocks the cradle' that rules the world, the seat of power is with the hand that holds the hand that rocks the cradle."

R. W. Gentry Suffers Losses.

Richard W. Gentry and his good wife, of the Winfield, Kans., Church have suffered a series of disasters rarely surpassed. In December Mrs. Gentry's father died after a long and painful illness. While at home in Lexington, Mo., for the funeral, the little daughter was taken dangerously ill with pneumonia. Finally the aged grandfather, Judge Joe Chinn, became ill and passed away, the series of troubles necessitating four trips to Missouri on the part of Mr. Gentry. These absences have forced him to neglect his correspondence and other duties, but he writes that he is now back at his work and will attend to these matters soon

Pastor Wins Young People.

E. C. Harris, pastor of the church at Bedford, Ohio, has hit upon a plan to get hold of the young people for the preaching service. He is devoting eight weeks to special Sunday evening services. The young people have entire charge of the music, under a competent director. The sermons are adapted to them. "Obedience," "Being a Christian," "The Development of the Will," "Work," "The Duties of Parents to Their Children," "Honesty," "Temptation," are some of the subjects discussed. The audiences have been greatly increased, writes Mr. Harris. Many of the parents attend these services who have not been in the habit of going to church. The church has been strengthened. The pastor has entered upon his fifth year here.

The Truth About Our Statistics

BY SECRETARY GRANT K. LEWIS.

Someone has said "there are black lies, white lies and statistics." This is the way many feel regarding the annual statistics recently published by Dr. H. K. Carroll which represent the Disciples as having actually lost in ministers and churches and as ranking only sixth in rate of gain, whereas usually they lead the various bodies.

It is true that Doctor Carroll secured his data from the American Christian Missionary Society, the recognized statistican for the Disciples. Unfortunately for the good reputation of the Disciples, this office furnished figures before our returns had been carefully canvassed and corroborated, and besides, for comparison, Doctor Carroll used the data gathered in the year 1910-11 before our present organization and system of gathering statistics had been perfected. Doctor Carroll gathers his data annually early in December and in time to publish it the first of January. At that time our annual tabulation of statistics is in progress and our returns are more or less incomplete.

Moreover, our revised returns last year substituted accurate data in numerous instances for liberal estimates heretofore published. In some cases these liberal estimates were highly inflated and had been used for years without changes. These liberal estimates of former years were used by Doctor Carroll as the basis of comparison with the more revised data for this year and consequently our growth during the year 1913 is in no wise registered. We are sorry for this not only on our account, but also on account of its effect on the reputation of the annual statistics published by Doctor Carroll, which usually are as accurate as such things can be made.

We herewith present a table of comparative statistics based upon the latest and most accurate returns for both years involved—1912 and 1913.

No Longer "Melts"

PRESENTING SOME POINTS ABOUT IMMIGRATION.

A new problem in immigration is to be faced in the fact that our "melting-pot" no longer melts. A late study of immigration statistics shows that in the last twenty years ten million immigrants have sought our shores, but not our language or our way of living, and are no longer fused into the resident citizenship. They are not even educated in our common schools, and they do not marry into American families. They constitute distinct colonies, are ruled by European customs, and voted by bosses of their own various nationalities for personal profit. The educated and refined classes of northern Europe no longer seek our land in any great numbers, but the ignorant, superstitious and poor of southern Europe, who settle by themselves in wards or districts controlled by their own padrones, each constitute an "imperium in imperio" and refuse everything American, except American wages and American franchise.

Within fifteen minutes' ride from the writer's residence there is a community of three hundred thousand Jews; in the opposite direction, same distance, a settlement of sixty thousand Scandinavians. There are one hundred and sixty thousand Russians in Brooklyn alone, and four hundred and eighty-four thousand in Greater New York.

The last ten years brought to New York City more foreigners than all the other seventeen cities combined, of the eighteen cities of the United States of over two hundred and fifty thousand population.

The foreigner out-numbers the native more than two to one in New York City. In the midst of such conditions, in this, the largest city of the world, we report the mission work of the Disciples of Christ. This year the Mission Committee has devised a new plan of work. While the missions are under the general oversight of the Disciples' Missionary Union, through its Mission Committee, the stronger churches have been assigned mission points for them to be the "Big Brother." This has aroused interest and more definite work and responsibility.

The month of February shows the following mission results: Days of service, 140; accessions, 6; enrollment in Bible school, 853; average attendance in Bible school, 573; pastoral visits, 241; average attendance at church service, 288; total moneys raised by the mission points, $311.02.

For all information regarding New York churches and missions, please address the writer,

M. M. Amunson,
Chairman of Mission Committee,
388 St. John's Place,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

PERSONAL AND OTHERWISE

While E. N. Duty, the pastor at Charleroi, Pa., was away holding an exchange meeting at First Church, Beaver Falls, Pa., which resulted in 20 accessions and two young men to enter the ministry, Mr. LaRue, a former Charleroi boy, studying for the ministry at Bethany College, filled the pulpit, on Feb. 15, at which time a sum of $46 was raised to aid him and his family, as he continues his studies. J. Walter Ailes, sent from this church last September, is now at Bethany studying for the ministry. During the last three Lord's days 5 have been added by confession and baptism, 4 young men and one middle aged man. The contract has been let by this church for a $2,000 pipe-organ, which will be installed by Children's day.

W. M. Haushalter, pastor of Park Avenue Church, East Orange, N. J., began two series of sermons, March 1. In the mornings, "The Unfolding of the Messiahship of Jesus." I. The First Flush of the Dawn of the Kingdom. II. The Heat of the Noonday Sun. III. The Lengthening Shadows. IV. The Evening of Faith. V. The Night of Rejection. VI. The Day of the Lord. In the evenings, "The Foundations of Twentieth Century Christianity." I. The Founding of the Church. II. The Conflict of the First Century. III. The Conflict of the Second Century. IV The Issue into Roman Catholicism. V. The Advent of Protestantism, VI. The Outcome of Protestantism.

G. I. Hoover, State Evangelist of Eastern Indiana District, spent three weeks and four days with the East Union Church, Hamilton Co., Ind., during February. The church there had ceased to meet. The congregation was received in vigorous fellowship, a Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor Society organized, the church board of officers enlarged and organized, the records of the church and the roll of the church membership, and eighteen persons were added to the fellowship—17 upon confession of faith and baptism and 1 otherwise.

A. B. Houze, pastor at Lima, O., speaks favorably of the work of J. J. Tisdall in the recent Lima meeting. Large audiences are reported although the most severe snow storms of many years visited that section of the state during the revival period. Some results of the meeting were, 63 persons added to the church membership, of these 41 making confession of faith. In addition to this, Mr. Houze writes, all were lifted to a higher plane of living by the work of Mr. Tisdall.

Frank L. Bowen declined to consider the pastorate of the Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City, on the ground that the church needed a man at once, and he has an unfinished task in City Mission work, which will require a greater time than the church will be justified in waiting. The Church Board voted to wait on the condition that Mr. Bowen could come to the church September first next. In the meantime, L. S. Cupp will serve as supply.

On Wednesday, March 11, at the M. E. Church, Sabina, O., a union meeting between the Methodist Episcopal and Christian Churches, of Sabina, O., was undertaken, conducted by Evangelist Herbert Yeuell. During this meeting all the regular services of the respective churches, except the Sunday-schools, are being merged.

The Wilkinsburg church, Pittsburg, has just closed a two weeks meeting in which Charles Darsie of Cleveland did the preaching. There were sixty-seven additions with those who came just before and after. The work at Wilkinsburg, Scott Cook, the pastor, writes is now in the best condition for years. Nearly one hundred have united with the church since last fall.

Chicago ministers have an opportunity to hear two inspiring addresses at the Y. M. C. A., 19 S. LaSalle street, March 23 and 30. On the 23rd Cleland B. McAfee, of McCormick Theological Seminary will speak on "The Satisfying Christ," and on the 30th Chas. F. Wishart, new pastor of Second Presbyterian Church will give an address on "The Triumphant Christ."

The Spokane Missionary Club, representing the Christian churches of Spokane, had its last meeting at one of that city's cafes. Spokane University was the topic discussed. R. A. Moon, of Dean Avenue Church, presided and the speakers were I. N. McCash, president of the university, and Attorney Brown, a member of Central Church.

John F. Smith is doing a creditable work at Plattsburg, Mo. He has a large men's class. The budget for 1914 will reach $3,200, almost double one two years ago when Mr. Smith began. They will probably become a living link this year. J. Breckenridge Ellis, an author of growing popularity, is a member of this congregation.

The Divorce Proctor of Kansas City, W. W. Wright, is calling for help. Despite the fact that divorce has decreased 40 per cent under the proctorship of Mr. Wright, much yet could be done. Mr. Wright is a member of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church in Kansas City, and an active worker therein.

There were 196 contributing churches to the Ministerial Relief Fund in Missouri during 1913. Of these 89 were churches in the Fifth District, comprising 23 counties in northwest Missouri. This district has had the budget plan in operation these many years, and it works, as evidenced by this report.

During March, Baxter Waters, of Lathrop, Mo., has been taking up review of books for Sunday evening. The following books are being considered: "The Inside of the Cup," a plea for real religion; "Jonah," a plea for breadth; "John Barleycorn," a plea for soberness; "The Book of Daniel"; "V. V.'s Eyes."

On March 1st the Laymen of the Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City had entire charge of the evening service while the pastor, George H. Combs took a back seat in the audience. Ten laymen made three minute speeches, and R. A. Long closed the service by extending the gospel invitation.

J. F. Shreve has resigned at Ottawa, Kans., to accept a call to Independence, Kans., a large and influential church. He has done a splendid work at Ottawa. The church has grown and prospered. Baxter Waters, of Lathrop, Mo., has been asked to consider a call from Ottawa but declines.

The Disciples Congress meets at Lexington April 28 to 30 There will be two addresses by Dr. Shailer Matthews, President of the Federal Council. Other addresses by Walter S. Goode, Judge F. A. Henry, B. A. Abbott, A. E. Cory, L. J. Marshall, and E. M. Todd.

Walter M. White of First Church, Cedar Rapids, has been given an assistant, Abbott Book. He will be known as the director of religious education and will have charge of the Sunday school and of young people's and boys' work.

Plans are rapidly maturing for taking care of the Ohio State Sunday-school convention, in Youngstown, to be held June 16-18. A committee of two hundred, who will manage the affair, has had its first meeting with a banquet.

In the "Go to Church" Campaign in the State of Iowa, the Governor, George W. Clark, issued a letter setting forth his reasons why every person in Iowa should go to church.

R. H. Miller, of Buffalo, New York, has accepted a place on the Bible Study Commission of the Brotherhood Movement along with Robt. Hopkins and other Bible Study Specialists, and a report will be made at Atlanta.

The Kansas City and vicinity Ministers will meet the last Monday in March. A paper will be read by E. E. Elliott, National Secretary of the Brotherhood Movement on the subject, "The Problem of Lay Leadership."

Easter for National Benevolent Association

Means Easter for Christ's Helpless Little Ones.

Baby Frances (motherless and deserted she was rescued by the N. B. A.)

The National Benevolent Association has for more than twenty years been the chosen medium through which increasing hundreds (and now thousands) of our Bible schools have ministered to the widow and the orphan in the name of the compassion to Christ.

These Easter offerings have made possible this great national enterprise with its twelve Homes in ten states and with its record of many thousands served. More than four thousand children have been placed in Christian Homes by the N. B. A.

The Easter offering is the main dependence of all the Association's wards for daily necessities. Without it, the Association could not possibly support them. Every Bible school among us should send an offering this Easter to the N. B. A.

The most excellent Easter exercise we have ever issued ("Loving in Deed and in Truth") is just off the presses. Order at once. It is free to schools that will send an offering.

Baby Alice (with her mother she found shelter in one of the N. B. A.'s Homes.)

A CHALLENGE FROM OUTSIDE.

Among the several ministers that are afflicted with tuberculosis whom the Board of Ministerial Relief has been assisting one has just been examined by the Anti-Tuberculosis League of one of our large cities. They find his condition such that in six or eight months of thorough treatment he should be able to take up his work again.

They undertake to supply this treatment free of charge if the brotherhood in the meanwhile will supply subsistence for him and his family. This, they and he estimate will amount to $40 per month, which is $10 more than our present maximum pension.

The situation is rendered still more important by the fact that this brother is a graduate of one of our leading colleges and has proved his ability and consecration in twelve years of faithful service as a minister. Furthermore, he has a devoted wife and four of the brightest and most promising children the officers of this Board have ever seen.

We are so sure that both the good sense and the Christianity of our brethren will endorse our action that we have notified the Anti-Tuberculosis League to take charge of the case.

Of course the only votes that count is endorsement of this action and of the board's loyal care of 105 other equally worthy households is a cash remittance. And we cannot believe that any individual, church or Bible school that knows the fact will withhold such endorsement.

INTERNATIONAL UNIFORM LESSON FOR APRIL 5.

Luke 14:1-6. Memory Verses, 13, 14.

Golden Text.—Every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.—Luke 14:11.

American Standard Bible.
Copyright, 1901, by Thomas Nelson & Sons.
(Used by permission.)

(7) And he spake a parable unto those that were bidden, when he marked how they chose out the chief seats, saying unto them, (8) When thou art bidden of any man to a marriage feast, sit not down in the chief seat; lest haply a more honorable man than thou be bidden of him, (9) and he that bade thee and him shall come and say to thee, Give this man place; and then thou shalt begin with shame to take the lowest place. (10) But when thou art bidden, go and sit down in the lowest place; that when he that hath bidden thee cometh, he may say to thee, Friend, go up higher: then shalt thou have glory in the presence of all that sit at meat with thee. (11) For every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled; (12) And he said to him also that had bidden him, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, nor thy kinsmen, nor rich neighbors; lest haply they also bid thee again, and a recompense be made thee. (13) But when thou makest a feast, bid the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind: (14), and thou shalt be blessed; because they have not wherewith to recompense thee; for thou shalt be recompensed in the resurrection of the just.

(15) And when one of them that sat at meat with him heard these things, he said unto him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God. (16 But he said unto him, A certain man made a great supper; and he bade many: (17) and he sent forth his servant at supper time to say to them that were bidden, Come; for all things are now ready. (18) And they all with one consent began to make excuse. The first said unto him, I have bought a field, and I must needs go out and see it; I pray thee have me excused. (19) And another said, I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to prove them; I pray thee have me excused. (20) And another said, I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come. (21) And the servant came, and told his Lord these things. Then the master of the house being angry said to his servant, Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor and maimed and blind and lame. (22 And the servant said, Lord, what thou didst command is done, and yet there is room. (23) And the lord said unto the servant, Go out into the highways and hedges, and constrain them to come in, that my house may be filled. (24) For I say unto you, that none of those men that were bidden shall taste of my supper.

Verse By Verse.

By C. C. BUCKNER.

v. 7. They chose out the chief seats: Certain places at the eating tables were regarded as places of honor.

v. 8. Sit not: The posture at the table was really not a sitting position but a reclining position. Sit not down in the chief seats: We should not protrude ourselves into the places rightfully belonging to others. This preachment is very timely in these days of emphasis on self-assertion and exaggeration of liberty.

v. 9. Shall come and say to thee, etc.: We cannot display immodesty with impunity.

v. 10. He may say to thee, etc.: Modesty has its rewards.

v. 12. Lest haply they also bid thee again: "Half the social life of today is mere commercialism: so much for so much."

v. 15. Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God: He referred to the millenial feast to which the Jews looked forward.

v. 16. But he said unto him, etc.: Jesus takes advantage of the man's reference to the feast. He says there is a feast; and that feast is represented by the Gospel.

v. 18. Began to make excuse: Very few, of those invited, accepted Christ's invitation to accept of the rich things on his table. Many, indeed, were seeking to destroy the kingdom which Jesus was seeking to establish.

v. 21. Into the streets and lanes: He extends the invitation to the Jews in the lowest social positions.

v. 23. Go out into the highways and hedges: Not only the lowest class of the Jews are invited, but the gospel extends a welcome to the Gentiles.

At the Heart of the Lesson.

By A. Z. CONRAD.

GREAT OCCASIONS.

We talk much about great occasions. What are they? Pulpit and platform appeal to ambition. Large aggregations of people with much applause furnish what we call "striking opportunities." The vast, the spectacular, the demonstrative we conceive of as vitally important. We do not understand the value of the sunshine until we see its effects in smoke and flame behind the burning glass. Electric energy about us does not impress us, but awe and admiration are awakened when it thunders or flashes in zigzag fires across the sky. We think of convention halls with public celebrations as furnishing the great opportunities for immortalizing thought. Which was the greater occasion for Moses, the dazzling splendours of Pharaoh's court or the rugged and lonely path at the back side of the desert where he met God in the burning bush? Elijah calling fire from heaven in the presence of the priests of Baal was no greater than the same Elijah in conversational discourse at the gate of the vineyard of Naboth rebuking Ahab. Lincoln's life radiated more light from his every day conversation than it did either as President or occasional orator. "We have met the enemy and they are ours," outranks and outclasses the brilliant battle charge of the general who uttered the words. "We will fight it out on this line if it takes all summer," seemed to the author of the words a commonplace phrase, but it lives. With Jesus all occasions were important. Dining with the Pharisees furnished him an opportunity greater than the temple service or the synagogue exposition. Seaside parables and mountain metaphors live because he made every act of his life sublime. The table talk of Jesus is a protest against belittling life's ordinary activities. It is also an appeal to appraise the ordinary activities of life at their true value.

AMBITION FOR EMINENCE

v. 7. "He marked how they chose out the chief seat." Nothing escaped the attention of our Lord. He let no occasion pass which would afford an opportunity to impress a great lesson. He was not a moralizer interjecting trite and commonplace sayings in an effort to rebuke men. Great and burning spiritual truths were always at the gateway of the lips of Jesus and when circumstances swung the gate, inspired utterances poured forth as naturally as water gushes from the fountain. The unseemly scramble for first place was utterly obnoxious to the sensitive nature of our Lord. So utterly shameless had the guests been that even in his presence they dared to vie with each other for a position nearest the host. Theophrastus, the Greek writer, makes special mention of this disposition among his own countrymen. Human nature is much the same everywhere. One of the first principles of Christianity is learn is that self-promotion invariably fails of its accomplishment. Unregenerate human nature is naturally selfish. The scramble for first place in public conveyances, at the doors of assembly halls; the desire for official recognition ignores every law of courtesy and divests many an occasion of all dignity. One of the first principles of Christianity is courtesy. In his comment upon Jesus Christ, Julius Thayer said and said correctly, "A Christian is God Almighty's gentleman."

SINCERE HUMILITY.

There is a perfectly legitimate self esteem which is essential to anything like progressive achievement. There is a false humility which so conspicuously seems to efface itself that the evident intent is promotion by an indirect route. Public protestation against honor conferred and a profession of disability, is too often merely a mask concealing egotism. "Sit not down in the highest room lest more honorable men than thou be bidden of him," v. 8. It is a mark both of good breeding and good judgment when accepting hospitality to permit the host to make his own distinctions and determinations as to rank and place. The principle has wide application. Place pride almost invariably suffers rebuke. True humility without in the slightest degree disparaging conscious worth appraises that ability and that worth not for what it may gain in outward recognition but for what it is in itself.

OUTRANKED.

"And he that bade thee and him come and say to thee, 'Give this man place,' and thou begin with shame to take the lowest room." One's estimate of himself is very likely to be discounted. Whether it be just or not the fact remains and results are painful. We deem it a great disgrace to be lowered in rank. This often happens unjustly but the mortification of it would be entirely avoided if one did not allow pride and egotism together with selfish desire to lead him to ignore proprieties in his clamor for high position. The true attitude is an attitude of earnest purpose to deserve and merit honorable place.

THE ROYAL INVITATION.

v. 16-17. "A certain man made a great supper and bade many. His invitation was indicative of the heartiness of his hospitality. "Come, for all things are now ready." The attractiveness of the Kingdom of Christ is set forth in the type of a feast. The munificence of the feast is also indicated. Every provision had been made for the fullest satisfaction of the guests who were invited. Precisely this is what occurred through the sacrifice of Christ and the preparation for kingdom blessing. In another parable it is indicated that not only was the bounty of the feast complete, but even the garments of those who attended were provided by the host. The invitation was positive, unconditional, genuine.

IRRATIONAL REJECTION.

"They all with one accord began to make excuse." Nothing is more utterly inexplicable than the attitude of the world toward the invitation of Jesus. A sumptuous feast is supposed to be one of the strongest appeals that can be presented. It clearly indicates the importunity of evil and especially the intensity of selfish desire is such that even an invitation could be rejected. The excuses were trivial and trumped up excuses. One has "purchased land," "I must needs give attention to this." Here we find the appeal of wealth. The tremendous grip which the accumulating of wealth has upon an individual is sufficiently strong to blind him to all the higher opportunities and privileges of life. The third had mbarried a wife and therenot come. The absurdity of the excuse appears on the face of it because of course he would not have purchased until he had already tried them. It is a type of the excuse which is presented by busy people who are too busy to attend to the chief business of life. The third had married a wife and therefore could not come. He stands as a type of the pleasure passion which drowns out all the music of heaven and while pampering the physical, starves the soul. In every excuse there was deception. In all, the disposition to accept was what was wanting.

THE UNEXPECTED REJECTION.

Those too busy to attend to the business of life find at last life itself withered away and when they had expected to enter the door to the feast it is too late. "None of those men that were bidden shall taste of my supper." This is one of the saddest words uttered by our Lord. Occupied and preoccupied, busy with a thousand cares of life, yet a failure. Making the kingdom last is extremely dangerous. Henry Drummond says, "It is monstrous, shameful and cowardly to ignore the kingdom of God until the energies of life have all been expended." The chief business of the disciple of Jesus today is to fulfil the expectations of the Master of the feast and go out into the streets and lanes of the city and bring in those who will come. How true the picture is to the Christian church. The chief seats are nobly filled when their occupants have been selected by the spirit of Christ but ignomiously filled if occupied by those who have sought self-promotion. How inadequate are the reasons presented by nearly all who decline to stand as public witnesses of the Lord Jesus Christ. And yet how importuning and how precious is the invitation. There are none who are despised, none so debased that the Master of the feast does not stand anxious and eager to welcome those who will come. No word in the parable is more precious than the word of assurance that there is room for all who humbly respond to the Master's call. "And yet there is room."

The Mid-Week Service

TOPIC FOR APRIL 4.

Worthy of the Gospel. Phil. 1:27; Rom. 8:9-17.

The members of the church at Philippi doubtless had some appreciation of the dignity and responsibility of Roman citizenship. Paul was a Roman citizen and was proud of it. But there was a greater institution of which he was a part and which required a higher type of life of its members than Rome ever required. He was a citizen of the heavenly kingdom. To be worthy of this distinction was his ambition. He was making a strong appeal to the Philippians when he besought them to exercise their citizenship in a befitting manner.

STEADFASTNESS.

The motives which the gospel offers to men are such that they ought to be in command of human conduct under all circumstances. Conditions vary. The forms in which the Christian faith is expressed change with time and place. But the obligation of love never comes to an end. We can never treat men as if they were not human beings and entitled to all the rights and privileges of human beings. Any theory that permits us to use them as we use things is anti-Christian and any custom that shuts out one human being from participation in the life of love is one that Chri tians are bound to change. The exhortation to steadfastness is much needed. We are Christians in spots. The consistent application of the law of love to all parts of life calls for heroic conduct. The fanatic disregards conditions and endeavors to set the world right in a day. The steadfast disciple changes habits, customs, and institutions as fast as he can. He can wait, but he never loses sight of his aim.

UNITY.

The unity of the gospel is that of spirit and aim. Paul denied the right of the Jewish Christians to impose upon their gentile brethren the rites of Judaism. He was willing that the Jews should follow many of the traditions of their fathers. It is unworthy of the gospel of Christ that I should refuse to recognize the Christian character of a man on the ground that he does not conform to practices that are dear to me. I may try to show him that my way is better than his; if his life shows the fruits of the gospel in abundance, I am under obligation to take these fruits as evidence of his faith. We do well to be on our guard against false teaching. The church must be able to detect the spurious from the genuine. Error should be shown to be error. But we must not stop when we have exposed error; we must rejoice in the truth wherever it is found.

KEEPING IN DEBT.

When a man joins the church and immediately pays his debts, his acquaintances are usually convinced that he has really become a Christian. The world has the belief that a Christian will pay his debts. There are some churches that will not allow a man to have his name put on their roll until he has met all his financial obligations. An unpaid bill is seen as a reproach to the man and to the church of which he is a member. But just when the thrifty disciple is congratulating himself on the freedom he has attained, he reads that he has a perpetual obligation which he assumed when he became a disciple. This obligation is involved in life itself. The debt of love cannot be cancelled by money or service. The person who never did us a kind turn, who may have deliberately injured us, needs us. We are under obligation to show him how a disciple meets insult and injury. The stranger whom we pass has a claim upon us, not the claim he may think he has, it may be, but we owe him the debt of love. We must be intelligent to know what it is.

Rom. 13:7-10; Eph. 4:1-3; Col. 1:9-12; 1 Thess. 1:13; 5:14-22; Rom. 6:11-12; Matt. 22:21; Jas. 2:8-9.

The Educational Influence of the Bethany System of Sunday School Literature

WHEREVER the Bethany System is installed the Sunday School takes on a new ideal for itself. It gives up trying to inflate its attendance with contests, "fits and starts," and various superficial "boosting" campaigns, and settles down to the quieter and steadier and, after all, the more attractive, and certainly the most rewarding task of teaching religion to boys and girls and men and women.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—several leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

HOW ?

A Department of Counsel on Sunday School Work

Conducted by

R. P. SHEPHERD, Ph. D.

"We are beginning a contest between our young men's and young women's classes. Please give us your best counsel as to how to make this contest most productive of best results."—Illinois.

Do you really want the best counsel of those who have had large experience with such contests? The practically unanimous opinion of those whose vision is efficiency before bulk is that contests between classes within a school rarely produce permanent good. that some hurt is almost sure to be done to some whom the contestants thought to help, that losers can never feel the same as before toward winners, that there is more danger of damage than of wholesome uplift.

If you like you may go a step farther and say that schools or churches fed on the artificial heat of periodic contests are almost sure to suffer a reaction, to feel that the ordinary routine of work is dull and lifeless, and that the Lord's work is identified with spurts of effort to excel someone else. It simply paralyzes people for a long, strong, steady pull for cultural efficiency.

About a year ago the writer was sharply criticised in a local church paper for his attitude toward Sunday-school contests. Where schools can be enlisted to compete for points of excellence, with no stakes up in the way of banquets or other prizes, and where the points are so fixed as to cover efficient work rather than mere numbers and collection, the results may be of permanent help to both schools. But contests framed up only on how many and how much are a perversion of the whole aim and purpose of the Sunday-school enterprise.

In your particular case, if you want our best counsel, Don't.

This is one of the features your school is missing

The Power of Casual Association

It is well that we know precisely how Paul came to form the acquaintance of Priscilla and Aquilla. The record is as specific and definite as we could possibly wish. "And because he was of the same craft, he abode with them, and they wrought; for by their trade they were tent-makers." They were of the same craft. That fact had a determining weight with Paul in that situation and became the occasion of one of the finest friendships in all the early history of the Gospel. Because they were of the same craft they became acquainted and found lodgings together and talked at the fireside, and Priscilla and Aquilla dedicated their home to Christian service and Christian hospitality. It gave the work a stability it never had had anywhere else. Up to this time Paul had been an itinerant missionary, preaching only a few days or weeks in any one place. For the first time in all his career as an evangelist he had a home. For the first time in any city he settled down to the task of establishing Christianity upon a sure basis, rented a permanent preaching place, established a place of worship separate from the Jewish synagogue, faced the fury of the mob but was not driven out of town by it, and made Corinth, the wickedest city in Greece, one of the finest and strongest centers of Christian activity. And all this came about in no small measure through the fact that Paul worked at the same trade with Priscilla and Aquilla.

At the end of eighteen months Paul went to Ephesus and Priscilla and her husband went with him. He still boarded at their home. They remained in that city while he journeyed to Jerusalem. There they formed the acquaintance of Apollos, the eloquent young preacher, and instructed him more perfectly in the way of the Lord. Later they went to their former home in Rome and Paul's letter to the Romans sends a greeting to them and the church in their house. So far as we know, the Church of Rome was first established in the home of Priscilla and Aquilla, and the Church of Rome grew until it became the greatest in the world. That great church might trace its lineage back to that Christian home where a husband and wife faithfully worshiping God opened their doors in a spirit of fine hospitality and learned and taught and labored as God gave them grace. Afterward they were in Ephesus again, still toiling, still strengthening the church, still giving their lives in loving, devoted service. All this came about in the beginning, we must remember, through the fact that Paul and his friends worked at the same trade and discussed theology as they drew their needles through the heavy goat's hair cloth in which the nomadic peoples of the East were wont to make their homes.

Very potent for good or evil are a man's business associates. A man ought to consider a business partnership not only on its financial but on its spiritual sides. A Christian man should make his business associations the occasion of spiritual opportunities. We do not mean that a Christian ought forever to be peddling tracts about the office where he works, nor everlastingly preaching to those with whom he is in daily association. We do mean that a consistent Christian can sometimes do more good by his faithful practice and an occasional wise word of counsel than very many sermons can produce.

But not only in business life but in club life and social life, where men meet other men and women meet other women, there is a fine opportunity to remember the good that may be done or hindered by consistent faithfulness.

Once in a long time we see a man with a zeal that is not according to knowledge, readily approaching strangers and asking them if they are Christians, warning them to prepare to meet their God and making their religion an occasion of discourtesy. Such people do harm, as we very well know. But where one man makes a mistake in this way, ten make a mistake the other way. A good man has been known to sit in the same office with another man for twenty years and never by any direct word indicate to him his own interest in the supremely important things in life. Can you imagine Paul and Aquilla working twenty years in the same office and never saying anything to each other about their religion? Can you imagine Jesus Christ working in a carpenter shop with two benches and never letting the other carpenter know whether he loved God or not?

We ought to make a more constant and more intelligent use of the opportunities for good which come to us incidentally in life. The trade union, the club, the social gathering are not indeed to be turned into revival meetings, but ought to be made occasions for the progress of righteousness. A few such homes as that of Priscilla and Aquilla, a few such associations in business and in social life as those of Paul with these two faithful saints would marvelously affect the world for good.

The Paris of the East

Walks About the Interesting City of Shanghai.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

AMONG all the cities of China, Shanghai possesses elements of easy superiority. Of course it has not the political importance of Pekin, nor the manufacturing prestige of Hangkow, nor the historical interest of Nanking, nor the picturesque attractiveness of Hongkong or Fuchow. But it is the queen city of middle China, the mistress of the Yanktse-kiang, the commercial emporium of the far Orient, and the gayest of the centers of the distant East.

It is not as yet the port that it is destined to be, for it is twelve miles from Wusung at the mouth of the river, and the heavier ships have to wait and anchor there. There they receive and discharge their cargoes and passengers by means of tenders that ply between them and the Bund. Shanghai is built on sandy soil like Chicago, and in the same manner it must put down its concrete foundations deep into the earth for the erection of its taller modern buildings. Here the western office structure and the European residences are rapidly displacing the delightful native architecture, with its outer galleries, its curving, richly tiled roofs, its colored panels, and the enameled bricks of temples and pagodas. In fact Shanghai is almost an occidental city.

THE CORMORANT FISHERS.

We came down by rail from Soo-chow. Just as we were leaving the latter place, passing along by one of the branches of the great canal, we saw the cormorant fishers plying their interesting traffic. These workmen are among the curiosities of China. Each fisherman goes to his work in a boat on whose sides there perch ten or a dozen cormorants. These large birds are trained to dive and catch the fish, but are prevented from swallowing them by a closely fitting iron ring at the base of their long necks. When the bird has seized the fish he is recalled by his master, who compels him to disgorge his prey. Only the smallest of the fish ever get past the ring during working hours. A fisherman provided with a number of these birds can easily make a very profitable business in good fishing weather.

We reached Shanghai in a pouring rain, and drove to the hotel through streets that were slippery and cleanly washed by the downpour. At the Palace Hotel we found some of the members of our party who had preceded us from Nanking. One of the ladies was ill, and unable to be about for several days. We found the hotel exceedingly comfortable and homelike, and most of the points of interest, especially in the business section, were within easy walking distance.

One of our first callers was James Ware, the veteran missionary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, who a short time after our visit was compelled to come to America for a serious operation, and who returned home to die a little later. It was Saturday afternoon and he placed himself at our disposal for any service he could render during our stay in Shanghai, and outlined a rather strenuous program of visitation and speaking for the following day. We found him a most genial and informing companion. His long residence in the city had made him familiar with every phase of its life. Moreover for many years he had been a responsible official of our foreign missionary work, and possessed an intimate knowledge of almost every phase of missionary activity in China.

AT A CHINESE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

On Sunday morning he came for us at an early hour and took us over to the Christian Institute and Chapel where the Sunday-school services were in progress. We passed through a number of streets, and tarried for a few moments in the midst of a fascinating market, where every sort of commodity was offered for sale, while crowds of people gathered about the various stalls. When we entered the Sunday-school the children were singing their familiar Chinese hymn, which we heard many times on our journey through the land; "Jesu ai o, Wau puh tso," "Jesus loves me, this I know." There were many small classes, and the interest seemed excellent. Then followed the regular morning service. Mr. Ware played the organ and led the singing. The chapel was comfortably filled with men and women. Mr. Ware acted as interpreter of the address, and followed it with an earnest exhortation. The Chapel and Institute are admirably located for mission work, but the structure is poor and needs replacing with a modern equipment.

AT THE INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE.

That afternoon we visited the St. John's College of the Episcopal Church. This is one of the most important educational institutions in China. Dr. Potts, the president, is a man of great influence among the Christian leaders of the nation. The grounds of St. John's College are as beautiful as anything to be found in Europe or America. Professor Ely, one of the instructors and a personal friend, showed us about the place. In one of the numerous buildings of the institution a Sunday-school was just closing its exercises, and presently the children came pouring out to scatter in all directions. After visiting the museum, large College Hall, the women's school, finely equipped and separated by only a short distance from the college grounds, we came back to the chapel, where an interesting student service was held. It would have been pleasant to remain for a much longer time at this important missionary institution, whose graduates number hundreds in southern and middle China.

On the long drive back to the hotel we stopped for a visit of an hour or more at the International Institute, which is a sort of clearing house for religious thought and study of many different sorts. Dr. Gilbert Reid, the organizing spirit of the institution, is a tall, gaunt, impressive figure who reminds you constantly of Robert Louis Stevenson. He was formerly a Baptist missionary, but conceived the idea of founding an institution not only on interdenominational but inter-religious lines, which should open its platform freely to representatives of all the different faiths in the hope that this free interchange of views might lead to closer sympathies and prepare the way for mutual understanding and co-operation. On this plan Dr. Reid has built up an institution which is both intellectual and practical. Its students are taught various forms of higher craftsmanship, and in its museum and shop rooms are gathered many beautiful forms of art work, vases, bronzes, porcelains, silk, cotton and woolen fabrics, and the numerous tasteful kinds of furniture for which the Chinese workmen are famous. All these objects were for sale, and one found it difficult to deny himself the privilege of carrying away spoil from so attractive a collection. In the large auditorium an audience of perhaps a hundred people were gathered for the Sunday afternoon lecture. The speaker of the day was a Hindu from Benares, whose English would compare favorably with that of the most finished British or American speaker. Dr. Reid believes that the triumph of Christianity is to be brought about by the free exchange of ideas by representatives of all faiths, who will thus come to see the superiority of that religion which is not for one people or one age but for every century and all mankind.

A BUSY SUNDAY.

That busy Sunday came to its close with a sermon at the Union Congregational Church, a very spacious and commodious structure not far from the hotel. The audience was almost entirely American and English, so that one might have fancied himself back in the homeland. The minister was cordial in his welcome, the congregation was enthusiastic in its participation in the music and the responses, and the atmosphere of wholesome Christian interest seemed not in the least dampened by the heavy weather outside. It was a joy to meet these people and to know that in this representative city of middle China there are several similar congregations of sincere and aggressive Christian workers, the business, military and consular interpreters of our western life, confident believers all in the new republic of China and its Christian future.

IN SHANGHAI'S FACTORIES.

One morning Mr. Ware came early to the hotel to take us out into the manufacturing section of Shanghai. We had seen the bales of cotton piled up on the Bund, and knew that a large amount of this material came from India. But its manufacture on Chinese soil is a recent industry, and it is not improbable that the future will see a large amount of cotton harvested in the warmer sections of southern China. The enormous demand for cotton goods among almost all classes except the wealthiest, among whom the demand for silks and furs continues, affords a fine opportunity for the local manufacture of cotton cloth. In fact China is an undeveloped field for every sort of industrial and commercial activity. In spite of the hoary antiquity of its civilization, the forms of manufacture and business that one could call modern are in their infancy. As yet manufactures are few, and most commodities must be shipped in from the West or from Japan. In spite of the fact that China has the most extensive coal deposits in the world its people gather leaves and grass to furnish forth the scantily fed fires over which their food is cooked. There are vast iron treasures fast locked in the mountains of western China, and yet until a very recent day old iron in the form of horse shoes and other scraps, gathered from the streets of London and other European cities, furnished the only metal for the tools of this vast nation. Now all this is rapidly changing, and a good example of this transformation is the cotton mill through which Mr. Ware took us that morning.

CHILD LABOR IN CHINA.

We reached it by a ride of some two miles on the electric car. In the office we were introduced to one of the managers who placed at our disposal a young Chinese foreman to take us through the works. We saw all the steps of cotton manufacture, from the opening of the bales of the raw material, through the long processes of beating, sorting and winding, and then the loom work, where 75,000 spindles in charge of 3,000 workers yielded the final output of finished, folded and stamped cotton goods for the markets of inner China. But the feature of this factory work which most concerned us was the employment of a large number of little children from four to seven years of age, whose long hours and heavy work showed itself plainly in their meagre bodies, only scantily clothed, their anemic faces and listless air. The workers here receive about eighteen cents a day. There is need of better factory laws in the new China, and a more wholesome regard for the lives and welfare of the women and children.

A CHRISTIAN MISSION SCHOOL.

On the same trip Mr. Ware took us to the Yangtsepoo school of the Christian Mission, where a group of children presided over by Miss Rosa Toukin gave promise of the new day for the youth of the land. It is these mission schools which have so largely set the pace for the ambitious people of China, and now it has become one of the tasks of the government to provide similar instruction for the children of the nation.

An institution to which Mr. Ware introduced us was "The Door of Hope," a refuge for girls who have fallen victims to the wide-spread traffic in virtue, which is one of the curses of the entire Orient. We drove out from the hotel to the corner of a side street in one of the crowded corners of the city, and were admitted through a gateway leading into a small court. The institution is housed in several small adjoining buildings, and when we visited there were probably thirty or forty girls in the different rooms. These girls are secured in various ways from the places of evil resort, and are here placed under the supervision of Christian women. They are taught various methods of self help, such as sewing and embroidery. The finished materials are on sale, and the proceeds go partly to support the charity, and partly to provide for the future welfare of the girls. The ladies of our party were delighted with the dainty garments, jackets, caps, underclothing, dressed dolls, embroidered linens and the like. Not less were they impressed by the school work going forward, and by the interested and modest behavior of the girls in the Home. Mr. Ware told us that he had given a great deal of time to this sort of work, and the matron at the Home spoke of his services to the institution as of the highest value. Until the curse of commercialized vice is driven from civilized society, such "Doors of Hope" will be the bright spots in an underworld of darkness.

Leave It With Him

YES, leave it with him; the lilies all do,
And they grow;
They grow in the rain, and they grow in the dew—
Yes, they grow;
They grow in the darkness, all hid in the night,
They grow in the sunshine, revealed by the light—
Still they grow.

They ask not your planting, they need not your care
As they grow.
Dropped down in the valley, the field, anywhere—
There they grow;
They grow in their beauty, arrayed in pure white;
They grow, clothed in glory, by heaven's own light—
Sweetly grow.

The grasses are clothed and the ravens are fed
From his store;
But you who are loved and guarded and led,
How much more
Will he clothe you, and feed you, and give you his care!
Then leave it with him; he has, everywhere,
Ample store.

Yes, leave it with him; 'tis more dear to his heart,
You will know,
Than the lilies that bloom, or the flowers that start
'Neath the snow.
Whatever you need, if you ask it in prayer,
You can leave it with him, for you are his care,
You, you know.

In Praise of John Hodder

Not Forgetting That He Exists in Real Life As Well As in a Popular Book.

BY ELLIS B. BARNES.

WHY should a story that holds up to scorn almost all that our generation covets, the love of wealth and power, the luxury of palace and park, the motor cars, the yachts, and the servants, the unquestioned right to dictate the policies of parties, of a denomination, of a city, the satisfaction of having one's name upon every lip as a municipal benefactor, of having a select circle of friends who are as clay to one's desires, with sufficient power at one's command to raise a favorite to affluence or to reduce an enemy to poverty—why should such a story as "The Inside of the Cup" be read and discussed by tens of thousands with as keen a zest as greeted the advent of Robert Elsmere?

The answer is obvious: the story is a photograph of the moral conscience of our day which will not tolerate, in silence, the piracy of the powerful on week days and the prayers of the pharisaical on Sunday. The story reveals the enormity of a professed Christian banding himself with the powers that prey—the Tom Beattys of the city—and hoping to make restitution for lives destroyed by heaps of granite and busts of marble. It shows the enormity of choking the life out of struggling men and women, the Garvins and the Kate Marcys, and providing public parks as a breathing space for the city's poor. It reveals the iniquity of freezing out of the church a thorough-going Christian like Horace Bently and turning him into a beneficent recluse, whose spirit through all the long years is the spirit of Christ.

A NEW ERA.

The book marks the passing of the era when fortunes can be unlawfully made, and the conscience satisfied by abundant bequests to charitable institutions. It says that no longer shall a jungle path lead from the church door; and that no church can be anything but a triumph of architecture, or if not entitled to that distinction, nothing but a travesty on the spirit of its founder, that is indifferent to the conditions of Dalton Street; above all, that men shall no longer be sacrificed on the altars of Mammon.

What of John Hodder and his renunciation? Was it worth while? Why could he not accept the established order, close his eyes to the hypocrisies that were everywhere thrust upon him, thank God that they were no worse, content himself with the melancholy reflection that St. John's was at least as good as Calvary, and determine to make the best of a bad bargain? Why not continue in the way of the safe and sane, why not grow merry over any departures from the well beaten path and so confirm his reputation for orthodoxy, and proclaim that this was the best possible of all worlds? Then would he have been the logical successor of Reverend Giles Wairdlaw of Trinity, with double the salary and a pension for life, when his active ministry ended. Had he been a contributor to the press he might have cultivated the art of self-repression and of expressing pious inanities for honest convictions; he might even have lamented the desperate times on which we had fallen because of some who "had crept in unawares," and made his head a fountain of tears.

But he did none of these things because he was not a hypocrite, because he had not studied the art of waiting to see how the cat would jump before expressing himself on a controverted subject. He did not study winds and tides so that he might gain everything that orthodox or heterodox, liberal or conservative had to give. John Hodder always played the man. He spoke according to the light that was in him. He counted the cost, and was willing to suffer persecution. It never occurred to him that he ought to hide his light under a bushel, or hold his conviction in abeyance until the clouds rolled by.

HODDER'S "FAULTS."

This article does not concern itself with Hodder's theology. When he disturbed the grasping schemes of his rich members he was a heretic; if he had not been a disturber of these he might have been a Mohammedan, for all they cared. To them his beliefs were inconsequential compared with his conduct.

John Hodder had two grave faults in the eyes of Eldon Parr and men of his kind. He would not consent to be blind and dumb. He determined to see and to speak. St. John's wanted a man of marble mind; they developed one with a mind keyed to a sensitiveness that was acute. The vestry would have made him a machine, but the humanity within him was too strong for that. He asserted with trumpet voice what had been revealed to him by the still small voice. He discovered what many men have discovered at different times, that there are conditions in the church which make its mission meaningless to the masses. He resolved to denounce them, whatever the cost. He knew that the forces against him could destroy his usefulness in the ministry, he knew that they could shriek "heresy" across the diocese, and make every timid communicant flee from his presence as though he were a pestilence.

They could starve him out.

They could be as unpitying as locomotive wheels that reveal their midnight tragedies only with the breaking day. Of himself, he knew that victory was beyond the suspicion of hope. But he knew as well that the powers that would destroy him were but a speck in the moral world, wherein forces, high, mighty, and sublime were co-operating day and night to bring the race nearer God, and away from the mire and the unequal struggle, away from the brute, away from human nature in which gross and tiger passions were loosed to prey upon the weak, the wretched and the innocent and to bring the spoil again to marble and gilded lairs.

These moral armies are set in the universe like suns to accomplish their mission at the divine behest. Whatever moves in harmony with them moves to fuller light and freer air; whatever moves contrary is left behind to be swallowed up in the outer darkness. These unseen forces worked with John Hodder, and he won. Had he been crushed, his cause would have triumphed, for after the "arraignment," St. John's could not be what it had been, a new conscience had been born, a new spirit had been imparted. The masses were thronging its courts, drawn by the revelation of humanity which had ennobled its well established divinity. Thenceforth the parish could never be an island in the surging human sea.

There are preachers today in many churches like John Hodder. Their renunciations are not set on heroic stages as was his, but they make renunciations. They are doing battle with Eldon Parr in many forms, while communities worship the success of such as he wholly indifferent to the iniquities that made it possible.

JOHN HODDER'S PROTOTYPE.

Eldon Parr and his like fascinate by their prowess. He is worthy the pen of a Carlyle whose heroes must always be towering, terrific, unfeeling, colossal. Put the banker back a few ages and he could easily have been a red-handed scourge of the seas, a Norse captain, whose mercies have beak and talons. What the modern did by craft the ancient did with a club. Parr's virtues are those of the bronze age, John Hodder's those of a day when might is being met with meekness.

The rector's cause could not survive were it not for the immortal example of One who in the long ago was stretched between the malefactors to teach the world that heroic suffering was more potent for the softening of barbarities than the sweep of armies, and that those who fight for the right have Omnipotence upon their side.

The great glory of Jesus' life was its abolute faithfulness. He did always what pleased His Father. Where did He make this claim? He finished, not merely ended, the work His Father had given Him to do. He also was faithful to death and through death. And when John saw Him coming riding out of heaven in His great vision, "Faithful and True" was the name he read first upon him. If we would ever sit down with Him upon His throne as king we must begin and end as He began and ended as "Faithful and True."—Southern Churchman.

MARTYRDOM.

So he died for his faith. That is fine—
More than most of us do.
But, say, can you add to that line
That he lived for it, too?

In his death he bore witness at last
As a martyr to truth.
Did his life do the same in the past
From the days of his youth?

It is easy to die. Men have died
For a wish or a whim—
From bravado or passion or pride.
Was harder for him?

But to live—every day to live out
All the truth that he dreampt,
While his friend met his conduct with doubt,
And the world with contempt;

Was it thus that he plodded ahead,
Never turning aside?
Then we'll talk of the life he led;
Never mind how he died.

An Old Time Optimist

The Story of the Prophet Jeremiah, Who Had to Cheer Up, Although He Knew "The Worst Was Yet to Come."

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

PEOPLE have debated the question whether there is a sense of humor in God. The argument on the one side is that humor involves the element of partial knowledge and surprise, which with God is impossible; and on the other side it is argued that God could not impart to us what He did not Himself possess, and that humor is one of our most sacred and lofty gifts. We will not attempt to settle the question here and now, but will merely record that one time when Jeremiah complained to God, the answer which came to him from heaven was, in substance, "Cheer up, Jeremiah; the worst is yet to come!" Whether that is humor or not might depend on circumstances.

Rev. Mr. Jeremiah kept on in Jerusalem despite many efforts to displace him. He was unpopular with the priests; unpopular with the politicians; unpopular with the other ministers, but he managed to stay on. He did not shrink from the sensational, but affected certain oddities in his attire, and in his method of preaching, all of which are on record and need not here be repeated. He had no moving picture machine, but he illustrated his sermons in striking fashion and with dramatic power.

He often felt his isolation, and one time made bitter lamentation to God, and this is the answer which he received from heaven:

"If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses? and if in the land of peace, wherein thou trustest, they wearied thee, then how wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan?" (Jer. 12:15.)

NO SYMPATHY FOR THE PREACHER.

If there is any verse of Scripture which would seem to give cold comfort to a man already depressed and disheartened, this would seem to be the one. Jeremiah had accepted his hard and cruel lot—and never a man in all human history performed more bravely a disheartening task. The message which God sent him to deliver was an unpopular one. His congregation resented it, his relatives were ashamed of him, the community in which he dwelt looked on him with aversion, he was denied the comforts of home, the solace of companionship, the inspiration of organized cooperation. A prophet has always been a lonely man; no prophet more so than Jeremiah. Finally, when his burdens grew so heavy that it seemed one more straw would break his back, he lifted up his voice in complaint to God.

And this is God's reply. Put into modern language it is virtually this, "Cheer up, Jeremiah, the worst is yet to come." We can almost imagine that the angel who communicated this message to the prophet whispered it in his ear with a tearful smile and waited to see how Jeremiah would take it.

He took it like a man. Only to a brave man could God have spoken thus. A coward would have been thrown into consternation, would have wept and whimpered and given it up in dismay. God said to Jeremiah, "Don't give up yet. Prepare for harder things," and that message nerved the soul of the prophet to fortitude.

Viewed from this distance we can see the absolute necessity that some man should be trained for Jeremiah's task. We can understand what he could not, and that discipline was positively essential to the success of his mission. We can see that nothing less would have saved the conditions imposed than these successive and heart-breaking trials. Jeremiah is one of the most modest men in history. Because he wept people have supposed he was weak; on the contrary, he was a man of marvelous strength of character. That character was thrust into the fire of persecution, hammered upon the anvil of popular opposition and plunged deep into the waters of sorrow. Even so a Damascus blade is tempered and becomes a thing of power.

OUR PAMPERED MODERN LIFE.

We live in an age in which men insist upon being coddled. Have we a toothache, we must take something for it. Is the tooth to be extracted, we must have an anæsthetic. Do we lie awake at night we must have an opiate. Religions have been built up on men's belief that physical discomfort is the worst thing in the world, and that the chief thing which religion can do for a man is to relieve his backache.

The religion of Christ is indeed a religion of tenderness and sympathy. It has in it the hope of relief from physical as well as spiritual ill, but it has also its ringing message of fortitude. We need to be made heroic, we need to endure hardness. Luxury never yet made a strong race. History has never produced heroes save in the face of peril. Never yet were muscles made strong or backs made ready for their necessary burdens save by vigorous and wholesome exercise.

A MAN CALM AMID TEMPESTS.

Look at Jeremiah in the days that followed. When a financial panic struck Jerusalem he was the one man with calm business judgment, making a long time investment and paying for it in cash because he trusted God and believed in the Divine providence which would surely bring the people back to their beloved city. Look at him in the days when the armies besieged Jerusalem and men trembled and their faces grew white; he was calm, self-contained, unterrified. See him in the hour when the conqueror offered him exemption from the common fate, but he manfully shared the fortunes and misfortunes of his people. Listen to his last word after they had carried him down into Egpyt, where he died, still protesting against unrighteousness, still believing in Divine goodness, still rebuking those who said that because religion seemed to have no present cash value it was not worth having. Francis M. Key strained his eye through the gray of the morning and the battle's smoke and saw his country's flag still floating "mid the rockets' red glare; the bombs bursting in the air." Even so, through a more terrified and long-continued conflict Jeremiah never once pulled down his flag. The swelling of Jordan did not terrify him; the onrush of the horses did not trample down his faith. He was ready and steady when the worst should some.

The world needs heroic hearts; the world needs unconquerable lives. There are times when our Heavenly Father, listening, grants them relief from pain. There are other times when He says to them, "Be strong, be brave, there are great battles to fight. There is need of men and women who will be true for their own sake and for the sake of others. Cheer up then; there are worse things to come, but out of them shall emerge the best character, tested and unconquerable."

The Mexican Situation

Some Facts for the Consideration of American Christians.

BY S. G. INMAN.

THE Mexican question is the most perplexing problem before the United States today. It can be solved neither by war nor diplomacy. There are great underlying causes for the awful conditions prevailing in Mexico. A strong dictatorship might keep those causes beneath the surface for a time, as it has in the past, but this will only postpone the settlement of these questions, which must be settled right before revolution permanently disappears from the country. These questions are primarily moral and economic, rather than religious and political. The Mexican does not care so much about the right to vote as he does the right to live. He does not need so much a change in his creed as he needs a change in his morals. The land baron and the priest have continued their unholy alliance from the days of the Conquistadores till the present, playing alternately the one into the hands of the other, to keep the people in ignorance, superstition and debt, so that the exploitation, both by padre and amo would be sure and easy. Out of this system of exploitation there have grown up a thousand minor evils. The burden has become greater than the people are willing to bear in these days when enlarged educational advantages, developed in spite of these feudal conditions, have gradually opened the eyes of the ever increasing middle class.

Along with this new industrial and social order for which the people are fighting (though often in the most unguided way), there must come another thing if Mexico is to become a strong nation, a thing which the people have not yet seen—moral stamina. No scheme for dividing the great landed estates among the people, no enactment of laws for the amelioration of the peon, no amount of free press or suffrage, will solve the question unless there is an instilling of the great moral principles taught in the Sermon on the Mount. As Col. Roosevelt has recently said to the Brazilians: "Character must ever outrank genius and intellect. The state can not prosper unless the average man can take care of himself; and neither can it prosper unless the average man realizes that, in addition to the taking care of himself, he must work with his fellows with good sense and honesty and practical acknowledgment of obligation to the community as a whole for the things that are vital to the interests of the community as a whole."

A NEW VIEWPOINT.

This viewpoint of life is entirely new to the Mexican. It is not fair to say that he is incapable of appreciating it, for he has never had it presented to him. Clericalism and vested interests have, both by example and precept, taught him the opposite all through the centuries. Foreign capitalists, with their immense concessions, have usually been willing to join in with the system for exploitation. And the inestimable resources of the country, along with its people, have been made to pay tribute down through the years to these privileged classes. And yet we seem to be astounded at the "horrible atrocities, disgraceful to all civilization," witnessed today in Mexico, and cry out in the name of humanity for them to be stopped. It would seem, rather, that we ought to rejoice that the people have finally gathered strength enough to protest against these wrongs.

The revolution, if it accomplishes nothing but draw the attention of the Christian world to Mexico—and how terribly it had neglected her—may be worth while. This neglect even from a financial standpoint has been most unwise for the United States. If we had spent for schools and moral uplift work in Mexico years ago what we have spent in the last three years in trying to enforce neutrality laws and protect our citizens, the civilized world, in all probability, would have been saved all this loss of life and property. But while American capitalists' interest in material Mexico is represented by investments reaching a thousand million dollars, American Christians' interest in her moral welfare is represented by an investment of a trifle over one million dollars. It has long been a common practice, both in our diplomatic and mission service, to send any insistent candidate who was not strong enough for other countries to Mexico. Thousands of our best informed citizens who can give detailed information as to the social, political and religious conditions in India, China and Japan are absolutely ignorant of Mexico.

THE FUTURE BRIGHTER.

But certainly there is a better day ahead. Present conditions are compelling us to an interest in Mexico, and Christian forces must realize that the call of Mexico, so long unheeded, must be answered. And it must be answered, not by the preaching of a sectarian theology, but by the application of the gospel of Christ to the great moral and economic problems which await solution in that beautiful land of sunshine and shadow.

Missionary experts have said that Mexico is a more difficult field than China or India. There are many reasons for this, among which is the fact that the thinking men of Mexico, having become disgusted with the rottenness of the priesthood, have turned from the Roman church and believe that there is no religion for them. They still, however, carry the old prejudice against the Evangelical Christianity which has been instilled in them from early youth. The fact that the work of Protestantism has been carried on largely among the peon or lower classes is an added reason for their not considering it as being worthy of their investigation. Too often, also, has the missionary been interested in making converts to his religious system, rather than setting forth the great social and moral program which Jesus taught as the secret of all individual and national development and progress.

What we must try to do for Mexico is to help her realize the basic truth of the idea expressed by James Anthony Froude in the following words:

"Whether a nation be great or little depends entirely on the sort of men and women that it is producing. A nation is a nation that is composed of sound human beings, healthy in body, strong in limb, true in word and deed, brave, sober, temperate, chaste, to whom morals are of more importance than wealth or knowledge, where duty is first and the rights of men are second—where, in short, men grow up and live and work, having in them what our ancestors called the fear of God."

Mexico has never been so ready to receive this truth as she is today. The moral and religious forces of the United States should be ready to go into the country, as soon as peace is secured, with such a force, and with such an enlarged conception, we see our duty as never before. Young men with these high moral and spiritual visions, equipped to interpret in a practical way the social service side of Christ's gospel, can find no greater field in the whole world, and may feel assured of the co-operation of Mexico's best citizens in this great and far-reaching work.

A Straight Talk to Ministers

"A PROMINENT LAYMAN" IN "MEN AT WORK."

It is a far cry from a little remote New England village to a mission field in Turkey; and the work in the two parishes is as dissimilar as anything could be; and yet I have witnessed a point of contact established in a most remarkable way. He was a man—a real man—a God's man in fact—a missionary home on furlough and, instead of pursuing the usual course of resting or lecturing, he asked that he might be assigned to a small country parish, where he might be able to study the rural church problem from the American standpoint.

He settled down into what seemed to be a quiet, restful pastorate, and he did not talk missions for six months. He merely studied the situation. He found a church of thirty-five active—I mean inactive—members, a church which had been lulled to sleep by the gentle ministrations of a dear old saint who had applied the anaesthetic for forty years. He found among the villagers a number who were actively opposed to the church and its ideals. And he found other things, but after a while he began to dig under the crust and with a sweet persuasiveness which marks the man he commenced to solve the problem.

Within a year he has enlisted the services of nine of his congregation in some specific work for the Master, nine who had never done a stroke of spiritual work before. At a recent communion service he added eleven new members, and some of these were formerly the church's bitterest opponents.

And so when I am asked what interests me in the church today, I think of the awakening consciousness in some places while I deplore the apathy in so many others. And this story, drab in its coloring perhaps, not very picturesque in its setting, gives me the clue to that large area of apathetic condition which extends over our church. And the reason lies in the fact that our ministers to a large extent fail to study the actual conditions that confront them. They are satisfied with mediocre results. They are faithful and consecrated and think they are doing their best. But are they?

Men need awakening. They are asleep to their danger; they are steeped in their selfish interests. They present a fair exterior, but underneath are worried hearts, burdened souls, seared consciences, and most preaching does not penetrate beneath the hard shell in which we all encase ourselves. The country church, the suburban church, the city church, the downtown church would have no geographical problems or arithmetical problems if the minister could only get underneath and solve the heart problems.

What gives Gipsy Smith his power? I did not ask who gives it?—for that answers itself. God has given him wonderful power. But what does the power consist in? Simply the ability to get down to the level of the average man and look into the real heart of man instead of looking down into him from superior heights and seeing only the shell.

And this is where our preachers fail so often. They prepare careful sermons and they are sincere in their delivery, but after the delivery they let it go at that. Take it or leave it seems to be their attitude very often. Baseball isn't played that way. Business isn't secured that way. Love isn't made that way. John Timothy Stone and others do not work that way. Paul didn't preach that way, and Jesus did not mean that the messenger of peace should bring his tidings that way.

We need awakening. Who is to do it if not the preacher? But he must study how! He must find the ideal which appeals to the young man; not a general ideal which may appeal to all as a class, but a specific ideal for every one; or rather he must discover the avenue through which the Great Ideal can be presented to each one. Some get it through their loyalty or sense of justice, but it must come to all in some way and the preacher must discover the way.

GERMANY AND AMERICA.

Prince von Bülow has just issued his book on "Germany Under the Reign of William II." His references to the relations of the United States and Germany show how much the former Imperial Chancellor valued the friendship of the American government and people, and what a close bond exists now between the two nations.

"During the Spanish-American war a portion of German public opinion displayed strong sympathy for Spain and this was not agreeable to the United States. The manner in which incidents that occurred between the German and American fleets at Manila were made the most of in a portion of the English and American press also cast a cloud over the relations of Germany and the United States.

"This feeling reached its climax in February, 1889, so that it seemed well to emphasize the relationship by blood and race of the two nations in order to bring about a better feeling." He then quotes his own speech, in which he said:

" 'From the point of view of sensible policy there is no reason why Germany and the United States should not be on the best of terms. We can say it calmly —in no other land in the last century has America found better understanding or more just recognition than in Germany.'

"This understanding and recognition was given to America by Emperor William II more than by any other person. He is to be thanked before anybody for opening the way to a good and secure relationship with the United States. He gradually won over the Americans through his friendly, sequential and understanding way of dealing. Personal good relations joined him and President Roosevelt. The sending of Prince Henry to America met with the hoped for result to the fullest extent.

"It was also a happy thought of our Emperor to bring home firmly and sincerely the intellectual junction of the two Germanic peoples by means of an exchange of prominent university professors.

"In the United States live about 12,000,000 Germans. Among these there is a growing effort since the foundation of the German-American National Union in 1901, while remaining loyal to their new fatherland, to keep up their relations with their old home and to strengthen them. So long as politics here and in the United States are in calm hands, and overdone expressions of friendship as well as nervous feelings in connection with occasional frictions are avoided—and these things happen now and then in economical mattters—we need not have any fears as to our relations with the United States."

LINCOLN HIGHWAY NOTES.

The city council of Chicago Heights, Ill., has re-named Fourteenth Street West "Lincoln Way."

Citizens of Bucyrus, O., are erecting two large signs for the limits of the city, giving the population of Bucyrus and the distances to New York, San Francisco, Upper Sandusky and Galion, Ohio.

Southern good roads workers are planning two more transcontinental routes similar to the Lincoln Highway, one to go through the south to be known as the Lee Highway and one through the central part of the country, south of the Lincoln Highway, to be called the Washington Highway.

Those who have contributed to the support of the Lincoln Highway are now receiving from the Lincoln Highway Association radiator emblems. The emblems are six inches wide, oval, in black and gold, and bear a map of the country, across which is a broad black band to represent the highway. The words "Lincoln Highway" surround the map.

In Van Wert, Ohio, the Lincoln Highway through the village is marked by night as well as day. Lincoln Way in this village is illuminated by arches carrying incandescent bulbs reaching from curb to curb. H. C. Ostermann, consul-at-large of the association, arranged to have two bulbs on one side changed to red and two on the other to blue, leaving the balance of the bulbs on the arches white.

Following a Lincoln Highway meeting at Laporte, Ind., sixteen Valparaiso business men who attended it, have formed an auxiliary of the Lincoln Highway association in their city. Committees have been appointed, plans to change the name of Main Street to Lincoln Way promulgated and a mass meeting will be held within a few days to which all citizens interested in good roads development will be invited.

HOSPITALITY.

Our way of living has changed; the form of our home life and the manner of receiving our friends have changed; but through all the shifting phases of the human family, the essence of hospitality has remained the same—to break bread and to converse.

There have been hundreds of innovations in the way of entertaining one's guests—monkey dinners, barnyard dances, vaudeville stunts, amateur plays, and games—always games both with and without stakes. But these are free shows, not hospitality.

Hospitality is enjoying with others that which is our own: dividing with them the bread for the body, sharing with them the experiences and fancies of the mind. True hospitality is where one from the outside is welcomed into the home circle. He brings with him something of pleasure and thought and fellowship which he leaves in that home; he takes away with him a share of the cheer and warmth of the fireside.

To sit down together and break bread —one's own bread—and then sit together before the fire—one's own fire—and tell of that which has happened on our pilgrimage, and speculate on what is yet to come: that, whether in an Indian's wigwam or a baron's castle, is the end and soul of hospitality.—Collier's Weekly.

Our Readers Opinions

IS THERE TRUTH IN THIS?

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

I desire to protest strongly against the persistently reiterated counsel to Sunday-school workers contained in sundry Sunday-school literature to read certain books and adopt certain methods in order to the progress (?) of our modern Sunday-schools. I have before me in a popular Sunday-school monthly a treatise on what a pastor can do to help in Sunday-school work. After some dissertation on the difference in principles, methods and ends of the modern Sunday-schools from those of a few years ago the aforesaid pastor is admonished to read some fifteen books on the various phases of Sunday-school work and five others on Teacher-training and then to organize a city graded union or Teacher-training institute.

Poor fellow, when will he ever have time to read the good old book or get in touch with the Throne of Grace, or feed and clothe the spiritually hungry and naked, or be of any real use or help to anyone?

The same issue of this Sunday-school monthly treats of the "new" Teacher-training and deploring the failure of the "old" to relieve the distressing need for teachers in Sunday-school work it proclaims the infallibility of the new to accomplish what the old failed to do and incidentally suggests a "few books" for us to study that will make us all-efficient workers?

Is it any wonder that pastors are scarce and Sunday-school teachers hard to get when these publications lay down such programs for them to follow? If the "old" Teacher-training system, which was ushered in as the great panacea for the troubles and trials of Sunday-school workers, has proved so serious a failure what reason have we to expect any better results from the "new?"

Does it not look as though our Sunday-school work and workers are being exploited by at least some of these publishing houses for selfish, mercenary ends? Perhaps not, perhaps I am getting old and eccentric and don't see as clearly as I should but I feel like abandoning the entire outfit of Sunday-school helps and clinging to the Bible only, for it can never fail or wear out. "Of the making of many books there is no end and much study is a weariness of the flesh." is as true today as when the wise man wrote it.

THE BLESSEDNESS OF HUNGER.

HUNGER is a blessing; but hunger would be a curse were there no food. The desires born of the æsthetic sense are a blessing; but they would be no blessing were there no beauty, no art, no music.

The hunger of the soul is a blessing; but is so only because there is a supply of spiritual food for the lives of men. It is not always easy to get men to hunger for this food. One of the problems which presented itself to Jesus was that of getting men to want spiritual food. They followed Him all around the Sea of Galilee when He multiplied the loaves, and deserted Him in droves when he preached to them next day about the bread of life. At that very point lay the crisis in his ministry. The day when He wrought the miracle of the bread and the fish registered the high water mark of his popularity. The day when he refused to make more bread, but offered them the bread of heaven, was the day when He practically became a wanderer from Capernaum, which had been His home during his ministry. During the whole of that ministry He had striven to inspire in men a hunger for the good. "Thy sins be forgiven thee," He said to the sufferer; and then added the lesser blessing, which men counted the greater, "Rise, take up thy bed, and walk." And who knows how many spiritual blessings he sorrowfully withheld because men were so intent on lesser gifts from God that they would not let themselves hunger for righteousness?

THE WEIGHT OF SUFFERING.

PAUL talks about the "weight of glory;" we often speak of the weight of suffering. Disease and physical infirmity are millstones about the sufferer's neck. Dan Crawford gets at the heart of the matter better when he describes the suffering of Faulknor, the missionary, as "only a weight necessary to keep down the diver while he was collecting pearls." That is a noble interpretation—and a true one, also. Out of the deeps where men drink the cup of pain they bring their pearls of great price. The diver must have a weight to help hold him down where the pearls are found. Then up he comes finally with his precious gift. The weight had done its work.

THE POWER OF SUGGESTION.

THERE is something charming in the directness of the question which the Ethiopian treasurer addressed to Philip: "See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?"

There was nothing in the world to hinder. Everything was there that needed to be there. There was water with which to baptize, and a penitent soul who needed baptism, and a follower of the Lord Jesus Christ qualified to administer baptism. Why should anyone desire anything more than that?

Nothing could have been more opportune than that the chariot should have crossed the brook at that particular moment. The Ethiopian treasurer was just ready for it. It was an exceedingly fortunate coincidence, or if you like it better, you may call it a providence.

We are reminded at once of the difference between the attitude of the Ethiopian and that of some men at the present day. The presence of water suggests to them nothing but an opportunity to water the horses, or to wash the chariot. They know they are sinful men; they know that faith in Christ can save them; they know that baptism and confession of Christ are the outward signs of that grace which ought to be in all men's hearts. But they will cross other streams, or think they will, and the water may be more clear or less cold, or the day may be brighter, or they may wish for an opportunity to think about it longer. In any event, the result is the same. They cross the stream, the chariot leaves the valley and begins to ascend the hills. Before long the place of springs and streams is left behind, and before the chariot comes down again to where the waters flow they have decided to postpone their baptism for the present.

There is a power of suggestion in external things. So simple a thing as the fording of a stream at the right moment may have made a life-long difference in the experience of that queen's treasurer. He could easily have found excuses for delay. Philip was a mere chance acquaintance. He himself was on a journey and in some haste. He might have preferred to make a confession of Christ in other surroundings, but this was his opportunity and he knew it and embraced it.

Only three conditions needed to come together, the penitent soul, the gospel preacher, and the water. Yet simple as these were they did not come together every day in the life of this man upon a journey. They do not come every day in the life of any of us. The precise combination of circumstances which makes it possible for us to perform any specific duty never recurs in exactly the same relationship to each other. If there is good that needs to be done, and we are there and have the opportunity to do it, let us not wait. We and that duty and the occasion for the doing of it are a threefold combination that never will meet again in precisely the same relationship. Let us do it now.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE NO JOKE.

AMBASSADOR PAGE delivered an address before the Associated Chambers of Commerce in London one night recently, and in it the cable reports him as saying something like this:

"That the Monroe Doctrine simply means this, that the United States would prefer that no European government should gain more land in the new world.

"Amid laughter Mr. Page declared that he could not say the United States had constructed the Panama canal for Great Britain, but that it had added greatly to the pleasure of building that great work to know that the British would profit most by its use."

The senate has asked Mr. Bryan to demand of Mr. Page an explanation of these words.

When Mr. Monroe put into his message that "doctrine" concerning the colonization of the two American continents, he was preparing a heap of trouble for us in future years. No one seems to feel entirely sure what the Monroe Doctrine means as applied to present conditions, but that it puts on the American nation a heavy responsibility is growingly evident.

At the present it would seem to be the part of wisdom not only for foreign nations but for American ambassadors at foreign courts to treat the Monroe Doctrine with that respectful deference belonging to a buzz-saw.

ARE AMERICAN WIVES A PERIL?

WE HAVE long heard that American wives were ruining the British House of Lords. Now we hear, for the first time, that they are in danger of ruining the ministry of the English Free churches. Joseph Shepherd, of Hopton Congregational Church, Mirfield, whose Spartan self-denial on behalf of the missionary cause recently excited attention in England, has arrested notice by an utterance on the Nonconformist ministry. "How many ministers," he asks, "deny themselves the comforts of a home, for the sake of the One who had not where to lay His head? Bearing a cross, forsaking all, is certainly not a popular gospel to preach. It means ridicule, and even persecution. Many ministers, instead of forsaking a home, endeavor to improve their social and financial position by marrying rich women. 'Successful' marriages were formerly left to the Americans. American women have ruined the House of Lords, and they threaten the Nonconformist ministry. One would have thought, if a minister is not strong enough to forsake all, but must have a home, that a spiritual-minded woman who has suffered the pangs of poverty would be able to sympathize with the poor. But it is not to poverty the average minister turns, but to wealth and position, and after he has captured his bird with the golden plumage, with self-satisfied arrogance he displays the gaudy and glittering feathers of his ostentatious captive as an achievement worthy of emulation by the crossbearers of the despised Galilean. It is because ministers marry, and marry worldly, ambitious women who hunger and thirst not after righteousness, but after an advanced social position, that many of our great spiritual leaders are leaving the pulpit. . . . The Nazarene carpenter would not be a success in the Nonconformist ministry today. He would be driven out of the colleges, as many brave, self-denying, self-sacrificing young men are secretly driven out at present. He would be turned out of the churches. The Scribes and the Pharisees would hound Him to the Cross again.''

We had not noticed on this side of the water any considerable tendency on the part of ministers to marry rich wives, and we are not sure that all who have done so have been ruined thereby. Artemus Ward used to meditate ''How often are young men ruined by too much money.'' Then he would add, ''I would like to be ruined—a little.''

''THE SUPERFLUOUS WOMAN.''

THE excess of women over men in the population of Great Britain is a situation of grave concern, whether viewed in its industrial or ethical relationships. Of it Mrs. Archibald Colquhoun writes in the Nineteenth Century, under the title, ''The Superfluous Woman: Her Cause and Cure:''

It appears that of the population of the United Kingdom, 21,946,000 are males, and 23,275,000 females, giving an excess of 1,329,000 females, or 1,061 women to 1,000 men. Mrs. Archibald Colquhoun does not think the situation for the woman is as bad as it looks at first sight. She says: ''Ten million females, at all events, are spared the necessity for competition in the labor market, where they are woefully handicapped by nature in the struggle for existence.'' Occupations open to women are increasing. None the less, from the marriage point of view—and this appeals to the vast majority of women—the outlook is not bright for a large proportion of the ''superfluous,'' especially of the middle class.

The increasing reluctance of men to assume family responsibilities is not only answerable for moral evils and dangers, but it decreases the matrimonial chances of girls of their own period, and puts a heavier burden on older men who are fathers of girls. It is, however, an inevitable result of the demand of the middle-class girl to be freed from the trammels of domestic work. She becomes a luxury which a man can only afford when he has established himself.

Late marriage means that the man will be past his prime when his growing family needs his care most. Women, says Mrs. Colquhoun, have to choose between celibacy and ''menial duties.'' She has no faith in solutions that ignore home-making and motherhood. We ''must try to rear a different kind of woman.''

The situation is not quite as grave in America, but that the problem is here no one can deny. Are there any really superfluous women?

THE ''AUTHORIZED'' VERSION.

SHAKESPEARE is on record as to questioning ''What's in a name?'' There is something in a name and a good deal in an adjective. Take, for instance, the adjective ''authorized'' as applied to King James' version of the Bible. Who authorized it? No one. It came slowly into use and not without a great deal of protest. It was a good version, much better than anything that the English-speaking people had had before, and it came into general acceptance because it deserved it, and not because anyone authorized it, or could have done so. There now is a better version than that prepared in the reign of King James, as much better than King James' version as his was than anything that had gone before, yet good people have hesitated to use the American Standard Bible in place of the so-called authorized version. Let us understand once and for all that the King James version is entitled to high regard because of the actual merit of the translation and for no other reason whatever. It is not authorized.

A similar superstition attaches to the use of the term ''apostolic'' or ''apostles.'' There is the so-called Apostles' Creed, with which the apostles had nothing whatever to do. It is an ancient and venerable document, entitled to very high regard, but it is an exceedingly fragmentary and unsatisfactory document, if one is seeking a compendium of Christian truth. It grew out of the consensus of Christian opinion, and found an honorable place in the liturgy of the Church, and it represents a high water mark of Christian teaching, but it is not authoritative, or final, or apostolic, and it would be very easy to make of it a stumbling block and a possible occasion of insincerity. There are more comprehensive creeds and there is just as much authority for the making of them now as there was for the making of that one.

HAVE WE NO HYMN WRITERS?

A CERTAIN Presbyterian is bemoaning the lack of Presbyterian hymn writers. Is there even more reason for Disciples' tears? It would seem so from the evidence presented by this investigator.

This Presbyterian hymn-lover, out of curiosity, took home his Presbyterian hymn book one day, and ascertained the affiliations of the authors of the hymns. The following are some of his findings: He was interested first, of course, in finding the proportion of Presbyterian authors, thinking that they would constitute at least a plurality, while the Methodists would be second. He was amazed to find that the Congregationalists, Unitarians and Baptists all led the Presbyterians, while the Episcopalians, with 105 hymns to their credit, led the Congregationalists, which had the next largest number, by a plurality of sixty-seven. His investigation showed that those denominations having less than forty and more than ten hymns to their credit were the Congregationalists, Unitarians, Baptists, Presbyterians and Methodists. Those having less than ten and more than one were the Independents, Plymouth Brethren, Roman Catholic, Dutch Reformed, Universalists, Quakers and Moravians. The Unitarians, with twenty-seven to their credit, lead the Presbyterians by two, hold the Baptists to a tie, and more than double the Methodists.

Where are the Disciples' hymn writers?

DON'T FIGHT THE CHIMNEY-SWEEPS.

IT is an English proverb, ''If you fight with a sweep you cannot blacken him, but he may blacken you.'' So it is better to let a sooty bully bluster and blow; contact with him cannot bring anything but a smooch to yourself. He is annoying, the blackener of reputation and the sower of suspicion, but it is best to let him rage. He rubs his own black a little deeper into his own skin if he is let alone.

MAN'S FREEDOM.

I HAVE thrown the throttle open and am tearing down His track;
I have thrown it out to full-speed and no hand can hold me back!
'Tis my arm controls the engine, though another owns the rail,
But for once I'm in the open and the yard-lights pass and pale!

Green lights! Red lights! He has hung his signals out!
Caution here! Danger ho! And what's the man about?
'Tis true he owns the Engine, to do as he has done,
But how about the Final Word—when he ends the run?

So from siding on to junction-point now I shall have my day;
I have stopped to read no orders, but I take the right-of-way.
Down the open grade I thunder and around the curve I swing,
For my hand is on the throttle and my heart shall have its fling!

Light lost! Life lost! Flag, O flag the others back!
Switch the wreck! Ditch the wreck! Dare any block His track?
There creeps into the Terminal the man who had his day,
But I wonder, O my soul, just what his God will say!

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance.

John R. Mott Moves New York Students.

So enthusiastic is John R. Mott, of the Student Volunteer Movement, over the results of his conferences with the students of New York City, that he compares these meetings with those of last year in China, which were truly remarkable. Mr. Mott's campaign, in which he was assisted by Sherwood Eddy, Dr. Henry Sloan Coffin, Dr. G. A. Johnstone Ross and Robert E. Speer, included five central meetings—one in Carnegie hall, one in Horace Mann auditorium and three in the Columbia University gymnasium. The Carnegie hall meeting was honored by the chairmanship of former President Taft, and there was an attendance of 2,500 students. The Horace Mann meeting for women only equaled the capacity of the hall, 1,300.

Churches Decry Overlapping Activities.

The Muskogee Presbytery in Oklahoma is sending up to the next General Assembly meeting in Chicago in May some strenuous demands looking toward more efficient co-working of the various communions in that field. The petition calls upon the Assembly to invite all the other evangelical denominations in the United States into a conference on the previously acknowledged principle for rural and small town fields of one church in one community. The ideal in view will be a compact among the different denominations promising to withdraw from any field where an official interdenominational commission decides that withdrawal is necessary in order to consolidation of local religious interests.

Calendar of Special Sundays.

A committee of social workers and church officials, meeting in New York City, have prepared a list of special observation Sundays for the year 1914. This list is recommended by the committee to churches of all denominations including Jews, Roman Catholics and all others. The dates are: January 4, New Year Sunday; January 25, Child Labor Sunday; February 8, Lincoln Sunday; February 22, Washington Sunday; April 12, Easter Sunday; April 19, Sabbath Observance Sunday; May 10, Mothers' Day; May 17, Peace Sunday; May 24 or 31, Memorial Sunday; June 14, Children's Day; June 28, Independence Day Sunday; September 6, Labor Sunday; October 25, Prison Sunday; November 26, Thanksgiving Day; November 29, Tuberculosis Sunday; December 20, Christmas Sunday; December 27, Hospital Saturday and Sunday.

Taft Addresses Educational Association.

The meetings of the Religious Education Association recently held at New Haven, Conn., had for their general topic, "The Relation of Higher Education to the Social Order." The speakers were for the most part professors in colleges and universities. The president of the meeting was Dr. Charles F. Thwing, of Western Reserve University. Among the speakers were President Hyde, of Bowdoin; President Hadley, of Yale; Prof. Theodore G. Soares, of the University of Chicago, and President Powell, of Hobart College. The addresses by these men were concerned largely with student welfare.

More popular were the addresses of District Attorney Charles S. Whitman, of New York City, and of ex-President Taft. Mr. Whitman voiced a demand that "the rich and the powerful shall do their part—a part measured by their power—toward the betterment of the conditions of living in our country; that they shall assist and not obstruct the government in its effort to eliminate privilege, to protect labor as well as capital, and to strengthen the race by proper provision for its health."

The address of ex-President William H. Taft presented an indictment of the selfish lives of the prosperous as responsible for the disorder of the Industrial Workers of the World and other such forces. Any sort of interest in humanity, he maintained, is better for the national life than selfishness.

R. J. Campbell Discusses the "Age."

It is not surprising that such an idealist as Rev. R. J. Campbell, of the City Temple, London, should take his stand as an anti-materialist. But he goes further, and declares that the trouble with the men of today is not so much materialism as ignorance of how to profit spiritually by their material wealth. He says: "To call this a materialistic age is hardly a full account of the matter, however. All ages are materialistic, more or less; it is only a question of degree. But, as a shrewd observer of the trend of things remarked the other day, people do not seem to know how to enjoy the benefits which increase of material wealth has brought within their reach. The soul is ignored; it is the flesh that is pampered. The leisure of the workers in all ranks of society has little about it that is spiritual; it is mostly of the nature of physical or mental excitement. Life is largely strain and worry for the great majority. We have made it so; we have made it artificial, fierce, exacting. There is a terror hanging over most of you men; you labor under the taskmaster's lash, practically every one of you, liable at any moment if you relax tension or make a mistake to be thrown down and trampled upon in the mad race for gain. Gain, gain, gain—there is the keynote of the world's endeavors. 'What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' For it is precisely what is happening to civilization."

Dr. Brady Resigns Charge.

Dr. Cyrus Townsend Brady, author-lecturer and hero of many a theological controversy, has offered his resignation as rector of the Church of the Ascension, Mt. Vernon, N. Y., a fashionable Episcopal parish, because he can't get along on the salary paid him. In other parishes, Dr. Brady says, in explaining his action, he has been able to supplement the salary he got as minister by selling the products of his pen. Here the Ascension Church has grown so much that he has to spend most of his time in parochial duties and has no opportunity to write. He says that there is no other reason for his quitting.

Roman Catholics are to extend the invitation to Rome to hold the International Eucharistic Congress in New York City. It is rumored that Romanists of this country have hopes for a Pope from America.

A Sign of the Times.

A Chicago Syndicate editor is running a series of "Back to the Bible" articles in a number of the metropolitan papers. The articles consist of brief statements from noted men relative to the Bible. Truly religion is getting into the lives of the people, when the newspapers are made aware of it.

Dr. Samuel R. Driver

A Resume of the Work of the Deceased Scholar.

BY ARTHUR GORDON.

When one hears that a celebrated Biblical scholar has died at the age of sixty-eight, it does not seem like a long span of life, nor does it appear that in the working years of such a career a monumental amount of labor could be performed. Yet the life of Samuel R. Driver bridges the period of transition from the days of fierce and fanatical controversy over the newly announced principles and results of biblical criticism, to the new age in which those results have become the commonplaces of all effective Bible study. And in the amount of work performed by this distinguished teacher the world has an example of what may be done when rare talents are yoked to tireless labor.

THE NEW PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION.

When Dean Stanley delivered his lectures on the "History of the Jewish Church," in Westminister Abbey in the seventies it was the first effort of English scholarship to interpret the results of historical and literary criticism to an English public. In Germany and France these researches had been going on quietly far a half century. Ewald's five volume "History of the Hebrews" was the formal setting forth of the newer view of Israel's religious mission. But when Stanley, freshly returned from his studies in Germany and his fascinating journeys to Sinai and Palestine, organized his message into the eloquent addresses delivered in the Abbey, English hearers were more stirred by the beauty of the utterances than by the signifance of the new principles of interpretation involved.

Then came William Robertson Smith, and the bitter assaults which finally drove him from his professional work in Scotland, where he had courageously laid the foundations for the new biblical scholarship. But Smith, though unseated, still reached the world from his later position at Oxford in the scholarly messages which he embodied not only in his formal works, but in the articles which he contributed to the ninth edition of the "Encyclopedia Britannica." More than this, he lived to see his principles vindicated by a generation of scholars which included A. B. Davidson, Marcus Dods, James Stalker, George Adam Smith and Samuel R. Driver. The views for which Robertson Smith suffered as a martyr to the cause of truth have now received the approval of British and American scholarship in so complete and decisive a manner that controversy is now a thing of the past. And the man who has contributed more than any other to this desirable result is the late Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford, whose death was announced last week.

A THOROUGH PREPARATION.

Dr. Driver prepared himself for his work by painstaking and extensive studies in the field of Semitic languages. He mastered that fascinating literature then appearing from Babylonian mounds and Egyptian monuments. These he brought to bear upon the Hebrew text of the Old Testament in a day when the massoretic readings were becoming unsatisfactory and scholarship was attempting to reconstruct on a more competent foundation the text of the Hebrew Bible. One of his earliest productions was "The Hebrew Tenses," a book that has not been surpassed in its special field. Later he still employed his scholarly abilities in a work on "The Hebrew Text of the Books of Samuel," which he has several times revised and offered in new editions, and which still remains the standard work on the subject. His researches in archeology yielded a volume written by himself and others on the archeological significance of the Old Testament. Like Stanley before him he traveled extensively in Bible lands, notably in one season when he visited the Sinai Peninsula and most of the interesting places in Palestine in company with his friend, Canon Cheyne. No two men could have been more unlike in their views and personal characteristics. Cheyne was the restless, nervous, radical, who changed Scripture to meet his philological views or his geographical conjectures. Driver was the calm, quiet, patient observer, who brought all things to the test of tried criteria and carried his public by the weight of convincing evidence. Yet these two men, so different in personal qualities, made their journey through the lands of the Bible, as their dragoman has told me, with the warmest good fellowship and the deepest mutual affection.

THE OLD TESTAMENT REVISION.

Of that distinguished company of English scholars who performed the memorable service of revising the Old Testament, Dr. Driver was chief. In association with two American scholars, Professors Brown and Briggs, he carried through the most important lexical enterprise ever undertaken in the field of Semitic scholarship, the now familiar "Hebrew Dictionary." With Professors Briggs and Salmond he was editor of the two great series of religious text books, the International Theological Library, and The International Critical Commentary. But he is probably best known as the author of "The Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament," the earliest volume of the first of those two great series, a volume which has passed through many editions, and has become the standard work of its kind. He contributed to the "International Critical Commentary" the splendid volume on "Deuteronomy," an unanswerable vindication of the critical reconstruction of early Old Testament history, on the lines once fiercely combated but now almost universally accepted. Of almost equal value, but more popular in quality, was the volume on "Genesis" in the Westminster Series. This placed at the disposal of the student all the informing and relevant literature which Babylonian scholarship has contributed to the study of the opening book of the Old Testament.

Perhaps one of the most pleasing works that came from Dr. Driver's pen was his delightful little work on "Isaiah: his Life and Times," in the "Men of the Bible Series." This volume deals with the prophets of the Book of Isaiah in a thoroughly competent way. It points out the reasons for assigning only the first thirty-nine chapters to the son of Amoz. But the narrative is easy and flowing, and has all the charm of a biography. When one remembers that during all these tireless years of scholarly work Driver was writing in the leading magazines of Great Britain and the Continent, was contributing a long llist of signed articles to such works of reference as "Hastings Bible Dictionary" and "The Encyclopedia Biblica," and was at the same time a minister of the Church of England in orders preaching frequently to large audiences both at Oxford and in London, some idea can be gained of his inexhaustible interest and his tireless labors.

The chief reasons why the critical views advanced by Dr. Driver have gained such wide, such almost universal acceptance in the world of scholarship is because, first, of their cogent and convincing character, and, secondly, the straightforward, modest, uncontroversial fashion in which he recorded them. Himself the object of bitter and vituperative attacks as an infidel, an agnostic, a subverter of Scripture and an enemy of the Christian faith, he went quietly about his work, conscious of the solid foundations on which he was building, and confident that the early future would completely vindicate his contention. He disliked controversy, and was rarely betrayed into it even by the most mordant attacks. He knew best that truth is its own vindication, and he cared only for that truth which is the heart of Holy Scripture and the secret of the redemptive work of Christ.

And now he rests from his labors and his works follow him. His intellectual children are a great host, and his monument is a generation of enlightened and satisfied Bible students, who have learned from him to know the truth, and by the truth have been made free.

SHALL WE BREED OR IMPORT?

Prof. Edward A. Ross, in Century.

Very truly says Prof. Wilcox, in praise of immigration: "The cost of rearing children in the United States is rapidly rising. In many, perhaps in most cases, it is simpler, speedier and cheaper to import labor than to breed it." In like vein it is said that "a healthy immigrant lad of eighteen is a clear $1.000 added to the national wealth of the United States."

Just so. "The Roman world was laughing when it died." Any couple or any people that does not feel it has anything to transmit to its children may well reason in such fashion. A couple may reflect, "It is simpler, speedier and cheaper for us to adopt orphans than to produce children of our own." A nation may reason, "Why burden ourselves with the rearing of children? Let them perish in the womb of time. The immigrants will keep up the population." A people that has no more respect for its ancestors and no more pride of race than this, deserves the extinction that surely awaits it.

Of Human Interest

Helen Keller and Bishop Brooks.

Kansas City had an interesting experience the other day when one of its organizations was permitted not only to hear Helen Keller address its members, but submit to a varied cross-examination. An exchange writes that two of her answers will be received with interest. Here is the first:

"Did you have any conception of God before Phillips Brooks took up your religious training?"

"Oh, yes! I already knew his love. Bishop Brooks taught me more fully to understand that God is love and not the personification of evil."

But here is one that will startle a good many into fresh recollection of Professor Rauschenbusch's words, that the way to modern martyrdom is through the espousal of Christ's social teachings:

"What have you done that required the greatest courage on your part?"

"Casting my lot with the workers of the world."

As most of our readers doubtless know, Miss Keller is an intense Socialist. That in the quiet and solitude of her blindness she should have so entered into the world's toil and thought herself through to advanced solutions is suggestive enough, but that the result, amid those same conditions, should have brought to her consciousness the modern distrust and often disapproval is indeed significant.

Judge Lindsey Tells Touching Story.

Judge Lindsey tells a striking incident of a little fellow who was before his court, and was many, many times admonished about truancy from school. The teacher kept writing, however, that nothing had been accomplished and that Tim seemed bound to work and to let school go. One day in reproving him, the judge said, "Now Tim, there will be time enough to work when you are a man." The boy replied like a flash, "My father was a man. and he didn't work. He went off and left mother and me, and I guess that's what killed her, too." Finally, after breaking every instruction, Tim appeared in court one day with a changed expression, his face ablaze with satisfaction. Walking up to the judge, he pulled from his pocket a dirty piece of paper, all crumpled up, and handed it up for inspection, saying, "I'm going to remember all the things you have told me now, judge, and I am going to school regular now, for I've got that job all done." Judge Lindsey unrolled the paper and found it to be a receipted bill, and discovered that little by little poor Tim had actually paid with pennies and nickles, fifty dollars for a headstone for his mother's grave. "My boy, is that what you have been doing while you have been missing school so much?" said the judge; and Tim answered as he wiped the tears from his dirty little face, "I wanted her to have a monument, too, judge, like the others had. She's done a lot for me; that's all I could do for her now."

The Crafty Carnegie.

Andrew Carnegie started with a one-horse blast furnace outfit and built up the greatest steel business in the world. Shrewdness, that peculiar trait prominent in so many of his countrymen, played the important part of that great achievement. Later he sold out his business to the steel trust for the sum of $300,000,000, stipulating that $100,000,000 should be cash and $200,000,000 in first mortgage 5 per cent bonds; that the bonds should be guaranteed against any future state or national tax. Again that shrewd foresight. Now comes the so-called income tax; but instead of Mr. Carnegie contributing on the income of those $200,000,000 bonds, the government will have to look to the United States Steel Corporation.

The old ironmaster uses the same methods in his present vocation of giving away money as he did In the early days of accumulation. He makes sure that each contribution is going to serve a proper cause, whether it be $10 or $10,000,000.

Some time ago a delegation from a small church in a Pennsylvania town, where Carnegie once lived, called upon the philanthropist.

"Mr. Carnegie," said the chairman, "we have come to ask your help in the purchase of a pipe organ. We need it badly, and, knowing that you once attended our church, thought possibly you would be interested."

"How much do you want?" asked Carnegie.

"Well," answered the chairman, "we have figured on $20,000."

"Go back and raise $10,000 and I'll talk with you," commanded the old fellow.

A month or so later the delegation returned and with a twinkle in his eye the chairman explained that the $10,000 was in hand.

"Well," said Carnegie, "that's enough for any organ. I'll not contribute a cent."

Lincoln as Law Examiner.

I have often heard my husband tell of his examination by Mr. Lincoln for admission to the bar, writes a contributor in The Continent. Mr. Lincoln came into the office where the young aspirant for legal honors sat trembling and asked, "Chris, which way does the Mississippi run?" Receiving the stereotyped reply, he concluded: "I consider you qualified to practice law in the state of Illinois. Go set up the boys." The said "set up" consisted of a supper of cove oysters, as no fresh bivalves could be had in this inland town in that day of slow transit. In justification of both Mr. Lincoln as a law examiner appointed for that year and my husband's legal knowledge, I will add that he was a student in the office of Mr. Lincoln, who doubtless knew of his fitness.

The Really Important Thing.

Mr. William Howard Taft, who was always a good natured observer of his fellow human's foibles, from time to time remarks the singularity of things as they fall out in this vale of tears. The idea is not to be entertained that Mr. Taft even chides, much less rebukes or censures. He merely observes, remarks, and passes on, amiable even if bewildered, observes an editorial in the Chicago Post.

At a banquet of Yale graduates in Albany Mr. Taft came to one of his contemplative pauses. With smiling good humor he said that he had "expected to electrify the country" with an address on the Monroe doctrine recently in New York. Persons who understand Mr. Taft —and who does not?—know that the exaggeration of expected effect was in truth a sly chastisement of his never clamorous ego, and will here parenthesis ("Chuckles") before the quotation proceeds:

"I gave out copies of my speech in advance to the newspaper men"—proceeding—"and then, as a man will who hasn't met any of the Washington correspondents for six months, I told them how good I felt and how I had reduced my avoirdupois. Next day I found my speech on the Monroe doctrine tucked away on the last page of the newspapers and had a hard job to find it. But full particulars about my anatomy were on column one of the first page."

Booker T. Washington's Story.

In the struggling days at Tuskogee Booker T. Washington found that he would have to use an old chicken house for a schoolroom.

"Uncle," he said to an old colored man, "I want you to come down at 9 o'clock tomorrow morning and help me clean out a hen house."

"Law, now, Mr. Washington," the old man expostulated, "you-all don't want to begin cleanin' out no henhouse round' yere in de daytime."

John P. St. John "Comes Back."

At the age of 81, John P. St. John is again on the stump for prohibition. He has been hanged in effigy more than one hundred times. His birthday was celebrated in Olathe, Kas., a few days ago, Hon. Leslie J. Lyons, ex-United States district attorney, making a tender speech on the veteran's influence on him. Mr. St. John is speaking in Pennsylvania, New York and Massachusetts.

The World is Growing Better

Manufacturers for Church Unity.

The Yellow Pine Manufacturers' Association, including lumbermen of the lower Mississippi states, through its Welfare Committee, in its recent annual convention held in New Orleans, urged that every company ought to co-operate definitely with organized church, young people's and Sunday-school interests. Resolutions adopted also appealed to the various denominations to supply lumber towns and lumber camps with the highest grade of preachers obtainable, and pledged the corporations interested to support local churches in such a way as to make possible for all of them to employ strong ministers. An appeal was also made by the lumber interests that the church leaders unify their work in lumber camps and eliminate unnecessary duplication of church organizations in small towns.

Western Union Profit Sharing.

The Western Union Telegraph Company has adopted a profit-sharing plan to benefit the employes. They are offering to all their workers a limited share of the company's stock. The company was forced to sell some of its stock, which was held by the American Telephone and Telegraph, because of the dissolution of the two companies brought about by the government. The Western Union decided to offer the stock to their employes rather than to outsiders. The workers are given an option of paying cash, or paying for the stock in twenty-four monthly installments. The company stipulates that the employes shall not speculate.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

MR. LINCOLN AND CHILDREN.

Abraham Lincoln was singularly indulgent to his children, writes a contributor in The Continent. I have often heard my father, who played chess frequently with Mr. Lincoln, predict some bad ending for Tad. He said the boy would come into his father's office at dinner time, while Mr. Lincoln and he were in the midst of an exciting game of chess, and insist on his father's going home. After he had been put off a few times by the plea, "In a minute, sonny," the young man would knock up the board, scattering kings, queens, castles, knights and pawns on the floor to my father's intense disgust. But Mr. Lincoln would only laugh and, taking the little lad on his back and holding his legs fast, start off home with the gentle reproof: "Taddie mustn't do that again."

An instance of Mr. Lincoln's kind thoughtfulness for children occurred in my own family circle during the wedding of an aunt. My little twin brothers, who had been given into my care lest they should soil their immaculate white suits ere the arrival of the guests, were quite forgotten amid the excitement of the bride's arrival. Suddenly, during the hush that preceded the ceremony, my conscience cried, "Where are the boys? They won't see a thing!" and no one can realize the relief to my youthful heart when I saw the two rosy faces smiling down upon the crowd from the vantage of Mr. Lincoln's arms. The little sister forgot, but Mr. Lincoln was there.

A MEMORY OF JENNIE LIND.

In 1834, writes an early pioneer, my father moved from New Hampshire to a little Canadian settlement on the stage road halfway between Waterloo and Montreal. There he set up an inn for the convenience of the traveling public, who wished to break the tiresome journey by stage. There had been a distillery on the place, but, true to his principles, father promptly destroyed it, and had his sign painted "The Temperance Inn," so that no one might mistake the character of the place.

Our nearest neighbors were French people, who had no children; but there were six of us, so we did not get lonesome. The daily arrival of the stage never ceased to be exciting. Then there were other travelers in chaise and on horseback, and once a year a caravan of animals passed through. Think of six children having a whole menagerie to themselves! We enjoyed the elephants especially. There was a lake a little way from our house where the men took them to bathe. It was great sport to watch the big animals squirt water over one another with their trunks.

Our house would look very bare in these days of palatial hotels. There were no carpets on the floors, but Irish Norah, the maid, kept them immaculately clean by daily scrubbings. On extra occasions our mother would sprinkle sand over the floor of the reception room in intricate patterns, and then woe betide the youngster who ventured in to disturb the work of art!

One day there was the stir of preparation that always preceded the arrival of a special guest, whose coming had been previously announced. We asked no questions, for in those days children did not inquire into the doings of their elders, but we stationed ourselves where we could command a good view of the passengers as they left the stage. Imagine our disappointment when only two or three men and a very plainly dressed woman got out of the stage. The woman wore a veil, so we could not see her face; but her clothing looked rather shabby, so we ran into the kitchen to tell Norah that no one of any account had come. Norah was not in sight, but presently she bustled in, very much excited.

"If you childer want to see the greatest singer in the world," she said, "jist pape in the dining room at the end of the table be your fayther."

We "paped," and there sat our plainly dressed traveler. She had a sweet face, but we could not understand why "the greatest singer in the world" should wear an old black dress with patches at the elbow (I saw them myself). As we pushed and scuffled in our eagerness to see her, the door swung wide open, to our great confusion. My father shook his head at us, but the lady laughed. As we beat a hasty retreat, I saw that she was speaking to him.

We felt that we were great offenders, and when father came out into the kitchen a few minutes later, we expected a reprimand. But he only said, "You children may go into the parlor for awhile. Miss Lind wants to see you."

It was a very bashful company that filed into the room. The great singer sat in a low rocking-chair by the fireplace, and as we entered, beckoned to us to come to her. I was the smallest of the group, so she lifted me up to her lap, and then she began to sing to us. I wish that I could remember what she sang, but we knew nothing about songs or music, and could only feel the beauty of the tender voice and the charm of the woman herself. I am sure Jenny Lind never sang to a more appreciative audience, or left a sweeter memory behind her.

ETHELBERT NEVIN'S PHILOSOPHY.

Everybody knows Ethelbert Nevin's setting of "The Rosary," of which music Madame Schumann-Heink wrote: "Notice the composer's phrase, how it slips along in the eighth notes, just as the small beads would slip through our fingers. And at the end of every such phrase comes a long note and a pause. This is repeated over and over after the manner of the pious devotees of the rosary."

Nevin is dead. Vance Thompson has written Nevin's life. It is the picture of a man who carried over into advancing years the child heart, simple, profound, smiling, even in his sorrows. He quotes something that Nevin himself wrote. It is the artist's analysis of life:

"Isn't this life of ours a strange, strange thing? How we live to learn and after all how little we know! . . . We come into this lovely world and for a few years we are between a flower and a fruit. We grow, blossom, and our lives are as pleasant as a day in June. Then come our first little trials, our first loves and . . . the thirst for knowing and to be known. Thereon we live, work, are strong, weak, happy or sad. Bitter experience comes and suddenly our eyes are open to the fact that there are innumerable little clouds that we have never noticed before. And if we continue to gaze and gaze at them, they grow and grow until we could almost believe that there was no sun. Oh, if we could only see a little further! . . .

"After all, what can be a greater blessing than to be born into this lovely world —to see the trees, the flowers, to be near those we love, to be able to work, to study, to grow, always seeing the roads become clearer? Then the keen joy of battling with and conquering self; the still greater joy of conferring happiness upon another. Yes, love rules the world."

Thus the singer of songs, the one who through his art as composer interpreted life, looked abroad on this complex existence, and found it good because he measured the transfiguring power of love.

Grant W. Speer Goes Abroad.

Grant W. Speer, pastor at Central Church, Toledo, O., sailed last week for a three months' tour of the Holy Land, and various European and Oriental countries. The expense of the trip is to be borne by the members of Mr. Speer's church. They say that after preaching continuously for twenty-five years, he is entitled to an extended vacation for research and recreation. Mr. Speer was ordained to the ministry twenty-five years ago. Since then he has preached every Sunday, except two, missing one Sunday on account of sickness and one because of an accident three years ago. Since Mr. Speer became pastor of Central Church seven years ago the membership has more than doubled, the debt has been removed from the church property, many improvements have been made including a new pipe organ, and the Sunday-school has more than doubled in attendance.

Aetna Road, Cleveland, Prospers.

The congregation of Aetna Road Church, Cleveland, O., held a farewell service in the old building, March 15, in anticipation of moving into the new structure. F. D. Butchart, for ten years pastor of this church, reports that the new building will contain a gymnasium and club rooms which will enable him to better direct the community work which he has been striving to carry on with limited facilities. Aetna Road Church was organized twenty-five years ago and has added more than one thousand members since then. The new building will not be ready for occupancy until April 19.

Pastor Praised by Newspaper.

The Akron Times has this to say of the work of L. N. D. Wells, of that city: "The recent action of the High Street Church of Christ in raising the salary of Mr. L. N. D. Wells to $3,000, is not only an honorable recognition of the worth of a good man, but it confers honor also upon the congregation. The work accomplished by Mr. Wells has been unique in the history of our local religious life. He has taken a down-town church where all the odds were against him, and by judicious advertising and forceful preaching, has more than held his own in open competition with the movies and theatrical attractions of the down-town district. To place religion at the front in such a competition constitutes a marked achievement. At the same time Mr. Wells has led his congregation in charitable and missionary giving, until it probably leads the churches of the city."

Growth at East Dallas, Texas.

To take care of the great growth of the Sunday-school, the East Dallas (Tex.) church will begin at once the erection of a commodious annex to the present structure. The annex will have a capacity of 600 people and will be equipped to serve in the social center work, which this church is planning to start in the near future. The annex will cost $5,000, will be about 40x40 feet in size and will have a basement equipped with gymnasium paraphernalia and shower baths. Dr. John G. Slayter, pastor of the church, has led the enterprising congregation to remarkable accomplishments during the past few months. Less than two years ago—May 1, 1912—the present handsome edifice was dedicated.

C. M. Chilton and "Men and Millions."

At a recent morning service of First Church, St. Joseph, Mo., C. M. Chilton, the pastor, surprised his congregation by announcing that he had received a call from the promoters of the Men and Millions movement to assist in the great campaign in the interest of missions and other activites of the church. Dr. Chilton stated that he had not yet accepted the call to this work, and he said he had not made a decision as to whether he would accept or decline. "I want you to help me decide it," he said to the members of his congregation. "I have been pastor of this church sixten years, and am just entering upon the seventeenth year. Sometimes preachers stay with a church too long and I wouldn't remain here one minute too long, if I knew it."

Discussing "The Perils of the City."

"A continental Sunday would spell the doom of religion in the United States," said Walter Scott Priest, pastor of First church, Wichita, Kan., in a sermon on "The Perils of a Godless Sunday." Referring to Sun-

Rev. J. R. Ewers, who is planning to build a six story church building in Pittsburg.

day baseball the speaker said: "Aside from the moral involved I think it would pay the Wichita Baseball Association to do away with Sunday games. I think every Christian fan in the city would boost for a half-holiday on Saturday for every one and I think they could bring it about if Sunday games were abolished." Mr. Priest is preaching a series of sermons on "The Perils of the City."

County Organizes for Cooperation.

To bring about closer affiliation of the churches of the county of which South Bend is the county seat, it is planned to hold quarterly meetings and to form a board by means of which county business will be transacted. The board will be composed of a delegate from every 100 members in a congregation together with the pastors. A recent meeting of the county's churches was addressed by G. W. Hemry, of First Church, South Bend. This church has voted to replace Ray Eldred, its missionary, who was drowned on the Congo.

Banquet at Bloomington, Ill.

A notable banquet was held in First Church, Bloomington, Ill., on Monday evening, March 9. The new departmental rooms were thrown together and used for this purpose for the first time. Three hundred were in attendance and the enthusiasm was high. Toasts were responded to by D. C. Smith of Normal, who spoke on "A Man Without a Home"; J. Dickey Templeton, of Bloomington Second Presbyterian Church, on "A Man Without a Country;" Jas H. Shaw, of Park M. E. Church, spoke on "A Man Without a Church"; and S. H. Zendt, pastor Second Christian Church, on "A Man Without a Job." The quartet-choir of First Church rendered special music and the pastor, Edgar DeWitt Jones, was toastmaster.

Central Illinois Ministerial Institute.

"One of the finest programs ever given in the state," is the way George W. Wise, vice-president of the Institute, describes the program of the coming Annual Session of the Central Illinois Christian Ministerial Institute, April 8-10, at Eureka, Ill. Among the addresses are the following: "The Minister as a Preacher," by H. A. Denton; "The Minister as a Shepherd," by S. E. Fisher; "The Preacher as Man of God," by A. McLean; "Preaching to the Conscience," by A. McLean; "Books Found Helpful," by W. W. Denham; "Ministerial Courtesy," by J. S. Barnett; "The Minister Renewing Himself," by V. W. Blair; 'The Minister and Our College," by Pres. H. O. Pritchard; "The Minister as a Spiritual Leader," by Clyde Darsie; "Power in the Pulpit," by A. McLean; "Joy in the Ministry,' by A. McLean; "Helpful Books," by G. W. Wise; "The Minister as a Church Builder," by Edgar D. Jones; "The Perils of the Ministry," by W. H. Cannon; "The Challenge of the Church to Men of Today,' by S. H. Zendt; "The Rural Church, a Problem and an Opportunity," by R. B. Doan; "Vitalizing the Rural Church,' by M. B. McNutt; "Modern Methods in the Country Church," by M. B. McNutt. Discussions and Devotional services are to be led by most capable men. The sessions will meet at the Christian Church, Eureka.

Dr. Medbury on Church-Going.

In a plea for regular attendance, Dr. Charles S. Medbury recently preached on the text, "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord." In the midst of this appeal, the speaker pointed out the error in a too prevalent notion. "Surface thinkers and writers are constantly striving to gauge the place and power of the church by those who happen to attend the services upon a given Lord's day. Neither its place nor its power can be gauged in this way. What it is in the world cannot be determined by the crowds that go in but must be determined rather by the number and type of workers that go out through its gates—the workers who are the inspirational factors of our present civilization. On this happy day, therefore, the church proudly holds aloft the banners of Christ. It does not come with 'poor face' begging gifts nor with pitiful devices pleading "please turn in to us.' It does not come with concession to sin that it may win the mighty nor with compromised commandments of God that it may secure the support of the worldly wise or proud. Rather does it dare to come—institution of God that it is—crying to a complacent and luxurious age the stern, strong message of the Master's herald of the long ago, 'Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.'"

Sermons on Six Greatest Bible Men.

George Darsie, of Central Church, Terre Haute, is preaching a series of sermons on the six greatest men of the Bible. He has not named his list, but will leave that for awhile to the curiosity of his audiences. His first sermon dealt with Abraham. Of him he said in part: "One of two things makes a man great. Either he must be a man of personal force and might, or he must leave behind him great results in the world. Both of these were combined in Abraham. Physically, mentally, spiritually, he was a giant. Though he lived 4,000 years ago, though utterly without anything like our modern culture, though he probably could not read or write, yet if you were able now to bring him back to the world just as he was and set him down in the midst of Boston culture itself, I think he would be universally hailed and regarded as a great man. But great as he was in personal force he was far greater in the work he did and the results he left in the world. Judged by results, he was undoubtedly the greatest man who ever lived. His life affects more people in our day than the life of any other man. He is the spiritual father of the Jews, Mohammedans and Christians in their warfare against idolatry. He is the spiritual progenitor of all nations, tribes and peoples who acknowledge a personal God as the supreme ruler of the universe."

A Remarkable Sunday-school Class.

The Philo-Christos, of Central Church, Des Moines, were long-ago famous. The most recent event of this class's history is the celebration of its seventeenth anniversary, on March 16. On this occasion, Judge Horace

E. Deemer was the guest of honor. He spoke on the theme, "The New Old World." Other addresses were made by Finis Idleman and Col. D. J. Palmer. There were several toasts, and music was furnished by a male quartet. The Philo-Christo class has had an unusual history. It was started Jan. 17, 1897, with three members. There has been no break in its continuity. It was originally known as class No. 23, but was changed to Philo-Christo. The highest attendance at one session was 252. It has always had one teacher. More than 2,500 young men have been members of this organization. It contributes to missions, maintains a hospital and benevolent committee, helps men secure work, has boys of three high schools in its membership, and practically all of the colleges of the city are represented among its members.

Freeport Pastor Pleads for Church.

"Whenever the church is found under fire, in the language of my youth, 'there's a negro in the woodpile!'" said E. T. Cornelius, pastor of the church at Freeport, Ill., in a recent sermon on "The Church Under Fire." He was referring to the ordinance adopted by the city council of Freeport, by the terms of which the erection of churches in the residence districts is prohibited, except where the consent of property owners in a considerable area surrounding the proposed church site is first obtained. "We are puzzling ourselves to know why the administration can allow a saloon in the residence section of our city under the protest of the people of the community, bearing the stamp of the approval of the administration, and yet refuse to allow a church that is as quiet and orderly as any church in the city to use property it has purchased for the legitimate worship of God and the preaching of the gospel." The Freeport congregation is being halted by the saloon forces in its efforts to erect a new building on a certain prominent site in the city.

Death of Judge Joe Chinn.

On March 4, in Lexington, Mo., a long time faithful member of the Christian Church died in the person of Judge Joe Chinn. As is related by Haley in his "Dawn of the Reformation," he was the son of Dr. Joseph G. Chinn, who was a pioneer in the Christian Church. Dr. Chinn was, in 1844, the organizer and the first superintendent of the Sunday-school of the Lexington Christian Church, which is one of the oldest in the Brotherhood. Judge Chinn also, who lived to the green old age of 91, was a life-time member and supporter of that church. He leaves behind a wife and three granddaughters who are active members of the church and one of whom is the wife of Richard Gentry, pastor of the Winfield, Kan. Christian Church.

Preacher Discusses "Damaged Goods."

E. F. Daugherty, pastor at Vincennes, Ind., began a series of Sunday evening addresses on "Notable Fiction and Out-Working Problems," with a discussion of the Brieux-Sinclair play, "Damaged Goods." He made a very plain application of the principles laid down in this remarkable play to local conditions at Vincennes. Regarding sex instruction, he had this to say:

"There are but three institutions fundamental in the life of a free and enlightened people, and they are the home, the school, and the church; if these three will discharge with conscience their obligations to their members the residue of our population can be reached and affected by the institutions subsidiary to the three—and supplemental in their human service—such as the lecture platform organization, the reform organization and the legislative movement. There's no way for evil's overcoming than by and with the things that are good; and the parents who keep their children's minds and lives heaped full of good, the schools which link righteousness with knowledge, the church which ties up the kingdoms of earth with the kingdom of heaven—these three share the delicate, yet ponderous responsibility for sex instruction, and the greatest of the three is the home. For, from out of the home came the church, from out the church the school, and as the elemental facts of sex arise in the home, the church and the school do no fitter service for the world than insist with clarion call that the home be made alert to the consequential nature of the responsibility."

T. W. Pinkerton Leaves Kenton, O.

T. W. Pinkerton closes his work with the church at Kenton, O., this month, and will go to Seattle. He has enjoyed a long and successful ministry in Kenton, extending all told over more than twenty years, in two periods of residence.

Edgar DeWitt Jones Speaks at Pittsburg.

Edgar DeWitt Jones, of Bloomington, Ill., who is in special meetings with Bellevue (Pittsburg) Christian Church, addressed the Disciples Ministerial Association of Greater Pittsburg, Monday, March 16, on "The Ancient Gospel in Modern Fiction." The same evening he spoke for a men's banquet in the new church edifice at Somerset.

In a sermon on "Who Should Control Our City, Law or Outlaw?" at the Wabash avenue Church, Kansas City, Mo., L. J. Marshall, bitterly arraigned the political management of Kansas City, declared conditions to be unbearable and asserted that he would not be true to his calling if he stood indifferent while politicians connived to sacrifice deceny and efficiency or personal aggrandizement. "I am a Democrat," he said, "and expect to remain one. Democracy stands for an ideal. But it doesn't stand for what we are having in Kansas City today."

"Civilized Christians bedecked with jewels are worse than the heathens of foreign countries who wear ornaments on their fingers and toes," declared Finis Idleman of the Central Church, Des Moines, in a sermon on "Our Common Need of God." "We Americans have been too busy making money in this country. We have tilled the soil, spanned the rivers, tunneled the mountains and opened the mines. In doing so we got gold, but lost our conscience."

W. S. Lockhart, pastor at Central Church, Houston, Tex., is preaching a series of sermons on the divorce question. The first sermon treated "The Church and Divorce," in which he discussed the progress being made in the church to suppress the evil, and in which he paid his respects to the "quack preacher." The second theme was "The State and Divorce," in which the "quack lawyer" was discussed, and the third will be "The Home and Divorce."

The following is a part of the will of W. H. Dulaney, who recently died at Hannibal, Mo.: "I give and bequeath to the official board of elders and deacons of the First Christian church of Hannibal, the congregation of which now worship in their stone church on the south side of Broadway above Tenth street, the sum of three thousand dollars."

If the plans of John Ray Ewers, pastor of the East End Church, Pittsburgh, are realized, that city will soon boast of a six-story church building, which would not only contain the usual auditorium and rooms, but also provide a roof garden, gymnasium, club rooms and an employment agency for the use of the members of its congregation.

The Brotherhood of First Church, Maryville, Mo., under the leadership of R. L. Finch, pastor, has invited the brotherhoods of the various city churches to enter into a joint organization. At a union service held for the purpose of cementing a bond of friendship between the brotherhoods, Charles A. Finch, of Topeka, spoke.

The poem beginning, "I go not where I will," credited on the editoral pages of The Christian Century to Dr. Washington Gladden, of Columbus, O., are not his work. He writes, "You do me too much honor. These verses are not mine. I do not know whose they are." Can any of our readers give us the author's name?

A. C. Downing, pastor of the Hillyard (Spokane) Christian Church, who was in the hospital for nearly a month, following a surgical operation, has so far recovered that he has been removed to his home. It will be several weeks before he will be able to resume his pastoral work.

In one of the services of the recent Vawter meeting at First Church, Topeka, Kans., C. R. L. Vawter spoke on "Obeying the Superintendent.' A quartet, composed of employes from the railroad shops sang, and the railroad men of the city attended in a body.

S. T. Willis, pastor of First Church, St. Paul, Minn., recently preached three sermons on "Who Are the Disciples of Christ and What Do They Stand For?" "Religious Position of the Disciples," and "The Distinctive Missions of the Disciples, a Providental People."

President R. H. Crossfield returned from a trip to the tropics last month, and has recently been giving lectures at Transylvania University, during the chapel period, on Cuba, Jamaica, Panama and Central America.

M. J. Grable, pastor of the Salem, O., church, addressed recently, at Alliance, the members of the Ministerial association of Alliance-Sebring, on "The Pastor and the Sunday School."

In a recent issue of this paper, Claris Yeuell was reported as having taken the pastorate at Salem, O. Mr. Yeuell writes that this is incorrect. Sabina, O., is his new home.

At a recent service, J. P. McKnight, pastor at Pasadena, Cal., read a long and interesting letter from Miss Emma A. Lyon, the living-link" of this church at Nanking, China.

R. W. Gentry, of Winfield, Kas., has been made platform manager of the Winfield Chautaqua asembly, one of the oldest and most important in the state.

W. C. Hull, recently of Pasadena, Calif., is supplying the pulpit of the Douglas Park Church in this city. The audiences are steadily growing.

L. G. Batman, pastor of First Church, Youngstown, O., recently addressed the Business Men's prayer meeting of the city Y. M. C. A.

J. H. O. Smith, pastor at First Church, Little Rock, Ark., has rented a downtown office in that city.

Easter and the National Benevolent Association

A QUARTER OF A CENTURY OF EASTER OBSERVANCE.

BEGINNING OF EASTER OBSERVANCE.

It is now almost a quarter of a century since the Bible schools of our Brotherhood began the practice of observing Easter in the interest of the widows and orphans under the care of the National Benevolent Association. When those who were charged with the responsibility of guiding this great ministry sought a day upon which to lay its claims upon the hearts of our people they found that every favorable season had already been taken by other great interests of the church. The only favorable opportunity that seemed to have been overlooked was Easter among the young people in our Bible-schools. Recognizing the rights of other interests in the days they had established and cultivated until they had become valuable sources of income, and being deeply interested in all of these great enterprises, the friends of the Association decided to content themselves, for the time at least, with an appeal to the Bible-schools at Easter. The young people responded promptly. The first year brought offerings from schools in twenty states. This hearty response to the first Easter call, coupled with the fact that a half dozen other interests were making annual appeals to the churches at the most favorable seasons of the year, and the fact that the Children's Day call of the Foreign Society was the only general interest that claimed the attention of our Bible-schools led the Association to adopt Easter in the Bible-schols as its one permanent offering day.

BUILDING EASTER.

Having found a place in the calendar of the churches' work where it could press its claims without fear of injury to any other feature of the work, the Association set to work to build up an interest in Easter as the day on which to especially answer the cry of the orphan. It at once began issuing a free program to be used by the Bible-schools in the observance of Easter. It established the custom of writing a personal Easter letter to each preacher and Bible-school superintendent. It created an abundant supply of high grade literature suitable to the season. It bore the expenses of preachers, who donated their services, in an effort to lead every Bible-school in the brotherhood into fellowship with Christ in His compassion upon the poor. While this Easter propaganda represents a considerable outlay on the part of the Association, the benefits to its work and the enlarged vision and spiritual uplift it has brought to our Bible-schools and churches has justified it a thousand times and lays the whole brotherhood under obligation to the Association.

THE EASTER OFFERING OUR DEPENDENCE.

With each year the number of schools that observe Easter for the benefit of the widow and the orphan increases. At first only a few could be relied upon for an offering each year. Now a large number of schools never fail to take an Easter offering. The feeding of the hungry and the clothing of the naked is an essential part of their program. They are now constant doers of the Word. Having the world's goods and seeing their brother in need, they are opening their compassion and proving to the world that the love of God abides in them.

At first the schools that took the Easter offering seemed to have little thought beyond that of answering a worthy call. Now they have a vision of the world's need of Christ's will and their own spiritual enrichment, and so they are seeking a larger part and a richer fellowship in the Gospel of the Helping Hand. They are trying to reach the prize of the mark of their high calling in Christ. As a result of this effort on the part of our Bible-schools in observing Easter in the exemplification of pure and undefiled religion, the Association has come to depend upon the Easter offering for the life of its work and the comfort of its great family of about six hundred persons. The growth of the response to the Easter appeal has led the Association to expand its work to its present magnificent proportions. The Association needs, and is confidently depending upon our Bible-schools for the greatest Easter offering in the history of its work. This confidence rests in the belief that having sown the seed of benevolent interest our Bible school workers will see that the Association and its dependent wards are given the benefits of the harvest; that having encouraged the Association through twenty-five years of Easter-giving, they will not fail to reward its confidence by a most liberal offering; that having, by sacrifice, built up a great work they will not permit it to suffer or fall into defeat just when it is rendering its greatest service to our Brotherhood and plea; that having welcomed to their hearts a family of eighty-five aged, indigent brethren and five hundred orphans and other unfortunate children, our Bible schools will not turn them out to die but that they will continue to provide for them in love through an Easter offering that will honor Christ.

THE N. B. A. LOYAL TO CHRIST AND THE CHURCH.

By Charles S. Medbury.

Our National Benevolent Association claims for the church what is its due and denies to secular orders and institutions the credit for a ministry which is distinctively Christian.

If every other motive were removed the motive here indicated should lead us to an increasingly generous support of our benevolent work. Let us be jealous for our Lord in this holy ministry. Without the suggestion of a war upon anyone or a reflection upon any institution, and without any other feeling than that of joy with regard to any service that has been rendered to the world's unfortunate and needy, it is yet to be remembered that benevolence is not of Masonic birth or of Odd Fellowship origin, but that it is of the heart of God. All praise may be given every man or institution that has lightened the load of the world's sorrow, and yet there should be reverent insistence upon the fact that the lessons of benevolence that prompt all our philanthropies have been interpreted fully in the world's great life by Him who is our supreme Helper and our Lord. In spite of all the blessings of it there is yet unmistakable sadness linking with Christ-like ministry done in another's name. There is tragedy when a boon is presented to the life of a child and he is not taught correctly from whom that boon comes. It is pitiful for such an one only to see the face of a man or to hear the name of an institution of men, when the Saviour of the world is back of the ministry and longs for the love of the one to whom His life is bringing blessings. Oh, what it would mean if the great body of men who are associated with the fraternal organizations of the world could only see that every bit of wealth and worth in all they are and all they do is out of Heaven's thought, and in the very best of their service they are only heeding the dictates of the pre-eminent, though oft unrecognized Friend of Man! And how glorious it would be if those who bear the name of Christ would do what they do, and all they do, only in that name! Then would He have praise from ten thousand times ten thousand lives who have been blessed by His spirit abroad in the world, but who do not realize for an hour where the credit of their blessings belongs.

A CHALLENGE.

It is to challenge us at such a point that our organization of National Benevolence stands. It cries aloud to us, "This is Christ's work, and when it is done it should be His name and He should have the credit." Every aged one whose pathway is made a pathway of peace should have eyes directed to Him who is the Prince of Peace. Every one healed should be brought face to face with the great Physician, and the children should never have obscured, for one moment of time, the face of Him who one day said,' "Of such is the Kingdom of heaven." There is place for the ministrations of the state in behalf of its more sorely afflicted. But we should struggle to have the states purely Christian in government and their ministra-

Easter for National Benevolent Association

Means Easter for Christ's Helpless Little Ones.

Baby Frances (motherless and deserted she was rescued by the N. B. A.)

The National Benevolent Association has for more than twenty years been the chosen medium through which increasing hundreds (and now thousands) of our Bible schools have ministered to the widow and the orphan in the name of the compassionate Christ.

These Easter offerings have made possible this great national enterprise with its twelve Homes in ten states and with its record of many thousands served. More than four thousand children have been placed in Christian Homes by the N. B. A.

The Easter offering is the main dependence of all the Association's wards for daily necessities. Without it, the Association could not possibly support them. Every Bible school among us should send an offering this Easter to the N. B. A.

The most excellent Easter exercise we have ever issued ("Loving in Deed and in Truth") is just off the presses. Order at once. It is free to schools that will send an offering.

tions therefore Christian. But beyond that which must perhaps unavoidably be handled by the state, there is a world of ministry in the lines of benevolence of which the church should be jealous that through it the Master may find honor. The footsteps of His people should be first at the bedside of the sick and the dying, the hands of His people should be first opened in help to the fallen, His people should build with eager joy the sweetest homes of faith and song and cheer for "little ones" of tender years of age, whose lives are being buffeted by the experience of passing days. And when God's people meet human needs this way, quickly, eagerly and with passionate joy, helping those about them for Christ's dear sake, there will cease to be the unbridged chasms between the church and certain classes of the world that still exist today.

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO NOTES.

The spring convocation was held on Tuesday, March 17. Dean J. R. Angel was the convocation orator, his subject being, "The University of Today.'

Among those who took degrees at the convocation was W. G. F. Chandler, who was made a master of arts in the Divinity School.

The rooms in the south end of South Divinity Hall are being vacated during the erection of the Classical Building, which is directly connected with South Divinity Hall, Ground was broken last week for the Geology Building, which is to be located immediately to the west of Walker Museum. The Noyes Woman's gymnasium, which will face the midway between the president's house and the School of Education, is soon to be started.

President and Mrs. Judson left Chicago on the day following convocation, for their six-months' journey in China, under the auspices of the Rockefeller Educational Commission.

On Tuesday evening of last week a dinner was held at Hutchinson Hall at which the trustees, faculty and students of the Divinity House, and the ministers of our churches in Chicago, were guests. The chief purpose of the gathering was to mark the completion of the fifty-thousand dollar endowment fund which was recently announced. The speakers included Dean Mathews, of the Divinity School, Professors MacClintock, Sharpe and Ames, Loehr, Hamilton, and Geo. A. Campbell of Hannibal, Mo. Dean Willet presided. At the conclusion of the address, the plans of the proposed Divinity House group of three buildings were shown.

GOOD NEWS FROM THE MARCH OFFERING.

"The two Sundays in March have been wretched, but our offering in cash and pledges equivalent to $540. We had eighty-six new contributors this year and the most of those were new members. Sixty-five contributors last year are yet to report and will be in the line-up." Robt. N. Simpson, Harrodsburg, Ky.

The Pikeville, Ky., church is rejoicing in the fact that they have more than doubled their apportionment for foreign missions.

"I have labored hard to secure the best possible offering for our foreign mission work, and I am glad to report that the people responded better than I had hoped for. I wrote you some time ago that I would try to double our apportionment. I now enclose you a check for more than double the apportionment and I have pledges which make our total offering a few cents over one hundred dollars." M. J. Bradshaw, Ada, Ohio.

The Healdsburg, Cal., church sends more than four times their apportionment for foreign missions. We rejoice with them in this splendid victory.

The church at Milton, N. S., sends $105. They were apportioned $75. They are making a splendid increase in their offering each year.

The Lincoln Park Church, Tacoma, Wash., gives $94.10. Apportionment, $50. A splendid advance.

The church at Roachdale, Ind., far exceeds its apportionment. Brother T. H. Kuhn is the pastor.

The March offering at the Rocky Mount, N. C., church exceeds $35. Last year they gave $4.55.

THE DISCIPLES' CONGRESS.

As president of the Disciples' Congress which meets in Lexington, Ky., April 28-30, 1914, I wish to call the attention of the Brotherhood to the significance of this gathering and to urge the largest possible attendance.

The Congress is altogether unique among the gatherings of our people. It is the one opportunity given for a serious and perfectly frank discussion of questions of doctrine and practice among the Disciples and the world of theological thought. It stands for mental and spiritual quickening. Great and vital themes are presented reverently and critically. Speakers of well known ability are chosen to furnish a program which does not permit of either dullness or loose preparation. It is a coming together of those who believe that old truth has not been exhausted by past use or interpretation. It is a call to the watchmen of Zion to report on the new and fresh mornings which are ever dawning.

Lexington is peculiarly suited as a meeting place for the Congress. It is the home of students. It can furnish a great constituency. It is known for its open-hearted hospitality. The program will appear in The Christian Century next week.

Our preachers especially are invited to turn aside from the stress and strain of administration to bring themselves under the influence of those influences and impulses which will be generated at the Congress.

Let us make it mean something worth while for the advancement of the great cause and the great Master to whom we have sworn eternal allegiance. E. L. Powell.

THE JOURNEY TO EMMAUS.

INTERNATIONAL UNIFORM LESSON FOR APRIL 12.

Luke 24:13-35. Memory Verses, 31, 32.

Golden Text.—It is Christ Jesus that died, yea rather, that was raised from the dead.—Rom. 8: 34.

American Standard Bible.

Copyright, 1901 by Thomas Nelson & Sons.
(Used by permission.)

(13) And behold, two of them were going that very day to a village named Emmaus, which was threescore furlongs from Jerusalem. (14) And they communed with each other of all these things which had happened. (15) And it came to pass, while they communed and questioned together, that Jesus himself drew near, and went with them. (16) But their eyes were holden that they should not know him. (17) And he said unto them, What communications are these that ye have one with another, as ye walk? And they stood still, looking sad. (18) And one of them, named Cleopas, answering said unto him, Dost thou alone sojourn in Jerusalem and not know the things which are come to pass there in these days? (19) And he said unto them, What things? And they said unto him, The things concerning Jesus the Nazarene, who was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people: (20) and how the chief priests and our rulers delivered him up to be condemned to death, and crucified him. (21) But we hoped that it was he who should redeem Israel. Yea and besides all this, it is now the third day since these things came to pass. (22) Moreover certain women of our company amazed us, having been early at the tomb; (23) and when they found not his body, they came, saying, that they had also seen a vision of angels, who said that he was alive. (24) And certain of them that were with us went to the tomb, and found it even so as the women had said: but him they saw not. (25) And he said unto them, O, foolish men, and slow of heart to believe in all that the prophets have spoken! (26) Behooved it not the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory? (27) And beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself. (28) And they drew nigh unto the village, whither they were going: and he made as though he would go further. (29) And they constrained him, saying, Abide with us; for it is toward evening, and the day is now far spent. And he went in to abide with them. (30) And it came to pass, when he had sat down with them to meat, he took the bread and blessed; and breaking it he gave to them. (31) And their eyes were opened, and they knew him; and he vanished out of their sight. (32) And they said one to another, Was not our heart burning within us, while he spake to us in the way, while he opened to us the scriptures? (33) And they rose up that very hour, and returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them, (34) saying, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon. (35) And they rehearsed the things that happened in the way, and how he was known of them in the breaking of the bread.

v. 13. Two of them: Two of the larger group of followers. Three furlongs from Jerusalem: Seven miles and a half.

v. 14. Communed with each other: They were engaged in intense conversation regarding the marvelous happenings of those days.

v. 16. Their eyes were holden: Either because of their absorption in grief or because Jesus purposely rendered himself unrecognizable.

v. 18. Sojourn in Jerusalem: They doubtless supposed Jesus had overtaken them on his way from Jerusalem to Emmaus. And not know the things which are come to pass: The crucifixion must have been the chief subject of conversation among the thousands who had assembled in Jerusalem for the Feast of the Passover.

v. 19. What things: Jesus asks the question for the purpose of drawing them out.

v. 22. Moreover certain women, etc.: This passage indicates that they are burdened with the perplexities surrounding the report of the women.

v. 25-27. O foolish men: It is a kindly rebuke to them for having failed to grasp the significance of all that the prophets have spoken relative to the coming Messiah. Beginning from Moses: Jesus' familiarity with the scriptures is shown here.

v. 30. Took the bread and blessed: It was their custom to give thanks before each meal.

v. 32. And they knew him: They knew him as they had never known him before. He had been Jesus; he is now the Christ.

v. 33. That very hour: So overjoyed were they at this great finding that they could not postpone the announcement of their glad tidings.

At the Heart of the Lesson.

BY A. Z. CONRAD.

CONSOLATION AND COMPANIONSHIP.

The blow had fallen. The Cross had borne its fruit. Pilate's ablutions were followed by cowardly surrender to bigoted Zelotes. Jesus Christ was: "Crucified, dead, and buried." The fact of his death was made doubly certain by the insistence of his enemies. That he was entombed was placed beyond question. Ecclesiastical and civil authorities combined to make certain not only his entombment but the retention of his body in the tomb as well. The sealed stone and the living guard were the precaution taken to prevent deception or treachery of any kind. No important fact in the world's history is better accredited than the fact of the empty tomb on Sunday morning. The whole structure of Christianity from that moment on, rested upon that basal fact.

THE UNRECOGNIZED CHRIST.

Suffering instinctively calls for sympathy. Isolation is intolerable when grief is deep. The soul seeks companionship in its affliction. It was natural that two and not one should be travelling to Emmaus. A fact, or a series of facts so inexplicable as those that had transpired challenged the further inquiry of the disciples. Had they been deceived? Why were their expectations disappointed? Would there be any way out of it? Might it possibly be true that Jesus had risen from the dead? How much credit should they give to the message which they had already heard? Perplexity increased. Problems seemed to them insolvable. Cleopas and his companion are too absorbed in conversation to note the approach of a stranger until he had already caught the drift of their conversation. Their heart anguish invited Jesus to join them. He was called to them by their need. More than this. It was his opportunity to instruct. He must make the evidence of his resurrection unanswerable. The continuance of his Kingdom demanded it. He must give positive certainty that he had fulfilled his own prophesy concerning himself, and had come forth from the tomb. Jesus Christ is never far from any serious minded inquiry. The tears of his children immediately call him to their rescue. He well knew that the best way to instruct was to inquire. "While they communed and questioned together Jesus himself drew near and went with them." v. 15. "But their eyes were holden that they should not know him." v. 16. The moment had not arrived for Jesus to unveil himself and reveal his personality. He must first draw them out. He must prepare them for the revelation which was to come. How often in our sorrows or in our perplexities and confusion of mind is Jesus actually near to us seeking by providences and circumstances to draw us out and prepare us for some new expression of love to our souls.

THE HIGH PLACES OF REVELATION.

"And beginning from Moses and from all the prophets he interpreted to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." This is a notable verse. It settles forever the attitude of Jesus toward the Old Testament Scriptures. What a wonderful portrayal that must have been as he went from mountain peak to mountain peak of revelation! He doubtless began with the first promise, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." It is not difficult for us to imagine how he proceeded touching upon the relations of God with his people and upon the successive promises of redemption. We can well understand how he employed the great types of the Old Testament Scriptures, like the Passover, and how he employed the prophecies which foretold the method of redemption and the events which must succeed one another with reference to the person of the Messiah. He would picture the intervention of the angel when Abraham was about to offer up Isaac; the redemptive work of Moses; the significance of the throne of David; the meaning of the Babylonian captivity; the steps of preparation for the incarnation; the incarnation itself; his own ministry; his crucifixion in fulfillment of prophecy; the accomplished work of redemption. There was one fact particularly worthy of notice, they were acquainted with the Scripture, even though they were not familiar as they should have been with the complete correspondence between the prophecies, the coming of the Christ and the events which had just transpired. They knew their Bible enough to make it possible for him successfully to lead them to the very pinnacle of truth. Again, he revealed the fact that the vital element in the Bible is Jesus Christ himself. He interpreted to them "the things concerning himself." No Biblical interpretation which does not make Christ the center of all and the crown of all can possibly be correct. No man's word regarding the Bible is worth a moment's notice who has not sufficient spiritual vision to discover Jesus Christ in the Old Testament Scriptures. The Bible without Christ is not only a book inexplicable, but it is incredible and full of inconsistencies and contradictions. It is the person of Jesus Christ that gives to each and every part its true significance.

UNVEILED IN PRAYER.

"And it came to pass when he sat down with them to meat he took the bread and blessed it and brake it and gave it to them, and their eyes were opened and they knew him." Prayer is the greatest interpretation and self-disclosing act of the human soul. It seemed impossible to withhold the knowledge of himself when he prayed. There was an individuality about his communing with the Father that inevitably revealed his personality. His attitude, his expression, his evident oneness with the Father was so unmistakable that they instantly recognized that he was none other than their Lord. We are prepared to know Jesus through the study of the Holy Word. Familiarity with the Book of Revelation is our best preparation for a true knowledge of the Revelator. The disciples in communion are most likely to receive new manifestations of the risen Lord. It is an unhappy day for any church when it is unable to maintain a prayer-meeting. There is no greater confession of weakness in modern times than the abandonment of the hour of prayer and the substitution of lectures and addresses on all sorts of subjects in place of the witnessing for Jesus and the public expression of yearning desire at the throne of grace. No church is ever powerful spiritually that has no place for concerted prayer.

VANISHED.

The disappearance of Jesus finds explanation only in the change which had come in his body at the resurrection. He was not now held by any material limitation. His appearances and disappearances were independent of the ordinary restrictions of matter. Closed doors furnished no barriers to his entrance.

COMMUNION AND REVELATION.

"Were not our hearts burning within us while he talked with us in the way, while he opened unto us the Scripture?" This is the exclamation of the disciples when he had disappeared. Their confidence was in no wise shaken by his disappearance but rather increased. The flaming splendours of spiritual illumination are here set forth. It is contact with Jesus Christ that brings a glowing sense of satisfaction to the soul. No study is so rewarding as a study of the personal work of Jesus Christ. Nothing creates such enthusiasm in life or awakens such glad emotions as communion with him. He and He alone can light up the holy of holies in the heart. Here is the resurrection in personal experience. These disciples felt, and their feeling was testimony. The evidence was satisfying. From that moment they knew the Lord had risen. Not only is the resurrection a fact of history but it becomes a part of human experience through communion with the risen Christ.

TOPIC FOR APRIL 8.

The Pre-eminence of Christ. Heb. 1:1-14; Col. 1:16-20.

Religion is a matter of personal relation. "Religion for religion's sake" has no more meaning than "Right for right's sake," or "Art for art's sake." Art and morality and religion have their place in experience. They must be studied as aspects of life. Creeds and ceremonies are less important than persons in religion. Who is the great person in the history of religion? The Christian gives this pre-eminence to Jesus Christ.

THE HEAD OF THE CHURCH.

Again and again must Christian people turn to Christ for the correction of their ideas of worship and conduct. The church has ever been forward to declare what men ought to do. Does she speak the word of the Master? Or does she give expression to the ambitions of unspiritual and prejudiced men? In turning to Christ for enlightenment, we do not ask for specific directions for every detail of conduct; what we need is a conscience that will hold us in the right way. The church has power when she can make men feel that there is an eternal right and that this right grows out of man's relation to man and to the Eternal Goodness. When one faction threatens to disrupt a church if one kind of carpet is not bought and another promises trouble if another kind is not bought, it is easy to discover why the word of that church lacks power.

CHRIST AND THE BIBLE.

"All that I want the New Testament for," said Alexander Proctor, "is to show me how to believe in my creed. Christ is the creed of the heart; He is the creed of the soul; men believe in Him; and I want this gospel to show me how to believe in Him. * * * If I am sick and suffering and threatened with death, I send for a physician, and he sends me a book. He says, 'I know your case and here are the rules; if you go by these rules, it will cure you.' I do not want any book; I do not want any rules. I want some one that can just feel my pulse and diagnose my case, and get this disease out of me. And I know, when I am mortal and sinning and imperfect, I want some one that can help me, not tell me the doctrines of the church. I tell you, just like I tell the physician, I do not want your book; I want a helper." The book thus gets its importance from the person.

JESUS AND GOD.

"Neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him." Men have trusted Jesus because they have received him as the revelation of God. The most practical man, who believes in taking the world as he finds it, soon discovers that he cannot know himself unless he knows more than himself. The psychologist goes from the study of the individual to the study of society and then he has not answered all the questions that arise. As a scientist, he may be content to leave certain questions untouched; as a man, he is compelled sooner or later to get some sort of answer to them. He must turn theologian in spite of himself—rather, because he becomes himself. He may come to believe "Jesus Christ to be the revelation of the true meaning and the realization of the true destiny of every man; and that in Him, as the personal incarnation and reproduction of the personal God in our personal lives, we and the whole creation shall come into our divine inheritance." If God is the gracious being that Jesus reveals him to be, the interests of humanity will be protected now and forevermore. Browning writes:

"I say the acknowledgment of God in Christ,
Accepted by the reason, solves for thee
All questions in the earth and out of it."

The Educational Influence of the Bethany System of Sunday School Literature

WHEREVER the Bethany System is installed the Sunday School takes on a new ideal for itself. It gives up trying to inflate its attendance with contests, "fits and starts," and various superficial "boosting" campaigns, and settles down to the quieter and steadier and, after all, the more attractive, and certainly the most rewarding task of teaching religion to boys and girls and men and women.

"Christian Century Day"

Sunday, April 5, 1914

THE editorial and publishing departments are uniting to ask the 1500 ministers who read The Christian Century to speak to their congregations about the paper and to commend it to them on Sunday, April 5, or, if more convenient, on April 12. Without adding another burdensome "day" to the calendar, we have ventured to hope that this day might, in many churches, as a simple compliment, be designated "Christian Century Day" or "Publication Society Day." It is our desire that pastors make a personal effort to secure subscribers for The Christian Century, or at least appoint some capable worker to secure them and to represent the paper in the future. Our business office will be glad to pay such a representative a good commission on all new subscriptions received.

With the merits of The Christian Century our ministerial readers are already familiar; they can interpret the paper to their people as well as the editor could do it himself. But they will, we believe, find additional satisfaction in giving us this co-operation in view of the unselfish relation in which The Century now stands to our brotherhood. The Disciples Publication Society is not a private corporation but is organized precisely as our missionary societies are organized. We do not base any claim for patronage upon this fact of our being a "brotherhood" house. On the contrary we counsel churches and Sunday schools to purchase the best goods no matter who sells them. But the unselfish character of our organization relieves us of all embarrassment in asking the co-operation of our brethren. Whatever they do on behalf of The Christian Century is for the good of the churches and the cause of Christ, and not for the financial profit of any individuals.

We will gladly send sample copies of The Century to any pastor who will see that they are carefully distributed to his congregation. Or, if it is preferred, we will send small leaflets telling about The Christian Century, as many as any pastor will agree to distribute. These leaflets will give added point to his announcement.

Our lay readers also can render service at this time by calling the pastor's attention to this announcement and suggesting that he observe Christian Century Day, or at least speak a word on behalf of The Century to his congregation. It is a time, also, for every reader to say to his friends in the church: "I read The Christian Century. I like it. It helps me. It is worth many times what it costs. It is the very paper you should be taking. Let me have your subscription!"

We who are producing The Christian Century from week to week have in mind above every other thing the purpose to be of help to the pastor and to build up the local church. Every pastor will agree with us that every home into which this paper goes becomes thereby more responsive and more intelligently efficient in Christian work. We sincerely appreciate the co-operation of all our minister readers and hope they will send at once for leaflets or sample copies.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

HOW ?

A Department of Counsel on Sunday School Work

Conducted by

R. P. SHEPHERD, Ph. D.

"We are beginning a contest between our young men's and young women's classes. Please give us your best counsel as to how to make this contest most productive of best results."—Illinois.

Do you really want the best counsel of those who have had large experience with such contests? The practically unanimous opinion of those whose vision is efficiency before bulk is that contests between classes within a school rarely produce permanent good, that some hurt is almost sure to be done to some whom the contestants thought to help, that losers can never feel the same as before toward winners, that there is more danger of damage than of wholesome uplift.

If you like you may go a step farther and say that schools or churches fed on the artificial heat of periodic contests are almost sure to suffer a reaction, to feel that the ordinary routine of work is dull and lifeless, and that the Lord's work is identified with spurts of effort to excel someone else. It simply paralyzes people for a long, strong, steady pull for cultural efficiency.

About a year ago the writer was sharply criticised in a local church paper for his attitude toward Sunday-school contests. Where schools can be enlisted to compete for points of excellence, with no stakes up in the way of banquets or other prizes, and where the points are so fixed as to cover efficient work rather than mere numbers and collection, the results may be of permanent help to both schools. But contests framed up only on how many and how much are a perversion of the whole aim and purpose of the Sunday-school enterprise.

In your particular case, if you want our best counsel, Don't.

Easter for National Benevolent Association

Means Easter for Christ's Helpless Little Ones.

Baby Frances (motherless and deserted she was rescued by the N. B. A.)

The National Benevolent Association has for more than twenty years been the chosen medium through which increasing hundreds (and now thousands) of our Bible schools have ministered to the widow and the orphan in the name of the compassionate Christ.

These Easter offerings have made possible this great national enterprise with its twelve Homes in ten states and with its record of many thousands served. More than four thousand children have been placed in Christian Homes by the N. B. A.

The Easter offering is the main dependence of all the Association's wards for daily necessities. Without it, the Association could not possibly support them. Every Bible school among us should send an offering this Easter to the N. B. A.

The most excellent Easter exercise we have ever issued ("Loving in Deed and in Truth") is just off the presses. Order at once. It is free to schools that will send an offering.

Heralds of the Christ

The sending forth of the seventy is an incident in the life of our Lord recorded only by Luke. We seem to have come very near missing this fine little story of one of the Lord's evangelistic enterprises. The reason, I think, can be only this, namely, that the full program never was carried out. That is, our Lord never personally visited all the places to which these seventy disciples went forth. He sent them forth in pairs into the places whither He himself would have come had His ministry continued indefinitely. He sent them to the places into which He would have been glad to come if He had had time. Into some of these places He doubtless did come, but our knowledge of the last few months of His ministry makes it quite certain that He could not have undertaken any round of personal evangelistic visits at all commensurate with the preliminary journeys of thirty-five or thirty-six pairs of heralds. These advance agents could hardly have arranged for Him to visit more than a few villages east of the Jordan and the little town of Ephraim in Judea. As for the rest, their ministry stood by itself. The only evangelization which the Lord appears to have accomplished in a considerable majority of the villages to which the seventy must have gone, was through His personal ministry.

Did our Lord then lay out a larger plan than He was able to accomplish? Yes and no. So far as the larger meanings of His work are concerned the answer is in the negative. It was of the utmost importance that our Lord should test the ability of His disciples and of a considerable group outside of the apostolic twelve to go forth in His name and do his work and bring the tidings of His Kingdom.

Probably the number should read seventy-two. You will note in the margin that many of the old manuscripts so read it. But popularly they were spoken of as "the seventy." You remember the Old Testament was reputed to have been translated into Greek by seventy-two scholars; but these were called "the seventy" and the version they made, the version our Lord and His disciples used, was called "the Septuagint"—the version of the seventy. That was the version of the nations, of which, according to Jewish thinking, there were seventy, or seventy-two. There were twelve tribes of the Jews; the perfect number, seven, multiplied this to eighty-four, the total of the tribes of mankind. That left seventy-two for the rest of the world. The twelve apostles were chosen with distinct reference to the twelve tribes of Israel. But the seventy could have no other meaning than this, that, whether He lived to carry it out or not, our Lord's mission was to the whole world.

There is just one thing more to be said about it, and that is that the plan worked. It would have been possible to predict all kinds of failure for such an undertaking. We should have been inclined to say that it would have been impossible, in that stage of our Lord's ministry, to find seventy or seventy-two men who could have been trusted on such a mission. Half of them would never start, and half of those who did would give it up at once, and the remaining quarter would for the most part make a failure of the undertaking.

But it did work. Those meagerly trained men succeeded. They told the Gospel story in a way that was effective. The Lord rejoiced with a new joy. His whole mission to men depended on His finding people who could be trusted to go alone, or two by two, and proclaim the Christ. In their first success He saw Satan dethroned, and the Kingdom of God assured.

This is the way the Gospel still goes, and must go forward into the world.

Our Lord still sends His disciples into every city and village whither He himself would come, and this sending of His disciples must be His real coming to those places. "Ye are the body of Christ." Christ himself must express His life through you. He must work with your feet, and bless with your hands, and teach with your voice, and see with your eyes. Not only that, but He must think with your brain, and feel with your affection, and love with your heart, in order that the world may be saved.

The world cannot depend entirely on the coming of Christ in the long ago. It cannot wait forever with eyes uplifted to heaven for a future coming in the clouds. Jesus Christ sends His disciples into every city and village whither He himself would come, and their mission must be His coming.

What is a Christian, after all, but a person who can bring the Christ to men? He is one through whose mind the Christ can think, one through whose heart the Christ can love, one through whose hand the Christ can bless, one through whose feet the Christ can come.

Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis.

How Jesus Preached

A Sermon By Newell Dwight Hillis

In the Heart of God

"If men would only realize that their tent is set up in the very midst of God's heart, that God's angels are encamped about them, the superstitious reverence for the past would vanish, and there would come the rich, vital realization that God is, that he speaks, that he broods, that he woos, that he encompasses your soul in arms of love this moment; that he is protecting, healing, recreating and mothering you!"

IT IS quite certain that no other hero ever went to such instant popularity as did Jesus. Within a few weeks after he began his ministry, his name and fame had traveled into the uttermost corner of the land. In their eagerness to hear him, men forgot their private interests and their public duties. The farmer deserted his plough, the merchant his shop, the shepherds forsook their herds, and all men rushed together to see and hear Jesus. Where were the hidings of his power? There is an unexplored remainder in the Master preacher who is at once the ideal and the despair of all followers.

He taught the people, but there have been many other great teachers—skillful instruction will not explain Jesus. He was an orator, speaking as never man spoke, but there have been other eloquent men who could sway multitudes—eloquence will not explain Jesus. He was a natural leader of men, and knew how to transform a multitude into a regiment, but there have been other uncrowned kings—magnetism will not explain Jesus. The people thronged and crowded about John the Baptist, but John was the prophet of conscience and law, descending upon men like a fire-blast, terrifying them like a tornado, and the multitude were half afraid to come but more afraid to stay away. John the Baptist was like the Persian general, who scourged his coward soldiers into battle, lifting leather whips upon their backs. But the common people went toward Jesus as honey bees go toward the clover field and honeyed sweets. Jesus was a teacher who instructed the people; Jesus was an orator who swayed the people as the summer winds sway the ripe wheat. Jesus was a philanthropist, but his wonder works were deeds of mercy; the mere tolling of the bell called the people together to hear his still more marvelous word.

WAS HE A SOCIAL REFORMER?

Jesus was not even a social reformer. There were abuses of taxes, abuses through soldiers and war, abuses through land tenure, abuses through low wages and slave labor, yet Jesus had a larger message that included all these. He lifted men out of the transient and secular into the permanent and spiritual, and yet without being a mere teacher of abstractions. In every generation there have been preachers who held that it was their work to preach Christianity, and to let alone slavery, intemperance, sweat shops and child labor, which is much like saying that a physician should be a general teacher of hygiene, but never deal with diphtheria, smallpox or cholera. Jesus' vision included the redemption of individuals, and also the salvation of society through the sweetening of all the institutions thereof. It was the note of reality in Jesus that made the common people hear him gladly.

HIS TRAINING.

Consider the training that fitted Jesus for his work as a preacher. Essentially, he was an artisan-teacher, an itinerant preacher. His childhood was given up to work, his youth to the severest bodily toil. Tradition tells us that Joseph the Carpenter died when Jesus was about 14 years of age, and that from that hour the elder son was the head of the family. The eighteen silent years of Jesus were crowded with the duties of hanging doors, making windows, putting in floors in the stone houses, building granaries, carving ox-yokes. He had no opportunity to grow wise, no leisure to become ripe. He was denied the wealth that made possible years of study with Gamaliel, Paul's teacher, or Hillel, the philosopher. His mother, Mary, was a gifted woman (witness her hymn recorded by Luke), and he had the usual instruction of the Hebrew synagogue. The presence of a Roman legion in Nazareth, and of the Greek merchants in their city of Tiberius, a few miles from Jesus' home, doubtless gave him a speaking familiarity with both Latin and Greek, just as boys who live in the corner of Switzerland speak German, French and Italian. But twelve hours of physical labor during the precious memory hours of youth leave no strength for study at night. Jesus' education, therefore, was largely the education in the university of toil, where he met all classes and conditions of men, and had a first-hand acquaintance with the ruder occupations of ordinary industry, through soil and stone, and seeds and harvests, and wagons and fishing boats, and the processes of trade. Nevertheless, the knowledge he obtained seems ideally fitted to illustrate the great truths he taught. We cannot conceive of parables and pictures that he could have found in books and lectures, half so well fitted to reveal, like windows, the City of God. For men who emphasize libraries, the college and university, it gives a searching of heart to realize that the profoundest, the clearest, the strongest thinker and preacher the world has ever known, had no familiarity with libraries or classrooms. This is no argument against a knowledge of the classics, or the necessity of theological seminaries. There has been, will be, but one Jesus. Nevertheless, his preparation raises the question whether too much detail does not, like excess of wood, smother the creative fires.

TWO CLASSES OF MINDS.

In general, there are two classes of minds: first hand, original, creative minds, and then there is the mind that is mediocre and will not do first-hand work. The vast majority of young men will not look up to the stars, but they will read a book on astronomy or listen to a lecture; they will not look at the rocks, but they will read a geology; they will not analyze flowers, but they will read a book on botany; and for this great majority the college is a concession, and the seminary a necessity. On the other hand, there is an occasional mind like Abraham Lincoln's that does first-hand work. He went directly to the head waters of knowledge. He had but two or three books—a New Testament and Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress"—and by the time he was 10 years of age, these two books had fixed his style. The parables of Jesus taught Abraham Lincoln how to use illustrations and to make stories throwing a flood of light on big principles. At fifty years of age, Abraham Lincoln was the best-equipped man, for the work in hand, of his generation.

THE SUBSTANCE OF HIS DOCTRINE.

Consider the substance and body of Jesus' teaching. The Sermon on the Mount contains Jesus' programme for individuals and institutions. Doubtless in going up and down the land he repeated this sermon many times, varying it constantly with new illustrations, and probably never giving it twice in exactly the same way. But no matter how he arrived at his sublime discoveries, his message was essentially the same message. He dealt with the great simplicities of human life. Standing in the temple, where men were offering sheep and goats and trying to buy the favor of God and the remission of sins through lies, theft and foul lips, Jesus parted the clouds and portrayed God as a Great, Dear Presence, as a Father, standing with outstretched arms, waiting to forgive, and with a strange going out of his heart toward his erring children. Jesus talked to men about the loving providence of God that was so inclusive that, caring for the sun and stars, he had time also to note the sparrow's fall, to guard the steps of the little child. He taught the great essentials of character also, insisting that the negatives of Moses destroyed the weeds in the Garden of Eden, but that when the weeds were killed the rich harvests of truth and justice, and love and faith, and hope, must be shown as positives.

SOME OF JESUS' SOCIAL PRINCIPLES.

He said the best way to keep down the weeds is to sow the field with grain. Beholding the strife in the market place, the collision of the classes, the fields trampled down by war horses, Jesus taught men the secret of social peace, through the Golden Rule, and the law of brotherhood—the sublimest discovery that members of arbitration courts have ever had placed in their hands. He also taught the doctrine of human frailty, ignorance and sinfulness. Man was the only being so rich and large as to be in peril of losing his treasure. The sparrow cannot go astray—it does not carry enough treasure with it. The butterfly finds right living easy, and so does the insect world. But man, the lord of creation, equipped with an all-inclusive intellect, with a memory that binds all the years together, all places, recovers all music, all eloquence, all wisdom and knowledge, seen or taught or read—the judgment, the imagination, the creative faculties, the spiritual keepers of that dome of crystal that looks out on the stars, where hope and faith guard the telescopes—man, in apprehension like an angel, in creative gifts a young god—man can go wrong, can wreck himself like a general blowing up his own fortress, like a prince looting his own palace, like a mariner sinking his own treasure ship, like a king spoiling his own dominions. In his travail of soul foreseeing the loss of paradise, Jesus exclaimed, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

JESUS' THEMES OF TEACHING.

Oh, what themes Jesus discussed! The greatest themes possible to the intellect—God, man, the world that he handles, virtue, the nature of righteousness, sin, its forgiveness, kindness to enemies, duty to children, to women, to the family, to the state, the reason for the immortal hope—there are no greater themes.

The method and the materials Jesus used in discussing his themes are most suggestive and searching. The scribes and the Pharisees criticised him bitterly because he did not take his texts out of Moses and the prophets. They insisted that he had not exhausted the holy books; the Law of the Pentateuch was sacred, and anything that had happened yesterday was secular. Now those old Pharisees raised a large family, and their descendants are still with us. Jesus was indeed interested in what God did, but he was even more concerned with what God was now doing. What God did for Moses was chiefly helpful to Moses and his associates; what God was doing to Jerusalem and its people in the hour when Jesus wept over the city, was a thousand times more important to them, and to himself. It was the present and living and vitally speaking God that Jesus taught.

IF JESUS WERE HERE TODAY.

If Jesus were here today, and teaching, do you think for a moment that he would spend his precious moments talking about Jerusalem? Tell me, why is it that you think that something that God once did was sacred and important, while what God does today is secular and unimportant? Is it not because man's eyes are blind, that he cannot see the Present God, and his ears deaf that he cannot hear, and his heart dead that he cannot know, that what God was, he is, that what God once said, he says?

If men would only realize that their tent is set up in the very midst of God's heart, that God's angels are encamped all about them, the superstitious reverence for the past would vanish, and there would come the rich, vital realization that God is, that he speaks, that he broods, that he woos, that he encompasses in arms of love, your soul in this moment; that he is protecting, healing, re-creating and mothering you! Then would parents teach as Jesus taught, and would pupils and hearers hear gladly the news of a near and all-helpful Father, as the common people gladly heard Jesus! Therefore, everything that God was doing was sacred to Jesus. The last newly blown flower was God's latest thought of beauty. Yonder newly born cloud was God's last thought of purity. The coin dropped by the woman in the house held a lesson of the loss of the soul's treasure. The wedding procession through the streets was big with warning, and also luminous with lessons of mercy. The farmers, studying the sky for signs of fair weather or storm, suggested a great principle for the men who guided the state, and the duty of studying the signs of the times.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS OF JESUS.

What variety of illustration Jesus used! What parables he created! He struck off great ideas just as suns and stars are struck off when the right hand of God's omnipotence falls on the anvil of matter and purpose! His mind glowed and sparkled with ten thousand brilliant effects. He did not have to stop and carpenter together a sermon, finding materials in books and law. Again and again he was interrupted in the midst of his argument, but when the lawyer asked, "Who is my neighbor?" quick as the lightning flash Jesus struck off the parable of the man falling among thieves and the priest and Levite who passed by on the other side and the Good Samaritan who brought healing and recovery. The greatest need of the American pulpit today is the discovery of a God who speaks in the present events. Theology is the queen of the sciences. We cannot over-estimate the importance of a right philosophy as to the relation of the earth to the sun. But men cannot live on the everlasting analysis of Isaac Newton's Principia—what they live on is the sun that grows wheat and bread, and not the description of sun. So the need is of analytical theology.

Well, it is a sorry day for the world when men think that the chemical formula of wheat is more important than growing grain, and that the analysis of water into H_2O is a greater need than the digging of wells, and fountains in the desert, where the pilgrim host flounders. The blind leaders of the blind are still with us! We may be quite certain that there is one need of the hour that all will confess, namely, the return to the preaching of Jesus, who never took a text out of the law or prophets if he could find one in the blade of grass, the falling sparrow, the wild lily, the drifting cloud, the passing of a soldier, the sight of a sower in the field, the standing of the laborer in the market place.

Do not think, young man, that you are complimenting God by everlasting analyzing him. He who analyzes the wheat loses the grain. He who analyzes the rose loses the flower. Pull one cluster to pieces in the laboratory and after that deal with the grapes of God. O all ye troubled hearts through whose life-garden suffering with its hot ploughshare has run; ye who are obscure and defeated, holding heartbreak at bay; ye who have wrestled with the Death Angel and are left in a Gethsemane alone; God is not an abstraction. He is not a formula; He is not only a God who was with Moses and Paul—God is, and the latest and last event is God's message and illuminated missal to you! In your bitter need he will be near to you, and give to you the grapes of God and wet your lips with nectar. For the hour, close all other books! Open to the preaching of Jesus, that you may find shelter until the storm is past.

THE COMPASSION OF CHRIST AS A PREACHER.

The atmosphere in which Christ taught was the atmosphere of compassion, pity and sympathy. When Christ as a preacher stood before the people it was as a great, dear friend, come to advise them in a critical hour and help them in an emergency. His pity was the pity of a physician, tenderly handling a sick child; his sympathy was the sympathy of a teacher, encouraging a discouraged pupil; his compassion was the compassion of a lover, hanging above his beloved one in an hour when sorrow had come in like a black storm; his love brooded them as a mother's love broods the child, sobbing upon her bosom. Jesus never taught merely for the sake of the truth. He presented in this laboratory a chemist giving the fact about hydrogen or oxygen; how the chemist can grow angry, be cynical and answer the pupil with sarcasm, but the chemist's personal atmosphere and character in no wise affects the fact that water is made up of two parts of hydrogen and one of oxygen. The greatest mathematician this country has ever known thought not in terms of two and four, but in terms of the higher logarithms, but he looked upon the pupils in his classes with perfect contempt for their stupidity in mathematics. He was one of the best hated men in his faculty, yet his atmosphere of cynicism and brutal rebuke did not in any way whatsoever affect the truth of his statement that the whole was equal in the sum of all the parts.

ATMOSPHERE OF SYMPATHY NECESSARY.

But the teacher and preacher cannot make moral truth effective unless they carry with them the atmosphere of compassion and sympathy. Jesus' favorite simile for the preacher was that of the sower going forth to sow. But it is not enough to have the seed and the soil. In January the granary is filled with seed, and the sower has leisure. The soil is there, the seed is ready, and the sower is free, but the atmosphere is not right. In April the all-loving sun comes to pour warmth about the frosty clods and drive out the chill, and release the streams, and waken the seeds, and then the sower goes forth to sow, knowing that bareness shall turn to beauty and rich harvests.

JESUS' HEART-YEARNING.

And Jesus began by pouring an atmosphere about the soul. He had compassion upon the people. His heart yearned toward them. In his sympathetic realization of their cruel need he put his hands upon the blind and the deaf and the leper, that he might touch them, and with tenderness heal them with love. His pity fell like rain, in tears. His sympathy warmed the soul like the sun stealing through the window. His compassion was a medicine that took out the fever. There was no patrician note in Jesus. He never stood upon his dignity. He never condescended to men. He never became exclusive, because he was conscious of his own intellectual genius. He was the Great Democrat and universal lover. He included among his intimate scholars and peasants, rich men and paupers, members of the Sanhedrim, and lost girls, publicans, and Hebrew patriots, who hated the tax gatherer, with rabbis and heretics. He was the world citizen because his heart was big enough and kind and simple enough to include all sorts and conditions and classes and races of men. No man is a preacher who does not feel through sympathy the sinfulness and sorrow and need of men, and who cannot overarch man's need with the sympathy and love of God, that broods men as the clouds with their full breasts brood the fields, as the sun with its great heat broods the roots and seeds, as the summer broods the vineyards, as Mary brooded her cradle with its angel-child.

JESUS' CHARACTER AND SINLESSNESS.

But the hiding of power in Jesus' preaching was in his character. Jesus was what he said—that was why he said it. Jesus first did, and then he taught. With Jesus, the promise never outran the performance. All his preaching was born of personal experience. He drank the bitter cup in Gethsemane, fought his battle and won his victory—after that he offered the gift of peace to his disciples, because he had won the gift of peace for himself. With Jesus, the sermon was an intellectual photograph of what he had personally and vitally experienced from God. He first of all conquered every form of pride through position, love of ease and gold, office and honor, and having flung back every form of temptation he felt free to be a preacher of men, and to tell them how they could break the power of sin, be cleansed from its stain and redeemed from its guilt. It was Christ's holiness that awed the people. They saw the white light upon his face. The solar transfigured look was there.

THE LIGHT IN HIS FACE.

He had always just come down out of the mountain, and the celestial light lingered and lent him a strange, sweet, magical beauty. The common people looked at him, and a lump rose in the throat. The widow with her trouble, and the sinner with his remorse, the thief trying to conceal his treasure, and the invalid terrified at the thought of death, suddenly heard a voice saying, "Here is one who has help," and hope once more fluttered in the heart. It was that goodness in his life that lent Jesus' speech omnipotence. Power is not in the sunbeam alone. Open a slit in the shutter, pass the sunbeam through the burning glass, hold a book with its morocco cover at the focal point; now the sunbeam begins its work—the leather smokes, now boils, now it disappears; then the paper begins to blacken; now keep turning the hour glass so that the sunbeam will fall at the same point, and when thirty minutes have passed by, suddenly the sunbeam appears on this side of the book, having bored its way straight through the two covers, the many pages. But whence hath this sunbeam its power? Make a golden stairway out of the sunbeam and climb upward, and you shall find the answer. Back of the beam is the ever insistent pressure of the great sun, crowding that beam forward and lending it omnipotence. Wonderful Christ's Sermon on the Mount! Marvelous these proverbs! How musical and luminous these pictures! What doctrine! What precept! But, oh, back of the words was the life and the holy heart, just as back of the beam is the sun. Of course the thought of holiness blanches the cheek of the parent, the preacher and the teacher. What right has any one of us to teach with our imperfect life, with its blunders, its selfishness, its sins.

THE ONLY SINLESS PREACHER.

There has been but one sinless preacher and there has been but one whom the common people heard gladly. Of him Pilate and the centurion confessed that they could find no fault in him. Yet, while Jesus has succeeded as a preacher in terms of long time, he failed grievously in reaching his own city of Jerusalem and his own generation. But little by little his preaching made its way, and his truth grew like seed, his programme has spread, and his leaven is transformed by men and institutions, cities and empires. For the world can never get away from his beauty and charm. It was a very simple message that he brought, so simple that a scholar and child alike could understand. God is your Father; the world is his beautiful house, fitted up for his children; you are all brothers; you must not be hard with one another; some of you have made a sad wreck of your life; but the Father will not be hard with you. Beyond he will wipe away your tears and help you correct the mistakes and right the wrongs. In a better land you will have another chance to begin afresh. For though your mother forsake you and all friends torture and traduce, and you die in a dungeon, or on a scaffold, there is one heart that goes out toward the sinner—it is the Father's heart. God who is out in the night and the storm, whose love will not let him sleep, and who will not come in until he hath found his son and brought him home.

The Cross or the Crescent?

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT, JR.

The strong appeal which the Christian college in the Orient makes to the alert Mohammedan youth, coupled with a certain apprehension that he may fall away from his ancestral faith, is set forth in this interesting sketch by our Syrian correspondent. The oriental student fancies that it is western education that he needs. It is the task of the missionary to show him at last that western education is only one of the by-products of Christianity. —The Editor.

A SHORT time ago there occurred the yearly meeting of the Students' Mohammed club of the Syrian Protestant College to which several members of the faculty who are thoroughly conversant with the Arabic language, were invited. No set program had been announced, but it was understood that the meeting was to be a religious one, and so it opened very fittingly with a chapter from the Koran. A lad of sixteen stood before the room full of students and faculty, and read in a deeply impressive manner one of the strong chapters, in which the prophet warned his people against the encroachments of other religions, more especially against the Christians. The swing of the sentence, the subtle inflections of the voice, the masterful precision and clearness with which each syllable fell from the lad's lips, were profoundly stirring even to one who knew no Arabic. Powerfully was the little group of believers affected, while the Christians present showed signs of more than ordinary emotion as the reader dramatically chanted the exhortations of his holy book of faith and steadfast adherence to the words of "Allah the Compassionate, Allah the Merciful."

A STUDENT'S FAITH.

After the reading another student arose to speak of the Mohammedans in this college. "I am a true believer," he declared;" my reverence kneels at the feet of Jesus, the prophet, but my soul and my heart cry out for Allah, the one God, and for Mohammed, his greatest prophet; and to them I dedicate my life." He then went on to speak as no westerner would have dared to speak, of the condition of the Turkish Empire: "Anarchy, deceit, extortion, decay, death—these we see and feel from day to day, and idly watch or weakly endure. But we have a mission, and a mission which we alone can accomplish—that of quelling the tumult, of cleansing that which is foul, of restoring to life that which is dead. The East alone is responsible for the impurity of our country, and the East is coming to see her own weaknesses. We are Moslems—we must bear the brunt of the fight; we must indicate our faith by doing for ourselves what Christianity has felt called upon to do for us. Let not the stranger purify our house, but the servant, if the master will not . And let the servant become an example to that master of devotion to their God."

Thus he begged his fellow-believers to make the best use of their opportunities here at the college to fit themselves for the task of vindicating Mohammedanism by making it accomplish its own reformation in its own country. It was a strong appeal, and carried with it the frank statement of facts well known to all, of the devitalized state of the empire; but facts to which none but a native would dare to allude—and he only to a chosen few.

President Bliss emphasized the need of the country for strong, trained, earnest men, and then suddenly turned his words to picture the need of good Mohammedans to fight against the evils of westernism. He pointed out the degeneracy of Egyptian Islam, falling away from the sobriety of the past, lapsing into drunkenness when all its vital power is needed to stem the tide of internal decay. He made very clear the future of this people unless the educated men stand together for integrity, purity, advancement. No earnest man could have left that meeting without feeling that he personally was responsible for the welfare of his religion. And the earnestness of the men is shown by the events of a few years ago.

A REVOLT AMONG STUDENTS.

At that time the young man who first spoke, now a senior in the medical school, was in the collegiate department. Together with a small group of Moslems he stirred up a revolt within the college against the rule compelling chapel attendance, Sunday-school membership and similar religious observances. Parents were enlisted; men in town became excited over the question; the government at Constantinople was asked to interfere in behalf of its co-religionists. It was an anxious, critical moment for the faculty, because these students were not merely protesting against a disagreeable demand upon their time, but were earnestly seeking to promote the cause they believed sacred, in repudiating anything that might influence the weakest of them to waver. The right of an institution to make its laws did not enter into the question, because being in Turkish territory, the students felt that the Turkish faith should be favored.

One man only was loyal to the school —the son of a prominent Kurd of Damascus. His attitude was so outspoken that the boatmen of Beirut, ignorant and blindly faithful Muslims, threatened him and actually attacked the house of his uncle. The lad rode down to the dock in a carriage, and as the boatmen swarmed about him, called out, "Do as you like with me now, but remember that all my father needs to do is to whistle and 5,000 Kurds will be here in a day and make you pay in blood for what you do." The men knew how true it was and slunk away. But even such a determined stand on the part of one of their own number did not pacify the students. It was only by temporizing and dealing very tactfully with them that the faculty finally made its position once more clear—that every student must attend service.

The experience proved once and for all that the men want the education that the college can give. They are not willing to stay away over a question of certain rules which enforce no change of belief. But almost equally do they cling to the bars which mean safety for them, bars of ignorance of Christianity. They want knowledge to reform themselves and to prove that it is not the religion of Christ which achieves the purifying results. And can we blame them? I remember very clearly how I once cheered a lad who went to Catholic school but refused to attend Mass; and yet here we demand attendance. We can appreciate the attitude of a serious Muslim who, in registering this year said, "I am coming because I am old enough not to be changed, but my younger brother must wait two years, until his faith has become sure." That man is in my Sunday-school class, and I have no more eager and interested student. But he is steadfast in the belief that it is our knowledge and not our religion which makes the college a beacon light in the country. Such men we can use.

STURDY FAITH EVIDENCED.

There are a few others, Muslims, who deface hymn-books and Christians who mock the Muezzin call to prayers, who have not the spirit we want—sturdy faith with no intolerance. But as I look at the attentive faces of the large group of boys who attend Y. M. C. A. meetings and Sunday evening optional services, boys who represent many religions, but are trying with a freedom from sectarian bitterness which many of us in our own land would do well to imitate, to get all the good we can give them, I feel certain that the spirit of our Lord finds a home in their hearts and that they are learning his lessons and are preparing to use them to uplift their own people.

Leaders of Men and Millions

CHARLES C. CHAPMAN, OF THE COMMISSION OF BUSINESS MEN OF THE MEN AND MILLIONS MOVEMENT.

WHEN still a boy living in one of the smaller cities of Illinois, Charles C. Chapman dreamed of the big world lying out beyond the horizon. While engaged at his daily tasks, for he began work when a mere boy, he lived in two worlds, one was the hard, matter-of-fact world round about him that seemed only a dream and the other was the world that was to be when his thoughts would become stately buildings and men would toil at his bidding. This unseen world wah his reality.

When a young man of eighteen he went to Chicago where he had larger outlook and greater opportunities for doing things. There he was successful as a publisher.

Dealt a staggering blow by the panic of 1893 with its curtailment of credit, with death knocking at the door and calling the name of the one dearest in the home, he turned his face toward the West. From the throbbing heart of a great city he came to a ranch, to succeed, where many trained by years of experience were failing. He works miracles before the wondering eyes of the experts of horticulture. His genius is like a magic wand that makes a fruitless, profitless land produce an hundredfold. From this and other countries come citrus fruit men to his groves, which are among the most beautiful in the world, to learn the city man's secret of how to farm. But his interests are now large and he sits in the boards of control of banks and many corporations. In the metropolis of Los Angeles he has a number of business buildings, and through the efforts of C.

Charles C. Chapman.

C. Chapman and brother barren lands have been converted into beautiful subdivisions, parks and terraces, graced by hundreds of beautiful residences.

Charles Chapman knows how to make the most out of land; barren wastes blossom as a rose at his touch. He knows how to make the most out of trees: drooping branches lift themselves up and then grow weary under their load of golden fruit. He knows how to make the most out of stock; his beasts of burden become a delight to the eye. But beyond all else he would make the most out of men. He makes money to make men. He builds buildings to better his brothers. The crown of his life is not his castle, but the churches that claim his devotion. For years when his burdens were heaviest, he preached for a mission church and only left it to organize a congregation in his home village which was soon to become a city.

His church comes first. Christ sits at the head of his table. All other interests are neglected at the call of his pastor. No other engagement holds when he is asked to lead a prayer-meeting. As president of the State Board there comes upon him daily the care of all the churches. The troubles of all the preachers become his own and he loves them as he loves his children.

The Disciples and Christian Unity

BY PETER AINSLIE.

Editor's Note: Doctor Ainslie was a member of the delegation which was recently sent by the Episcopal Church to visit the Non-Conformist Churches of Great Britain on behalf of the Commission on Faith and Order. The following article is the third of a series of papers on Church Unity by representative leaders of the various brotherhoods. The series is being published in The Churchman (Episcopalian).

PERHAPS it is not improper to state at the outset of this article that there are no two bodies in American Christianity more positively committed to the union of the divided Church than the Episcopalians and the Disciples of Christ. Both are seeking organic union and will be satisfied with nothing less. While the Episcopalians have written much on this subject and have sought sincerely for union, the Disciples of Christ had their origin in a desire for union and still maintain that it is the one apology for their existence as a separate people. Strange as this may seem, they are separated from other communions from necessity and not because they desire it.

About a hundred years ago a movement arose in the Presbyterian household in a desire for freedom in the practice of catholicity in religion, and it became the first organized movement in American Christianity for the union of the Church. The times, however, were not ripe for such a movement, and Thomas and Alexander Campbell and Barton W. Stone were thrust out of the Presbyterian Church. Stone and those associated with him maintained an independent course, but the Campbells and those associated with them, fearing that they might become the nucleus for another denomination, sought affiliation with the Baptists and, after nearly twenty years of uncertain fellowship with that communion, they were again thrust out. They faced the inevitable necessity of becoming a separate communion, against which they protested. The movement under the Campbells and that under Stone united and became, about eighty years ago, the communion known as the Disciples of Christ, or Christians, which has grown to be one of the strongest bodies numerically in American Christianity, numbering more than a million, and growing rapidly.

EMPHASIS ON CATHOLIC PRINCIPLES.

Agreeing with Evangelical Protestants on the great fundamentals of our common faith, they sought a basis for union by eliminating those things as tests of fellowship about which we differ, and to unite upon those things on which there is a universal agreement, so their message had nothing to do with the formation of a new creed, even if the movement did develop into a new communion. They sought to emphasize the great catholic principles upon which all Christendom was agreed and they believed that conformity to these catholic principles would lead believers out of the confusion of denominationalism into the peace of a united Christendom.

The catholicity of their message may be summed up under four heads:

(1) The catholic name. They recognized Christians among Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, etc., but those names were divisive and perpetuated division, which was in opposition to the prayer of Jesus and the teachings of Paul. Even the name Roman Catholic was not catholic, for the term "Roman" destroyed its catholicity and made it provincial; neither was the Holy Catholic Church a proper designation. "catholic" not being a noun, but primarily an adjective. The Scriptures furnished the only catholic names for believers, and these are for the individuals, Christians, Disciples, Disciples of Christ, Friends, etc., and for the organization, the Church of Christ, Church of God, the Church, the Christian Church, etc., so to the Disciples there were no other names to wear but the catholic names of the Scriptures, which all believers and

Rev. Peter Ainslie, D. D.

Churches used in a secondary sense. The Disciples sought to make their use primary and so they have worn no other names and have urged all other believers to do likewise.

AS TO CREEDS.

(2) The catholic creed. All the communions had separate creeds. The Episcopalians had their Thirty-nine Articles, the Presbyterians had their Westminster Confession of Faith, the Methodists their Discipline, the Baptists their Philadelphia Confession of Faith, etc. It was not a question whether these creeds taught truth or error. They were master productions and registered thought, but they were divisive and not catholic. Episcopalians would not accept the Westminster Confession of Faith, nor would the Baptists accept the Methodist Discipline. For the Disciples to have sought to introduce a compromise creed would have been the height of folly. They were seeking for a union basis on catholic principles, so they went back to the beginning of the Church, when the simple creed was the confession of the Messiahship and Lordship of Jesus and the commitment of their lives in obedience to Him. This was catholic ground, for all believers accepted the fact of Christ, so the Disciples gave their allegiance to the simple creed that expressed faith in and obedience to the personality of Jesus Christ, and they sought to have all believers do the same.

(3) The catholic book. Every communion accepted the Scriptures as containing the Word of God. Upon this there was no dissent, but the various communions had their systems of theology as tests of fellowship, and these were divisive and destructive to the peace of the Church. They could be made schools of thought, and against this the Disciples made no dissent, but to make them tests of fellowship was provincial and opposed to catholicity. Since all agreed upon the Scriptures, why could not the Scriptures alone be sufficient? They appeared to have been largely so for the early Church. Why should they not be for the Church in modern times? Besides, the distinct message of Protestantism was justification by faith, sole authority of the Scriptures and the right of private interpretation. The Disciples, believing heartily in these principles, pushed them to their ultimate conclusion and, consequently, beyond Protestant creeds and systems of theology, claiming the Scriptures to be sufficient for the rule of Christian life. Again they were on catholic ground, and taking the Scriptures as their only book of authority, they sought to persuade others to take this catholic bok as their sole authority.

CATHOLIC MODE OF BAPTISM.

(4) The catholic mode of baptism. The Campbells, Stone and others, in the early history of the Disciples, were pedobaptists, but they had committed themselves to a catholic policy for the union of the Church. They had a hard struggle on the baptismal question, for all their training was in the principles of pedo-baptism, but finally, seeing no other course for peace in the Church than to take that mode of baptism which was recognized by all Christians and which is mentioned first in the Book of Common Prayer, they were rebaptized by immersion and forthwith urged all believers, who sought for Christian union, to adopt this catholic mode of baptism.

With this message of catholicity and fraternity, they pleaded for Christian union and advanced with this as the chief ensign upon their banners. Herein lies much of the secret of their rapid growth. It is not difficult therefore to understand the enthusiasm with which they received the announcement of the Protestant Episcopal Church, appointing a commission for a World Conference on Faith and Order. In fact, such a conference was talked about at the General Convention of the Disciples in Topeka, in October, 1910, but only a commission on Christian union was appointed to prepare the way for such a conference. It was received with joy when the Disciples learned that while they were appointing their commission on Christian union, the same day the Episcopalians were appointing in their General Convention in Cincinnati, in 1910, a Commission for a World Conference on Faith and Order. We are glad that the Episcopalians preceded us with the idea of a World Conference, for they are in a better position for leadership in this great and holy cause, but we are no less glad that we are in a position to make a very definite contribution to this conference, both by our history of catholicity and fraternity and by personal work in prayers and appeals, in which many of us are most cheerfully joining.

THE CHURCH'S CHIEF ISSUE.

Above all the issues in the Church is the union of its forces. It was both the prophecy and the prayer of Jesus. The whole Church is beginning to see that it is as much in the program of Christ as His death on the cross and His Resurrection from the dead. It must come as sure as the tides ebb and flow. It devolves upon every believer to so cultivate peace in the household of God that his life shall be a faint echo of the life of our Lord, whose we are and whom we serve.

MR. TAFT ON FOREIGN MISSIONS.

In an article in the "Youth's Companion," the Hon. William H. Taft warmly indorses the work of Foreign Missions. Foreign missionaries do not merely propound the gospel to the heathen—their work touches every phase of life, industrial, commercial, agricultural, political, social. They are, in the words of Mr. Taft, "pioneers of Christian civilization."

He says:

"With very considerable opportunity to judge, from four years' experience in the Orient, and from contact with many missionaries in the Philippines, I feel justified in saying that they are generally persons of high character, high intelligence, high standards of living—persons who are willing to make every sacrifice for the cause they represent. They are men who know well the characteristics of the people with whom they deal. They learn their language, they study their peculiarities, and they train themselves to conciliatory methods. The very history of their broadened activities shows their practical methods. The Bishops and the heads of missions in various countries are trained diplomatists, and have learned much of statesmanship in their study of native conditions. I know of many instances in which the greatest self-restraint and tact have been exercised in order to prevent an outburst which would make such a cleavage between governmental authority and the representative missionaries as could hardly be closed for a decade.

"Governments, knowing that the Christian missionaries are not insurgents against constituted authority, are beginning to feel that the leaders of such movements can be employed to further important governmental plans. For example, Bishop Harris was one of the warmest friends that Marquis Ito had, and was of great assistance to him in his efforts to solve the difficult questions growing out of the annexation of Korea to Japan.

"We can find the explanation of Christian influence and progress of Christian civilization only in the widened activities of our Foreign Missions, which are supported by the sympathetic assistance of the existing local governments, native or colonial.

"We cannot exercise power without responsibility. Our Foreign Missions have led us on, and have shown where good work can be done. We should not retreat from our obligation, but should act the part of a good and beneficent international neighbor wherever our aid is sought by a struggling nation."

RAILROAD TO PIERCE AFRICA.

The dream of Cecil Rhodes of an all-British railway through the center of the Dark Continent is being realized. It is said that railway trips from the Nile right through the center will be possible within the next few years. The line is built now from the cape to Elizabethtown, a distance of 2,320 miles. The distance from Capetown in the south to Alexandria in the north is 7,074 miles. The Belgian Government has ceded to Great Britain a strip of land in the Congo, so that Africa's first transcontinental line will run on British soil throughout from Capetown to Alexandria. The difficulties confonted have been serious, for in addition to the natural obstacles the lions and other wild beasts have given much trouble, and in some sections the ties had to be of steel on account of the white ants, which destroy everything except iron or steel.

WORK ON GREAT LAKES INJURES MEN.

Mr. Thos. Conway, of Buffalo, secretary of the Marine Firemen's, Oilers' and Watertenders' union of the great lakes, appeared before the house merchant marine committee as the first representative of organized labor. He contended that there should be two able seamen for every life-boat.

"At the present time," said Mr. Conway, "men on the vessels of the great lakes work on deck all day while the vessel is being loaded, then they are sent down into the hold to serve as coal passers. When they reach the Soo, no matter how heated they may be from their work in the fire room, they are sent on deck to handle icy lines."

Mr. Conway said that the desire to economize on coal had something to do with the disastrous results of the recent storm on the great lakes.

"The steamer Nottingham," he said, "left Port Arthur with only forty tons of coal in the bunker. She left in the teeth of the storm. What was the result? She went ashore on Parisian Island and soon after had to begin to burn grain. Coal is higher at Port Arthur than it is at the Soo. In my opinion that is why the ship left the upper port with only forty tons in her bunkers.

"The results of the efforts of the crew to launch a lifeboat show something of the inefficiency of the crews which now man the great lakes vessels.

"The crew got in one of the Nottingham's life boats and lowered it without paying any attention to the run of the sea. The sea came up and dumped all the men out of the life boat, back on the deck. That's why we want a standard of efficiency prescribed by this bill."

INTERESTING!

We are informed that the professor of mathematics of Indiana State University, located at Bloomington, recently tested 250 students from the farmer, the professional, and the commercial classes. The students from the farm made an average of 82.4 on their final examination, as compared with 74.5 for the second class, and 63.6 for third class. Only seven per cent of the farmer class failed to make a passing grade, as compared with 13.4 per cent of the professional and 17 per cent of the commercial classes. The professor's explanation is that the country boy could concentrate much better than the urbanite, and was not, in so large a degree, distracted by outside activities as is the city student.

A SUGGESTION.

Sir—In a recent Scribner's Theodore Roosevelt writes:

"I was informed by entirely trustworthy people that in swimming cattle across a river savage hippos had been known to assail and kill them."

Why do the hippos swim their cattle across a river? And why do they destroy their own property?

A colleague of mine writes, in an account of a shipwreck: "Being swept from stem to stern by tremendous waves the captain abandoned the ship."

Wouldn't it be feasible for the American colleges to institute a course leading to, say the degree of D. P.C., that is, doctor of participial constructions?—Correspondent of the New York Evening Post.

There are in the United States 190 different denominations. This includes Buddhists, Theosophists, Mormons, Communistic societies, Bahars, etc. There are sixty-nine Buddhist temples in this country.

Panama Hymn

WENDELL PHILLIPS STAFFORD IN ATLANTIC MONTHLY.

We join today the East and West,
  The stormy and the tranquil seas.
O Father, be the bridal blest!
  The earth is on her knees.

Thou, Thou didst give our hand the might
  To hew the hemisphere in twain
And level for these waters bright
  The mountain with the main;

In freedom let the great ships go
  On freedom's errand, sea to sea—
The oceans rise, the hills bend low,
  Servants of liberty.

The nations here shall flash through foam
  And paint their pennons with the sun
Till every harbor is a home
  And all the flags are one.

We join today the East and West
  The stormy and the tranquil seas.
O Father, be the bridal blest!
  Earth waits it on her knees.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

EDITORIAL

"THE PRACTICE OF CATHOLICITY."

EDITORS are usually pretty chary in subscribing to all the statements made in even the very best articles contributed to the pages of their papers. But with respect to the article by Dr. Peter Ainslie appearing in this issue we cannot resist an impulse to say that it has our editorial endorsement from beginning to end, in every sentence and in almost every word. Not in many a day has a brief statement of the deeper purposes of the Disciples of Christ come under our observation so lucid, so unlabored, so true to history yet so more than historical, so free from bumptiousness and controversial detail, and so catholic in its spirit, as is this article in which Doctor Ainslie presents to the readers of our Episcopalian contemporary the essential plea of the Disciples of Christ.

There is one great sentence in it which ought to be made the theme of prolonged reflection by every reader: "About a hundred years ago a movement arose in the Presbyterian household in a desire for freedom in the practice of catholicity in religion. . . ."

That single sentence is the most lucid interpretation of the Disciples' movement that our literature has produced.

HURLING THE FIRST STONE.

IT IS one of the pathetic spectacles of religion that misunderstanding and prejudice so far hold their ground in the sentiments of both the Reformed and Romanist after three centuries of common history. There are parties in each of these great divisions of the Christian Church whose chief delight seems to be the flinging of vituperative and malignant epithets and arguments across the border at each other. Perhaps this is inevitable as long as the old controversies are remembered. But Protestantism, which has ever claimed the blessings of intelligence and freedom of thought, ought to be very slow to avail itself of such foul weapons in a needless contest with the Roman Church. It is pathetic to see Protestant preachers and writers employing their abilities in diatribes against the Church of Rome. No intelligent student of past or present history doubts that there is much to be regretted and disapproved in the theory and practice of that church.

But the faults of Protestantism, in theology, morals and temper, are quite too glaring to permit any champion of the Reformation to glory over the failures of Rome. Protestantism with its divisions and its still remaining marks of narrowness and bigotry would present a sorry spectacle if suddenly compelled to face the problem of caring for the masses of faithful, if untaught, communicants of the Roman Church.

No disaster could be greater than that of the sudden disappearance of Catholic leadership and control over these multitudes, until the day when Protestantism shall have learned its lesson of open-mindedness and unity. More than this, any unity which is worthy of the name must include Romanist and Protestant in the united Church of Christ. It is no part either of intelligent instruction or of Christian statesmanship to waste time in stirring up needless animosities between the two sections of the Church by mordant and hateful strictures upon Catholicism.

The first stone, and every other stone, should be hurled only by those whose lives are clear of the evil temper and the divisive practices which are all too freely charged against the Church of Rome.

THE PROMISE TO OBEY.

AGITATION for the omission of the word "obey" from the wedding service of the Episcopal church is not confined to this side of the water. The London Christian World tells of the movement over seas:

"It seems that reformers who wish to get the word 'obey' struck out of the marriage service are really going back to what used to be the universal usage of the Christian Church in both the East and the West. Mr. F. C. Eeles and Dr. Percy Dearmer have been carefully examining all the old liturgies. Up to the thirteenth century the man and the woman made precisely the same vows. So they do still in the Roman Catholic and the eastern churches. It almost seems as if the use of the word 'obey' originated in England. The three best known forms of service in use in England before the Reformation were those of Sarum, of York, and of Hereford. Of these only the Sarum service book had the word 'obey,' and that book was followed by the Reformers in preparing the English Prayer Book. In some of the North German service books the word seems also to have made its appearance. But in any case antiquity is against it. It is seldom that the antiquarians and the common-sense people agree in a matter of this kind, but as they do in this case, the force of their demand is irresistible. So we may hope that this reform of the marriage service will be soon carried through, though the Bishop of Lincoln the other day withdrew his motion to that effect in the Canterbury Convocation."

Fortunate is the minister who has no need to wait the search of old records or the voice of any convocation. If the word obey has ceased to define our highest conception of the relations of a Christian wife to a Christian husband, omit it. Why should we care what the old methods were?

WHAT THE LAW COULD NOT DO.

THIS will be remembered as an age that has undertaken to solve every problem, cosmic and ethical, by law. All questions in the earth and out of it have attempted to find their answer in legislation. Is there an evil that any one has seen under the sun? "There ought to be a law prohibiting it." Is there a good thing that ought to be done? Let us pass the hat, and organize a lobby, and secure the passage of a law.

There ought to be more of this than formerly, because a larger part of our life than formerly is lived in conditions beyond our control. He who lives on a farm of his own, and wears clothing made from wool grown on his own sheep and spun by his own daughter and woven by his own wife on her own loom, and who eats bread baked from his own wheat or corn, with milk from his own cows and honey from his own hives can control, let us say, 90 per cent of the conditions under which he must live and his children be reared. It is not necessary to pass laws telling him not to shut out sunlight from the windows of his neighbor who lives a mile away, nor compel him to put a number on his ox-cart in order to identify it when it runs over the children of his neighbors. A great variety of laws become necessary under modern conditions which were totally unnecessary in more primitive life.

Nevertheless, let it be remembered, that there are some things which the law cannot do.

Analyze a little of this rather cheap talk about "natural law." What is "natural law?" It is merely the methods, so far as we have been able to observe and classify them, which govern phenomena. The savage, living in the tropics, learns how to boil water, and makes out what is for him a complete treatise on the natural laws of hydrostatics. But he is totally incompetent to pass judgment upon water in low temperatures. All the water he has ever seen is that between the temperature of the spring, and that of the boiling point. What does he know, and what can he imagine, about water below 32 degrees? That it becomes solid is to him a preposterous supposition. We are a trifle wiser, for we have seen water at a little lower temperature than he, and know that as it boils at 212, it solidifies at 32; but we are nearly as incompetent as he to write any complete treatise on the laws governing fluids.

Then consider this matter of easy legislation. How much simpler it is to get a law passed than to persuade people to be good! Once we had great pledge-signing campaigns; now we have local option campaigns. The local option campaigns are necessary. But it must never be forgotten that if all people would sign the pledge and keep it the problem would be solved, and indeed that it never will be solved in any other way than that which reaches the moral nature of men.

Never since the Pope issued his bill against the comet has there been such complete satisfaction with the attempt to meet all life's emergencies by means of law as at the present moment. Let the good work go on. Let us have laws against the sale of liquor; against the social evil; against the oppression of the wage earner and all the rest. But remember this, and never forget it, that what the law could not do, and never can do is to make regenerate souls. That Christ alone can do.

THE FORCE OF BREVITY.

HOWEVER much opinions may differ as to the moral issue involved in the question of Panama tolls and the attitude of President Wilson thereon, there is one aspect of his message that won universal commendation, its direct approach to the subject, its compactness of argument, its simplicity and clarity of diction and its brevity. Of it The Nation says:

"President Wilson's message to Congress on the Panama tolls was a masterpiece of condensation. In less than 500 words he said all that is necessary, and with a force and impact that must go deep into the mind of congress and the country. The gravity of his appeal is enhanced by his brevity. Some issues are too serious to be drenched in language. In the highest matters, saith the Preacher, 'let thy words be few.' The President has laid this to heart. And if there is truth in Voltaire's saying that it is not the books of many pages which move men to great social changes and even revolutions, but the broadside, the pamphlet, the thin volume all aglow with passion, it is certainly true that presidents are not heard for their much speaking; that long and wordy messages to Congress which nobody reads cannot have the effect of a swift and direct utterance which all can take in in five minutes, and which is yet couched in such terms as to compel thought and thought yet again."

There is a time for extended argument, but there are times more frequent in which the ability to state a proposition clearly, and defend it simply, logically and briefly, are worth hours of eloquence.

SAVING A DOWNTOWN CHURCH.

WHENEVER the great city newspapers come forward in straight-from-the shoulder editorials and feature "write-ups" in behalf of a religious movement, that movement must be a vital one.

This is exactly what everyone of the Chicago dailies is doing in behalf of the effort that is being made by the Episcopalians —and by other communions, as well—to save to the service of the city's downtown district "Old Trinity," the historic structure which for several decades stood for spiritual things against the tides of commercialism which have well nigh caused the spiritual heart of Chicago to cease to beat.

Appeals are being made to Christians, irrespective of denomination, and to non-Christians, to subscribe to the $175,000 fund which will be necessary to preserve this splendid work to future usefulness.

The Chicago Tribune speaks in an editorial as follows:

"The closing of Trinity church, with all its clubs and associate activities, because of lack of support would not be a mere sectarian but a civic setback. The church which goes out of business as soon as it ceases to be the well-supported religious center of a comfortable and prosperous neighborhood is not doing its work. The church's first opportunity for missionary work does not lie across the ocean.

"In sending out an appeal for aid to all the Christian people of the city, regardless of denomination, Trinity church is more than justified.

"Ten thousand dollars a year spent at Michigan avenue and Twenty-sixth street may, from any standpoint, do more good than twice that amount devoted to work in foreign lands. By the response to the present call one may fairly test the sincerity and earnestness of the Christian people of Chicago."

Among us Disciples as among all other communions, one of the outstanding problems is that of the downtown church. In Chicago, Jackson Boulevard, Monroe street, Memorial and Metropolitan churches are fighting the battle with more or less success.

In Kansas City, the old First Church is being re-equipped for continued service by the addition of a $50,000 Sunday-school building and parish house. St. Louis is not doing so well. It is a lamentable fact that First Church, which has through many years cared for thousands of young people thrown out into the perilous whirlpools of city life, is fighting its last battle—unless the more prosperous churches of St. Louis see their opportunity and make this "mother church" an object of united missionary effort.

One wonders sometimes whether the Church of Christ has forgotten its mission. It is heartening to witness these latter-day evidences not only of the Church's awakening, but also of the development of a civic conscience on this vital question.

THE SALOON A PUBLIC NUISANCE.

A SAD day is this for the saloon. The old and easy ways of evading prohibition laws appear to be losing their effectiveness. "The Nuisance Act" which recently went into effect in Tennessee was directed against the three cities of Chattanooga, Memphis and Nashville which have defied the rest of the state, and it puts the enforcement of the laws into the hands of the judiciary. Hundreds of saloons went out of business in a day. Prohibition laws will not enforce themselves and sheriffs are often timid or corrupt; but such acts as the Tennessee "Nuisance Act" show what can be done in a state with large cities in which the police power is inert or corrupted by the saloon. After all, what is so simple, so logical or so truthful as to declare the saloon a nuisance? Does not every one know that is what it is?

ARE WE LOSING OUR SENSE OF HUMOR?

WE ARE trying hard not to lose it. We pay high prices for "comic" supplements, and read their painful attempts at fun with painful patience. England records a decline in the number of so-called comic papers, but that may not imply any real decrease in humor. In America the humorists are largely turned preachers; and they give us homilies in paragraphs, jingles and cartoons. Mr. Walter Emmanuel, the famous "Chariviria" of "Punch" believes that more men are writing humor now than ever and that the humor is of higher quality. Let us hope so. We need humor, free from malice or muck, humor that broadens the sympathies, warms the heart, and lessens the friction of life. Give us clean, wholesome, happy humor. There is many a pretentious folly masquerading before high heaven in the guise of philosophy, science or religion, which never would have outlived its second summer had not men lost their sense of humor.

YESTERDAY'S GRIEF.

KATHERINE LEE BATES, IN CENTURY MAGAZINE.

The rain that fell a-yesterday is ruby on the roses,
  Silver on the poplar leaf, and gold on willow stem;
The grief that chanced a-yesterday is silence that incloses
  Holy loves where time and chance shall never trouble them.

The rain that fell a-yesterday makes all the hillside glisten,
  Coral on the laurel and beryl on the grass;
The grief that chanced a-yesterday has taught the soul to listen
  For whispers of eternity in all the winds that pass.

O faint of heart, storm-beaten, this rain will gleam tomorrow,
  Flame within the columbine and jewels on the thorn.
Heaven in the forget-me-not; though sorrow now be sorrow,
  Yet sorrow shall be beauty in the magic of the morn.

The Larger Christian World

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Harper's Weekly Gives Tribute to Mott.

Harper's Weekly for March 21 has a two-page article on "John R. Mott, Christian Statesman," and in addition devotes a column of editorial comment to his personality and work. In justification of this seeming departure, the editor has this to say:

What things matter? It is the special function of Harper's Weekly to try to select elements in American life which it believes do matter, and to give them emphasis. Religion matters. It matters emphatically in this age of disappearing sanctions and of new standards. Who is doing most to connect religion with the lives of men today? Some observers of ability answer, John R. Mott. That opinion explains why one of the most quietly influential citizens in the country called Mr. Mott "the greatest man alive."

Speaking of Mr. Mott's manner of work as observed in his recent New York campaign among students, the Weekly says:

What Mott gives his audience is the simple old-time talk of an "abounding life" through a personal belief. He devotes half of one hour bringing home the sense of guilt to the individual soul. He shows you your life as a battleground where you are beset by temptation and defeated from time to time by sin. He then tells you he sees by your face that he is speaking to individual need, and that you are asking "What is there for me?" . . . Your better self is dead, but Christ can communicate life—life abounding, wider, deeper, of more volume, than the sterile withered surface life you have been living—life, Life.

But, the editor explains, the speaker does not forget the "exact plans" of action, which always follow. Vague emotions are crystalized by some definite step. "He never starts anything unless he can see it through."

The cover of this issue of Harper's Weekly bears a reproduction of a telegram from President Wilson regarding Mr. Mott. These are the President's words:

Certainly one of the most nobly useful men in the world. I have the greatest admiration for him and the most profound confidence in his extraordinary character and abilities.

A "Truce of God" Proposed.

Following the report made by Dr. Newman Smyth, Doctor Roberts and Doctor Ainslie, to the Faith and Order Conference of the Episcopal advisory committee, Doctor Manning and Mr. R. H. Gardiner, as chairman and secretary of the committee respectively, have issued a proclamation asking for a truce of God among all Christian organizations. The following are some of the significant words of the Proclamation. They will have especial interest for Disciples:

"From the mission field the long-outstanding problem of Christian unity has been brought by the providence of God and set directly in the way before all communions. No solution can be found without conference; surrender offers no remedy. To prepare for the conference a truce must be proclaimed. The love of Christ for the world constrains us to ask you to join with us and with His disciples of every name in proclaiming among the churches throughout Christendom 'A Truce of God.' Let the questions that have troubled us be fairly and clearly stated. Let scholars, Catholic and Protestant, give freely to the people whatever light from their historical studies they can throw over these subjects. More than that, it is of essential importance for us to seek to understand what in the religious experience of others are the things of real value which they would not lose, and which should be conserved in the one household of faith. We pray, also, that each Christian communion may avoid, so far as possible, any controversial declaration of its own position in relation to others, but rather that all things be said and done as if in preparation for the coming together of faithful disciples from every nation and tongue to implore a fresh outpouring of God's Holy Spirit. Before all differences, doubt, and misgivings, we would hold up the belief that the Lord's Prayer for the oneness of His disciples was intended to be fulfilled; and that it ought not to be impossible in the comprehension of the Church, as it is practicable in the state, for men of various temperaments and divergent convictions to dwell together on agreed principles of unity. We would therefore urge all who hold positions of leadership or authority in the Church to labor without ceasing to work out in this generation, by mutual recognition and possible readjustments, a practical basis of unity in liberty, in truth, in power, and in peace. To this end we ask your prayers."

Foreign Mission Statistics in 1913.

According to the Missionary Review of the World nearly sixteen and one-half million dollars was given in the United States and Canada last year for Protestant Christian missions outside of these two countries. This includes $420,867.19 spent by educational and medical organizations and $414,413.91 used by home missionary societies outside of United States and Canada.

Comparing this with one year ago, the "Home Base Committee" figures show a falling off of nearly one million dollars, but this apparent decrease is largely accounted for by a different method of computing the statistics. Last year's figures of this committee were no doubt too large, and the actual amount spent by foreign missionary societies for foreign work in 1912 was more nearly represented by the amount given in the statistics compiled for the Review by Dr. Louis Meyer—namely, $15,590,533. The Home Base Committee figures would, therefore, show a slight increase for 1913—the total amount received being $15,622,763.57, exclusive of that reported by educational, medical and home mission organizations.

What Reforms Are Needed Most?

The Christian Work asked a number of prominent men the question, "What reform would you most like to see accomplished in 1914, and why?" Replies from a number are published in a late issue of this paper. Here are two of them: Dr. J. T. Stone, moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly wrote: "I would say that if there is any one thing which I would desire to see more than another in 1914, it is an outpouring of God's Holy Spirit upon the entire Church, that we may believe more potentially in prayer, and work more directly to reach the souls of men, that they may grow in grace and in the knowledge and faith of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, Congregationalist, write: "I would like to see a new accentuation of the timeless truth that vital character is the essential of victorious construction. That our present passion for social service will soon become pale-faced and anæmic unless the quickened aspiration for truth in the inward part has new vogue. Permanent improvements in life develop from the inside out, not from the outside in. Varnish shines; it is virtue which saves."

Universalists to Evangelize New York.

What promises to be the most comprehensive scheme of evangelization ever attempted by the Universalist Church is planned by the New York state convention of Universalists. The movement began three years ago, when a group of Universalist ministers in the Mohawk valley proposed a series of meetings for that district and looked ahead to a larger series later.

Each year new developments have led to an increased activity, and at the last state convention at Herkimer, last October, a resolution was passed calling for a "state-wide awakening" during the winter. Rev. G. Delbert Walker, state superintendent, was made chairman of a committee to organize the movement, and for three months he, with his co-workers, has been engaged in outlining the campaign and distributing information.

The state is divided into groups and nearly every minister will be called into the service. Five meetings each will be held in ninety churches. Five singing evangelists will be sent from place to place. To advertise the meetings 1,000 posters have been distributed, 50,000 leaflets, 8,500 plans, 12,000 postal cards and 10,000 song sheets.

Governor Eberhart Lauds Church.

Before a large audience at Trinity Methodist Church, Minneapolis, Governor Eberhart of Minnesota recently gave utterance to a sentiment strongly favoring the Church: "To perpetuate my name I would rather have it transcribed with the Church than to simply have it carved on marble or to have it entered on the records as governor of the state. There never was a time when the standing of an honest, sincere Christian was higher than it is today. The Churches do a valuable service in getting the people together and giving them something to think about that leads to the highest living that can be practiced."

A "Keynote" of New Haven Meeting.

At the recent meeting of the Religious Education Association held at New Haven, Rev. O. C. Helming, chairman of the Congregational Commission on Religious Education, sounded the keynote of the gathering of Sunday-school workers by declaring that the Church must now emphasize the value of the inner life because social conditions were tending more and more to stress the value of the outer life. He held that Sabatier's postulate that man is incurably religious must be interpreted in such manner as to give to religious education its proper task of developing the latent religious instinct. The Sunday-school must realize that its task is to transform conduct, not to form it.

Pastor Builds Own Church.

Franklin St. Memorial Brethren Church, Baltimore, certainly will stand as a memorial to the pastor, Rev. Edward M. Leech, for he not only designed it, but was general contractor for the edifice, reports the Congregationalist. He not only designed the edifice, but the church plant, including the parsonage and the sexton's house, which flank the church on each side, is the result of the work of the brain and the hands of the pastor. The group cost $27,000, exclusive of the architect's, the general contractor's fee, both of which Mr. Leech saved, the material from the old building, torn down for the new edifice, and the site, which the congregation owns in fee simple. The total value of the plant is placed at $40,000.

Not Ready for Union.

The Presbyterian and Reformed Churches of the United States have held a council through their representatives on the subject of organic union. Such a union of the Churches holding to the Presbyterian system would create a denomination with a total membership of 3,000,000. Practically all the speakers in the council agreed that the time has not yet come for such a union to be immediately consummated.

Unity in Massachusetts.

An evidence of the growing spirit of unity among the Churches comes from Roxbury, Mass. The Congregational, Baptist, Methodist, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Friends, and Advent Churches are uniting in a pre-Easter series of week-day meetings. On Good Friday from noon till three o'clock the hours of the Cross will be kept in the Dudley street Baptist Church, with addresses by Roxbury pastors. On the evening of Good Friday in the same church this Baptist congregation has invited the other Christians to commune with them.

Brooklyn Y. M. C. A. Receives Gift.

Herbert L. Pratt has given to the Brooklyn Y. M. C. A. seventeen acres of land at Overland Park, Staten island, for a summer camp for boys. The plot has nearly eight acres of water front on Prince's bay, with a thick woodland at the upper end. An athletic field will be laid out and a permanent building erected to serve as winter headquarters and storage for camp paraphernalia. The camp has been located for some years at Arverne on the shore of Jamaica bay, where the association has rented property. During last season from May 30 to Sept. 15 over 300 boys were at the camp.

Baptists and Congregationalists to Unite?

Once more the question of a working union between the Baptist and Congregationalist fellowship is being agitated. Advocates of the union assert that it would involve no sacrifice of principle no either side, although up to the present they give no details as to how this ideal result can be effected. When all is said and done, remarks the Watchman-Examiner (Baptist), the teaching of the Scriptures concerning baptism is not a matter which should baffle the intelligence and scholarship and spiritual discernment of two great bodies of Christian people otherwise in cordial agreement.

Memorial to Deceased Sexton.

Certainly unique and just as certainly worthy is the recent act of the Second Presbyterian Church of Chicago, in placing in the church building a memorial tablet in honor of the deceased sexton of this church, Edwin L. Bradley. Commenting upon this act, The Continent remarks: "Mr. Bradley in his own profoundly conscientious sense of his own service was every whit as much a minister of God as any man who ever stood in the pulpit. Keeping the church fit to worship in was a sacred duty which he followed for fifty-one years with a consecration absolutely devoted and spiritual in every fiber."

Will Push Moslem Campaign.

Dr. S. M. Zwemer and half a dozen other missionaries to the Moslems compose a party which under the lead of Marion Lawrance, is conducting a series of thirteen conferences in as many cities, beginning in Grand Rapids, Michigan. Other points will be visited in Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York. Effort will be made to arouse interest in Moslem work and obtain funds for two Sunday-school workers to be stationed in the far East to arouse interest there in Sunday-school work.

Brighter Features Urged for Church.

Novel and entertaining features to brighten the customary formal church services are needed to interest the modern congregation, declared Rev. John McNeill of Toronto, Canada, before the recent midwinter international Bible conference, held at Washington, D. C.

"Most church congregations of today," said Dr. McNeill, "are comprised of people who need awakening from the dead. The only time during a sermon when a person's face is at all radiant is when the sermon ends."

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan of London and Rev. John H. Jowett of New York addressed the conference, urging the necessity for belief in God and the Bible. Dr. Morgan said a man need not be a slave to serve God, "he needs only to be friendly."

Cincinnati Pastors Exchange Pulpits.

Recently fifty-nine Protestant pastors of Cincinnati exchanged pulpits for a Sunday with gratifying results. A contemporary enthusiastically proposes making the first Sunday morning of each month an "exchange" Sunday.

Interdenominational Summer Conferences.

Locations and dates of the Interdenominational Summer Conferences, under the auspices of the Missionary Education Movement, are announced for 1914, as follows: Blue Ridge, N. C., June 26-July 5. Native Christians Effective Witnesses.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement of Great Britain, in its recent conference, found its most effective speakers in native Christians from Africa and India. Officers from both the army and navy gave enthusiastic testimony to the value of missions as they had observed it while engaged in the foreign service.

Presbyterian Pension Fund Grows.

The Ministerial Pension Fund of the Presbyterian Church was enriched the last week in February by gifts totaling $200,000. One gift was for $50,000, and another for $100,000.

He has had experience as lecturer and worker with the moving picture of The Making of a Boy Scout, and had charge of the headquarters of the Knights of King Arthur for several years.

Of Human Interest

Helen Keller in Chicago.

Helen Keller was recently interviewed in Chicago by a local reporter. Mrs. Macy, her teacher, accompanied the wonderful blind girl here on her visit.

Being asked what she thought of Chicago, Miss Keller said she was impressed with its bigness, its rush, its smoke and its noise.

"How does she know?" the reporter asked Mrs. Macy. Miss Keller answered for herself:

"I smell the smoke—I feel the noise. I have just come from Duluth—a beautiful city—it has such a wholesome atmosphere. It runs along the lake like a schoolboy—so full of life and health."

"Chicago runs along the lake, too," interposed Mrs. Macy.

"And like a schoolboy, some say an overgrown schoolboy," the reporter added. Mrs. Macy interpreted it to Helen, who laughed and retorted like a flash:

"Whose—clothes—are—too—tight—for—him—to—run—in, e-e-h?"

Riley on "Poetry."

Perhaps better than anything else one might select, the poems of James Whitcomb Riley disclose the secret of the poet's success. First of all, their utter artlessness, which is characteristic of all Riley's writings, is bound to attract. Second, his ability to take his audience into his confidence, to put himself at "You and I" with the world, is a manner which is bound to win the love and sympathy of those who read his works. In speaking of the matter, Riley himself said:

"The public desires nothing but what is absolutely natural, and so perfectly natural as to be fairly artless. It cannot tolerate affectation, and it takes little interest in the classical production. It demands simple sentiments that come direct from the heart. * * * Thus I learned to judge and value my work."

Having written his first poetry merely for recitations, as he was conducting a lecture tour throughout Indiana when most of his best early verse was written, Mr. Riley had an opportunity to judge exactly what impression his various poems had on the average mind. Whenever he found that a particular type of poetry failed to make an impression or did not meet wholly with favor, he tried aonther type.

The picture of Lincoln leaving his home at Springfield to take up the duties of President was one that was held fast in Senator Cullom's memory. It was a solemn leave-taking, one without noisy demonstration. In the air there was a feeling of melancholy, a sense of impending disaster, which seemed to sit on the chief figure in the picture with particular weight. Just before the train left Mr. Lincoln appeared on the rear platform to utter his farewell words. "Every head was bared, as if to receive the benediction," said the senator in describing the event to a reporter.

"Abraham Lincoln," he continued, "was one of the greatest observers and the least observed until he became famous, and then the people of the world sought to see him. Lincoln was never vain except in feeling that he knew just as much about matters as others.

"For instance, when he was going to New York he gave Joe Medill and Doctor Ray his speech to look over and asked them to make some suggestion if they desired to do so. They took the speech and made a great many suggestions, amending and improving it as they supposed, but when the time came to make the speech Lincoln failed to adopt a single one of them. The speech was given exactly as Lincoln had prepared it originally. Afterward he never mentioned the subject to them nor they to him."

Lincoln Relics Sold.

A blue ironstone china plate used by Abraham Lincoln in his home in Springfield, Ill., in 1837 brought $42.50 recently at a sale. An old knife and fork, steel with bone handles, sold for $52.50. The martyred President's law office lamp sold for $160 and an old chair used by him brought the same price. These four Lincoln relics were taken by Dr. C. A. Quincy Norton, with other relics, from the Lincoln log cabin, which was exhibited in New York in 1866, in lieu of fees which were to have been paid him for lecturing at the cabin.

Doctor Norton being a descendant of the famous old New England Quincy family, came into possession of some of his most interesting pieces through this connection. One of these, which sold for $66, was a pair of brass mantel lamps, a wedding present to John Hancock upon his marriage to Dorothy Quincy by the father of the bride.

A lamp used by Harriet Beecher Stowe in writing "Uncle Tom's Cabin," presented to Doctor Norton by Dr. C. E. Stowe, her husband, sold for $71. A beautiful old brass marine candlestick, captured by the U. S. S. Constitution from the British ship Guerriere, in the war of 1812, went for $36. A china candlestick from the confederate "white house" in 1863 went to a Milwaukee museum for $8.

Extravagance in Art.

A Pittsburg philanthropist said, apropos of P. A. B. Widener's recent purchase of the "Panshanger Madonna" for $700,000:

"Our millionaire collectors pay ridiculous prices for their pictures, and they appear to be proud instead of ashamed of their extravagance. In this respect they differ from the old Duke of Wellington, of whom I once heard the following anecdote:

"The artist who painted the 'Battle of Waterloo,' being sent for to receive the price of his picture, found the duke counting over a number of piles of bank notes. Venturing to observe that a check upon his grace's bank would have answered the purpose and given less trouble, the artist was interrupted by the ducal growl:

"'Do you think I am going to let the people at my bank know I've been such a fool as to pay a price like this?'"

A Woman's Reasoning.

Ex-Mayor Shank of Indianapolis, discussing the high cost of living, said:

"It's the consumer's fault, after all. The consumer should make laws to protect himself against rapacity. Judging from present conditions the consumer's ideas seem a good deal like the bride's.

"A husband, a few weeks after the honeymoon, came home and said in desolate accents:

"'My love, I'm heart-broken. My salary has been cut down 15 per cent.'

"'Oh, that's nothing,' cried the young bride cheerily. 'Cheap & Co. are advertising perfectly lovely things cut down 25 per cent.'"

Irving Bacheller Tells Story.

Irving Bacheller was introduced one day by a mutual friend to a western mountaineer, says the St. Paul Dispatch.

"Mr. Bacheller," exclaimed his friend to the mountaineer, "is an author of repute in the East."

"Oh, yes," drawled the mountaineer. "I know of him. I was locked up in my cabin here by the snow two winters ago and I only had two books to read the whole five months—your book, sir," he said, turning to Mr. Bacheller, "and the Bible, and I read them through several times."

"Indeed!" said the author, a smile of satisfaction wreathing his face.

"Yes, sir," continued the old mountaineer, "and I never knew before how interesting the Bible was."

Arguing With Senator Cullom.

"The late Shelby Cullum," said a Springfield veteran, "was a bad man to argue with.

"I argued with him once on war. He accused me of being weak-kneed in my principles. He said I reminded him of old Cal Clay.

"He saw Cal rolling along home one evening, he explained, full of apple-jack, and so he said to him:

"'Why, Cal, you told me once that you were a teetotaler.'

"'So Ah is, Mars Shelby,' said old Cal, 'so Ah is; only, sah, Ah hain't bigoted.'"

The World is Growing Better

Western County Fights Saloon.

The supervisors of Alameda county, Cal., in which is located Oakland, the third largest city of the Pacific Coast, have taken a unique stand in regard to the responsibility of saloon men for the actions of men to whom they sell too much liquor. They have revoked the license of a saloonkeeper in whose place, after he had made threats of violence against Judge Thomas Power, Charles Quinton was shot and killed recently by the latter in self-defense.

District Attorney W. H. L. Hynes, in a report to the supervisors, declared that Edward Roderick, a saloonkeeper, had sold drinks to Quinton although he knew Quinton was drunk and had heard him threaten to kill Judge Power on sight. Hynes declared that the liquor augmented the deadly passion which Roderick knew existed in Quinton's brain, and said he was convinced that if Roderick had refused to sell liquor to Quinton the latter never would have attacked Judge Power and lost his life in consequence.

Hynes' report was approved by Superior Judge F. B. Ogden, who tried Powers for killing Quinton. The supervisors unanimously agreed with the Judge and the District Attorney, and peremptorily revoked Roderick's license.

No such action has ever before been taken in the United States, and it speaks well for the law-abiding citizens of Oakland and Alameda county.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

The Story of a Blind Singer

Something of the Career of Fanny Crosby Whose Birthday Was Celebrated Last Month—Reported by the Baptist Standard.

FANNY CROSBY, the author of scores of hymns which Christians sing and will sing for generations, loved to dwell on the words of Milton on his blindness, for she too was blind. Unlike Milton, however, she did not remember what it was to see. Her eyesight was lost when she was six weeks old, in consequence of a physician's mistaken treatment of her inflamed eyelids. The result of his error was a lifelong sorrow to him, but Fanny Crosby did not think of him except with thankfulness.

"If I could meet him now," she once said, "I would say, 'Thank you, thank you'—over and over again—for making me blind, if it was through your agency it came about.'"

To those who expressed wonder at this strange statement the blind Christian explained that she knew that the blindness was not a blunder on God's part. "I verily believe that it was His intention that I should live my days in physical darkness, so as to be better prepared to sing His praises and incite others so to do. I could not have written thousands of hymns—many of which, if you will pardon me for saying it are sung all over the world—if I had been hindered by the distraction of seeing all the interesting and beautiful objects that would have been presented to my notice."

When Fanny was five years old, her mother took her from the home in Croton watershed to New York City, in order to ask a specialist if there was any hope of restoring sight to the eyes of the child. The long journey by sloop down the Hudson proved fruitless; sight was gone beyond recall. The mother's heart was very sad, but Fanny, though so young, was already becoming reconciled.

When Fanny was eight years old, her parents moved to Ridgefield, Conn. There she continued to hope and pray for an education, but when the answer to her prayer was delayed, she did not fret. To express her trust in God she wrotes these lines:

Oh, what a happy soul I am;
Although I can not see,
I am resolved that in this world
Contented will I be.
How many blessings I enjoy
That other people don't,
To weep and sigh because I'm blind,
I can not, nor I won't.

As a child she joined with her playmates in roaming about the old home place. But it was her great delight to sit and "listen to the voices of nature," which seemed to lift her nearer God. To Him she would go with her longings for an education, that she might be somebody for His glory. "Often," she says, "I would creep off alone, kneel down, and ask God if though blind, if I was not one of His children, if, in all His great world, He had not some little place for me; and it often seemed to me that I could hear Him say, 'Do not be discouraged, little girl; you shall some day be happy, and useful, even in your blindness.'"

As Fanny heard the hymns in church Sunday-school, she sometimes wondered who wrote them, and longed herself some day to be a writer of hymns. She stored her mind with passages of Scripture, taught her by her grandmother and mother, and so had necessary training for what was to be her future work.

In 1834 Mrs. Crosby read to her daughter a circular sent by a friend, to tell of the New York Institution for the Blind. As the announcement was read, the blind girl clapped her hands and exclaimed:

"Oh, thank God, he has answered my prayers, just as I knew He would."

On March 7, 1835, the doors of the institution opened to admit the little singer. There kind teachers showed her the way to knowledge and her heart was full. For several years she studied, all the while expressing herself in verse. For her facility she was praised so much that one of her instructors thought it wise to warn her that she must not become conceited. "Remember that whatever talent you possess belongs wholly to God, and that you ought to give Him the credit for all that you do." Then he, in a very kindly way, forbade her writing any poetry for three months. She tried to be cheerful but she soon began to mourn because of her longing to write. She finally became so listless that it was thought wise to remove the prohibition.

At the age of twenty-two the blind girl became one of the instructors in the institution. After teaching all day she gave so much of the night to study and writing poetry that her health began to fail, and it was necessary to send her away for a visit. But she reaped the fruit of her toil when, in 1844, her first volume, "The Blind Girl, and Other Poems," was issued.

As early as 1851 Miss Crosby began to write songs, but most of her hymn writing was done after her marriage, in 1858, to Mr. Alexander Van Alstyne. Her husband urged her to continue using her maiden name in giving her poetry to the world; so, through all their married life of forty-two years she did as requested, and as "Fanny Crosby" she will always be known.

Some eight thousand hymns were written, the best known of these being, "Hold Thou My Hand," "Yes, There is Pardon for You," "All the Way My Saviour Leads Me," "Pass Me Not, O Gentle Saviour," "Saved by Grace," "He Hideth My Soul," "Meet Me There," "Rescue the Perishing," "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," "I Am Thine, O Lord," and "When My Life Work is Ended." Sometimes these were composed under stress of great excitement within a few minutes, while often they were the result of hours and days of thought.

Perhaps the best known of Fanny Crosby's hymns is "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," which was written in twenty minutes for Mr. Doane, who declared he must have it before going on a journey. "I Am Thine, O Lord," also was written very hastily for Mr. Doane, while "My Life Work is Ended" was written for another composer.

Once Mr. Ira D. Sankey, the gospel singer, wrote to her:

"I wish that when you get to heaven (as you may before I will) that you will watch for me at the pearly gate at the eastern side of the city; and when I get there, I'll take you by the hand and lead you along the golden street, up to the throne of God, and there we'll stand before the Lamb, and say to Him, 'And now we see Thee face to face, saved by Thy matchless, boundless grace, and we are satisfied.'"

But Mr. Sankey went to heaven first; he it was who waited for Fanny Crosby. At ninety-two years of age, she followed him into the presence of the King who led her by strange paths to see His glory and do His work.

CONSECRATION OF MINISTERS' WIVES.

The Fargo Courier News pays a beautiful editorial tribute to the consecration of ministers' wives in general, and points its praise of them as a class with a touching story of a pastor's wife who died recently in that city, self-forgetful to the last. The devoted woman's heart had long been concerned for the need of better equipment in the junior department of the Sunday-school where she had been superintendent, and the falling shadow of death brought her an idea of how to secure it. Just before her life went out, she sent as a last personal request to the older members of the Sunday-school that they would buy no flowers for her coffin, but would instead give the money that flowers would cost for furnishing her juniors with better accommodations.

BELONGING TO THE RABBLE.

When Miss Margaret Wilson, the President's daughter, who is interested in various forms of social service, was pleading at a league meeting in New York for the use of public schoolhouses as gathering places for the people, a woman asked whether throwing open these buildings "would not lead to their misuse by the rabble?" Whereupon Miss Wilson pertinently asked: "What do you mean by 'rabble'?" The Springfield "Republican" says the question is not easy to answer, but declares that it would be as extreme to deny that no "rabble" exists, as to say that there are no mobs. The "Republican" proceeds to point out some people who unquestionably belong:

"In this particular context it may do to say that the rabble is composed of people, rich or poor, who deface scenery, monuments and public buildings, carry off spoons and other portables as souvenirs, mutilate books in public libraries, spit in street-cars, theaters and other public places, and in general show boorishness, egotism and contempt for the rights and the feelings of others. Nobody is compelled to belong to it a day longer than he chooses."

HOMES.

O little homes, ye little homes of love.
Strength of a man; a woman's song; laugh of a child;
Warmth of a fire; glow of a lamp; though wild
The wind without, and grim the skies above.

O little homes, set close at every hand!
Ye narrow walled-in worlds of joys and fears,
Built of the commonplace of smiles and tears,
Ye are the heart and sinew of the land!

—Flossy Crannell Means, in Youth's Companion.

Disciples Table Talk

New Disciples Hospital at Kansas City.

L. J. Marshall, of Wabash Avenue, Kansas City, Mo., who is Secretary of the Hospital Board, reports that the contract has been signed, and bond executed, for the erection of the new Hospital building on a lot at 27th and Paseo Blvd., Kansas City. The contract calls for completion of building within nine months. This will be the most modern hospital building in Kansas City, which means one of the most modern west of the Mississippi.

W. H. Book Serves "Spiritual Menu."

W. H. Book, pastor at the Tabernacle Church of Christ, Columbus, Ind., has announced special topics for Sunday evening discussion. Among these are the following: "The Man in Jail and Who Put Him There?" "Why Men Do Not Go to Church." "The Thing Columbus Most Needs." "The Kind of Men Columbus Needs." "The Power of the Newspaper for Good or Bad." "Choosing an Occupation." "The Power of Habit." "Choosing a Companion or Selecting a Mate?" "Dirt, Sickness, Death, Undertakers." "Things That Make a Home."

A California Veteran Celebrates.

J. W. Craycroft of Modesto, Cal., on the 4th of March, celebrated his seventy-second birthday. In 1864 Mr. Craycroft came to California in company with S. K. Hallem. In 1865 he was sent out as an evangelist. He has preached over most of California and as far north as Oregon. He has not been in the ministry for several years, but has always been active. He was a member of the State Board when Garfield Park was secured for a state encampment by the sea. He is an elder of the church at Modesto.

Ohio's Convention Preparing.

A committee, with Dr. N. H. Chaney as chairman, has been appointed to arrange for entertaining the Ohio State Sunday-school Convention in Youngstown, June 16, 17 and 18. It is expected that there will be 3,000 out-of-town guests, and it will be the biggest affair in the history of the city. It is thought all the larger downtown churches will be pressed into service for the sessions of the convention.

S. California Convention, July 27-Aug. 2.

M. D. Clubb, the Southern California Secretary, says, regarding the next Convention: "Preparations have already begun for our next convention at Long Beach, which will be held July 27 to August 2. The convention this year will include only one Sunday, it having been thought wise to shorten the time a little. This year we consider ourselves very fortunate in having secured George Hamilton Combs, of Kansas City, for extensive service. At the close of our convention he will deliver three addresses at the Interdenominational Assembly which meets annually at Long Beach. Our Long Beach Conventions are more largely attended perhaps than any similar state gatherings in the United States. Our enrollment runs above 2,000."

An Educational Survey.

Alva W. Taylor, the Secretary of our Social Service Commission, has secured money for the making of a survey of the educational status of our ministry. It is impossible to get the educational pedigree of every preacher in the brotherhood, he writes, so the scientific device known as a "cross section analysis," will be adopted. Letters are being sent to some 250 men in various parts of the country with the request that each report upon the educational status of the preachers within a specified district. The results will make a summary representative of the entire ministry. It is to be hoped every man will respond and help in this effort to "know ourselves."

H. M. Hall to Portland, Ore.

H. Maxwell Hall, who has been making his residence in Franklin, Ind., for several months, following his resignation of the work at Uniontown, Pa., has received a very urgent call to become the pastor of First church, Portland, Oregon, at a salary of $2,700 a year. This call comes to Mr. Hall without solicitation or application, upon the recommendation of President A. McLean, of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Z. T. Sweeney of New York City and others. Since last fall Mr. Hall has been giving needed assistance to his father, Dr. Homer J. Hall, of Franklin, Ind., who is secretary of the Temperance Board of the Disciples. He has been doing large service for the Board. It was largely through his efforts that this work, at the Toronto convention, was placed on the list of recognized societies which the churches are asked to support with regular offerings and a regular Sunday was established on which the claims of this board are to be presented to the churches. He succeeded in securing an opportunity to present the work in many prominent churches and as a result of his activity over 200 churches have definitely promised to support the board this year, which in past years not more than fifty have done. In company with W. J. Wright and Royal J. Dye, he successfully presented the interests of the Board before the executive committee of the Men and Millions Movement, at St. Louis. An appropriation of $50,000 was secured. Mr. Hall will begin his work at Portland on Easter Sunday.

Rev. B. A. Abbott, of St. Louis, who will discuss "The Present Status of the Union Movement" at the Lexington Congress.

F. F. Grim at Beckley, W. Va.

Frederick F. Grim, pastor at Beckley, W. Va., writes that he is leading a busy life there. In addition to his pastoral work he is teaching in the forenoons at Beckley Institute. This institute, with R. A. Smith, a Butler-Yale man, as principal, is having splendid success. Prof. W. R. Howell, another Yale man, has been with the institute since the first of the year, and is proving a valuable acquisition. Mr. Grim reports 35 additions to the membership of the Beckley church, since he took charge last November.

Drake Loses Staunch Friend.

Norman Haskins, friend of Drake university since its very beginning, donor of the stadium, and one of the most liberal benefactors of the school, is dead. The passing of this staunch friend of the university came on March 3 at the Auditorium hotel, in Denver, and was entirely without warning to Mr. Haskins' Des Moines friends. All down through the years since the foundation of the school Mr. Haskins had been among its most loyal supporters. For many years he had been a member of the board of trustees and had had an advisory voice in the business conduct of the school. Having accumulated a goodly amount of this world's goods through keen business judgment and foresight, Mr. Haskins gave much of his money to schools and churches. His most liberal donation to Drake university was for the stadium. He gave the finest athletic park in the middle west in 1902, and since that time his gifts for this purpose have reached about $50,000. The stadium was given in memory of Mr. Haskins' only son, Alvin, who died in 1894. This magnificent athletic field had a treasured spot in the heart of the aged philanthropist and was his particular pride. A memorial service was held at the university.

Norwood (Cincinnati) Church Prospers.

Under C. R. Stauffer's leadership the school at Norwood has grown into a membership of 1190, during the last nineteen months. It is the largest school in the county. Mr. Stauffer and his aides have made a canvass of the homes of Norwood, and enlisted new members for the work. An unusual feature of the school is a nursery. On Easter Sunday, the new church building will be dedicated. It is to be devoted to social service as well as to worship, having a gymnasium, shower bath and game rooms.

Gov. Clarke's Family are "Drakes."

If Governor and Mrs. George W. Clarke of Iowa should be able to gather their children, with their respective husbands and wives, together, it would look like a Drake reunion on a condensed scale. Governor and Mrs. Clarke are graduates of Oskaloosa college, later taken over by Drake, and are listed with the other graduates of the school as Drake alumni. In addition, all of their children and children-at-law are "Drakes."

Every Member Canvass at Hannibal, Mo.

The church at Hannibal, Mo., made an Every Member canvass for missions March 22. All families both in the city and country were visited. Ninety solicitors went in twos. The results were very gratifying, writes George A. Campbell, pastor.

Special Sermons at Pekin, Ill.

O. C. Bolman, pastor at Pekin, Ill., reports that he has just completed a series of sermons on the Messages to the Seven Churches of Asia. The following is the series: "The Church That Lost Its First Love—Ephesus." "A Poor Church Highly Commended—Smyrna." "A Church in the Devil's Headquarters—Pergamos." "A Church With Good and Bad in It—Thyatira." "A Church With More Reputation than Piety—Sardis." "A Church Approved of the Lord—Philadelphia." "The Worst Church Of All—Laodicea."

A. L. Ward in Special Address.

On Sunday evening, March 15, A. L. Ward, pastor of Central Church, Lebanon, Ind., gave his illustrated lecture-sermon on "The Moral Message of Great Paintings." More than 600 people were present to hear this. Recently he made an address to a District W. C. T. U. Convention on, "Heredity, Eugenics, and the Power of Women."

It is the one opportunity given for a serious and perfectly frank discussion of questions of doctrine and practice among the Disciples and the world of theological thought. It stands for mental and spiritual quickening. Great and vital themes are presented reverently and critically. Speakers of well known ability are chosen to furnish a program which does not permit of either dullness or loose preparation. It is a coming together of those who believe that old truth has not been exhausted by past use or interpretation. It is a call to the watchmen of Zion to report on the new and fresh mornings which are ever dawning."

Columbus, O.'s Ex-Mayor Speaks.

At a banquet given by the Lancaster, O., Men's Brotherhood, Ex-Mayor Marshall, of Columbus gave an address on "The Lessons I Have Learned in Twenty-four Years' Experience in Columbus." He touched upon the saloon question and said the great and persistent effort toward its extermination today was because of its deadly destruction of the young men of the city, and since the supply of good young men from the country is being cut off the cities must save their boys. He predicted that Ohio will be a saloonless state in a very few years.

B. A. Jenkins in New York Hospital.

Burris A. Jenkins, pastor of the Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Mo., is in New York City where he will undergo an operation on his knee. Since he was a boy Mr. Jenkins has been subject to periodical attacks of severe pain in the knee joint and although the nature of the trouble is not definitely known, physicians say the operation should be attended with little or no danger.

Geo. H. Combs at Des Moines.

An excellent audience greeted Geo. H. Combs at University Place Church, Des Moines, Ia., when he delivered the third of the series of Bible lectures upon the Bondurant foundation. His subject was "The Christ in the Social Problem." He traced the development of the social consciousness from the crude individualism of remote antiquity up through the slow moving stages until under the impulse of the great principles of brotherhood in the teachings of Jesus we of today are coming upon the full flower of social responsibility.

Easter and the National Benevolent Association

A PATHETIC CRY OF HELPLESS OLD AGE.

The demand that is being made upon the Association by the churches for the care of their aged, indigent members increases. Every day brings its urgent appeal. Some of them are pathetic to the last degree.

An aged sister writing in her own behalf says, "With asthma and broken down in nerves and strength, with no home and no place to go, what am I to do if you do not take me in? Trusting in God that you will decide in my behalf, I remain, etc." Another writes, "I am at a loss to know what is to be done with Sister ———. She has worked very hard, but she is not able to work now, her health is gone. She has no home except mine and I am a widow and getting old." Another writes, "We have a sister in the church, that is not able to properly care for herself. She has no home, but is stopping with a family in the church, purely as a matter of brotherly kindness on their part. Would it be possible for you to arrange a place for her in one of your institutions?" Still another writing in her own behalf says, "Here I am in this condition of health, homeless and my dearest ones far from me and nothing but a widow's mite left. It would seem as though my heart would break. If you could help me to get a place somewhere, I will be so grateful to you and do all I can to help myself." And yet another writes, "One of our dear brethren will be compelled to go to the poorhouse, if we can not place him in one of the homes sustained by our brethren."

SOME TOUCHING MESSAGES.

These are the messages that come to us every day, a few of them only. The number and character of these appeals is enough to melt the heart of a stone. These do not come as a result of solicitation on the part of the Association. Experience has taught us that to advertise an open door, means to welcome no end of abuses and to burden the church with the care of undeserving and unworthy people, at the expense of those whose comfort should be our first thought. It means to take the bread of the children and cast it to the dogs.

These applications all come through the churches and the ministers, and since the churches are sustaining the Homes of the Association, nearly all the persons admitted are received upon their application and recommendation. The Association is not making a business of caring for people, it is simply the agent of the churches in the discharge of their duty toward their poor.

If the churches continue to send in applications, of course it will be necessary to send with them the funds for the support of the applicants. Brethren, it is a beautiful thing for you to desire to save worthy, aged members of your respective congregations from suffering and from the humiliations of having to receive public charity. It will be a far more beautiful thing, however, if the managers of these Homes could be saved from the unpleasant experiences of having to beg. If there is anything that ought to lead to hilarious giving, it is the care of the churches' poor.

BEARING ONE ANOTHER'S BURDENS.

By Otis Hawkins.

Yesterday I was called to the depot to meet an aged sister who was coming to the Christian Home for the Aged. When the train arrived we went into the coach and helped her out—a tottering, whitehaired, motherly woman, with half a century of Christian service to her credit and her face turned toward the setting sun. She has no home of her own and no near relatives to care for her. Her minister had made arrangements for her to come to the Home for Aged Disciples and she had come.

As we drove away from the train and up by the splendid building which the Christian Church has erected, and which it maintains for the care of its helpless and aged members, I thought how different was the fate of this woman from so many who, at her age, find themselves penniless and alone. The poorhouse or county farm must be their dwelling place, and barren, cheerless days follow each other tediously until the final summons sounds. But now, with a face radiating joy and peace, this old lady sat in the carriage and was driven out to her home. It was her "Father's House" to which she was going. God's children had builded it for such as she and her brothers and sisters were there to welcome her.

When she reached the Home she was lifted from the carriage. As her weary limbs could hardly carry her weight up the flight of steps at the entrance, we picked her up and carried her up. She looked around at her home, at the grounds and at the city stretched out all around her and I said to her: "Sister, this is your home now, and we want you to be comfortable and happy. You will find many here who will be your friends." She looked up at me with tears of joy in her dim old eyes as she said: "O brother, I always said that when our church did anything they did it well; but never dreamed of having a home like this. It's so nice, and O how I thank God for it."

OUR WORK FOR YOUNG BABIES.

The question is frequently asked, "Do you receive babies into our Homes?" This question is doubtless the result of the knowledge of the fact that it is far more difficult to care for young babies than it is older children. We are pleased to report that every Home under the auspices of the National Benevolent Association is a babies' home, not that all the Homes specialize in their care. Babies are orphans as much as older children. The age limits are from infancy to twelve years. It would be difficult to find a more attractive home for young babies than that which is provided by the Christian Orphans' Home of St. Louis. When the new building was erected five years ago, one ward was especially designed for the care of babies. That ward is thoroughly equipped, and babies in all stages of infancy are being received. The Association does not believe in the unnecessary separation of families, placing young children in one home and the older children in another. It seeks, as far as possible to keep families together. With our present equipment, especially with that of the Christian Orphan's Home of St. Louis, the Association is prepared to render the highest possible service to the unfortunate babyhood of our brotherhood and the country, the highest that consecrated Christian love and knowledge can render.

At one of the National Benevolent Association's Homes for the Aged.

"Loving in Deed and in Truth," the finest Easter exercise the Association has ever issued is now ready. It will be sent free in quantities to any school that will send an Easter offering to the National Benevolent Association, 2955 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

PERSONAL AND OTHERWISE.

F. W. Burnham, new pastor at Wilshire Boulevard, Los Angeles, delivered a series of masterly addresses on vital subjects in the Book of Acts at the School of Methods which recently closed its sessions in Los Angeles. The Los Angeles work is going well under Mr. Burnham's leadership.

C. R. Neel, pastor of the Bethany, Neb., church, spoke before the Lincoln Ministerial Association recently on the subject of "Mormonism." Mr. Neel had been pastor at Salt Lake City, Utah, before coming to Bethany and spoke with authority upon this subject.

Chas. S. Shirley, recently appointed as a missionary in Jamaica, called at the office of the Christian Century this week on his way to Jamaica. Mr. Shirley is in the employ of the C. W. B. M. and has been a student at Eureka College.

The Disciples' Missionary Union, of Greater New York, will hold a dinner meeting at the West Side Y. M. C. A. on April 14. E. E. Elliott, National Brotherhood Secretary, and the mission pastors will be the speakers.

J. H. Mohorter and the matron of the St. Louis Home of the National Benevolent Association recently spent a week at the Child Saving Institute at Omaha. This is the new home of the Association.

B. T. Wharton, after a seventeen-year pastorate, closes his work at Marshall, Mo., June 1. He would be glad to correspond with any church desiring a pastor beginning about that time.

Prof. Jas. S. Compton of Eureka College, has been appointed Asst. Professor of Zoology at the Biological Station of the University of Michigan for the summer of 1914.

All eyes will be centered on Lexington, Kentucky, April 28 to 30 on account of the Disciples Congress. This is a very important gathering and should be well attended.

OREGON'S FIRST SCHOOL OF METHODS.

Our first school of methods was a success in every particular.

We cannot too highly commend the work of Miss Lewis, Miss Maus and Mr. Clarke. They are specialists in their particular fields and were greatly appreciated for their work's sake.

Our enrollment (178) was the second largest and the number of graduates (52) the largest of any of their schools up to date. Twenty-eight of our own churches were represented with 129 enrolled. Other churches, including the following from Salem, Christian Science, First M. E., Friends, Baptists, First Presbyterian, Jason Lee M. E., First Congregational, with one from Portland Presbyterian and one from Los Angeles Presbyterian participated in the school.

The following shows the classification and graduates from each class:

	Enrollment.	Graduates.
Ministers	12	9
Superintendents	9	3
Other officers	19	11
Teachers	54	22
Students	84	11

It was unanimously voted to have a school next year. Eugene was chosen as the place of meeting.

In addition to the work of the special team, Rev. F. T. Porter in his Bible studies and Rev. F. W. Emerson on Organization and Management rendered valuable assistance.

We wish to express our gratitude to the American Christian Missionary Society for making possible this splendid school. We trust the results may fully justify the time and thought and means expended. We shall expect better work from our schools as a result of the splendid instruction given.

SOME HUMAN INTEREST LETTERS.

Indiana, Feb. 20, 1914.

Dear Brother:

I received my check today for $25. I have not sufficient language to express our gratitude. My poor sick wife was so overjoyed that she could scarcely eat her supper.

We were just a little puzzled as to where our next groceries were to come from, but this has brought new life and hope in our home.

God bless you all.

Fraternally,

Ohio, Feb. 20, 1914.

Board of Ministerial Relief,

My Dear Brethren in Christ:

May grace, mercy and peace from God our heavenly Father and from our Lord, Jesus Christ, be with you all. Amen.

My dear brethren, I cannot find language to express my grateful appreciation of the kindness and help you have shown me. I can only thank you, and may the blessing of Him whose servants we are bless and keep both you and yours, and may He preserve your whole spirit and soul and body blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Prayerfully and most gratefully,
Your Brother.

P. S.—I hope and pray, brethren, that before many months I shall be able, by the help of the Lord, to notify you that I can get along without assistance and that you can give it to some one else more needy.

COUNTY CONFERENCES OF CHURCHES.

The following schedule of county conferences in the Eastern District of the Indiana Christian churches has been arranged by G. I. Hoover, the State Evangelist of that district in co-operation with the officers of the county boards in the respective counties:

April 6 and 7 at Centerville, Wayne County.
April 7 and 8 at New Castle, Henry County.
April 8 and 9 at Muncie, Deleware County.
April 9 and 10 at Winchester, Randolph County.

The conference in each county will begin on the evening of one day and close on the evening of the next. Mrs. C. H. Greist, State President of the C. W. B. M.; C. W. Cauble, Corresponding Secretary Indiana Christian Missionary Association; Garry L. Cook, State Superintendent of Sunday-schools; Professor Charles E. Underwood, of Butler College; Joseph C. Todd, University Pastor Christian Church Students, Bloomington, and G. I. Hoover, State Evangelist Eastern District, will represent the great co-operative interests of the brotherhood of the state in these conferences.

The forenoon session of the second day in each conference will be devoted wholly to a consideration of the interests of the churches in the county. The discussion of the various county interests will be led by representatives of the county churches.

Every congregation in these countries is asked to send representatives to its respective county conference. The earnest co-operation of every minister working either as pastor or regular supply for the churches is very much desired.

"The Melting Pot"

LOOKING TOWARD THE ANNUAL HOME MISSION OFFERING IN MAY.

The Home Mission task in America is readily classified racially. Thus it is the business of the church to bring the Kingdom of God into the lives of Americans, European Immigrants, Negroes, Orientals, Indians, Mexicans, and mixed multitudes. Large numbers of our intelligent native American people are not even nominally connected with church life. There are 34,796,077 people over ten years of age in the United States who are outside of the membership of all the churches. This is more than one-third of the entire population. With hearts narrowed by greed for gain, and with the issue between Christ and Belial obscured by a divided denominationalism there is little hope until the Christianity of Christ gets possession of the churches.

When we turn to the foreign folk the situation might well appall Christian patriots. Only sixty of the ninety-three million population can boast of a native parentage. The remainder are foreigners, or children of foreigners. This immigrant army is received at the rate of one million a year. In thirty-three of our largest cities the foreign population exceeds that of the native American. There are more Irish and their children in the United States than in Ireland. In twelve years there came to the United States enough Italians to populate a city like Rome; enough Greeks to people two cities like Athens; more Poles than are in Warsaw, and more Scandinavians than are in Stockholm. God is bringing the ends of the earth to America that His church may teach "all nations" the "all things whatsoever He commanded." Twenty per cent of these immigrants coming to America return to their native heath—what an army of missionaries to foreign peoples 200,000 immigrants returning annually would make, if, along with American ribbons, hats, shirt waists, shoes and American ideas of domestic, economic, commercial and political life, they would take back to their countries also American ideas of the Kingdom of God. Beyond controversy, the greatest missionary opportunity God ever gave a generation of Christians He is now giving to the American Church in our Foreign population.

Then in this racial survey of Home Missions we must not overlook the ten millions of negroes, a large majority of whose hearts, heads and hands need training for useful service in the world's work. Nor the 250,000 Indians, one-fifth of whom are as ignorant of the Gospel as the Hottentots of Africa. Nor the 100,000 Mexicans on our Southern borders, and the equal number of pagan Orientals on our Pacific Coast. And we should not be forgetting that all Mexico and Central America, South to the Isthmus, is within the purview of that expansive term to all North American Churches, "Home."

The enlargement of Home Missions is imperative and we move forward to the May offering with great expectations.

THE COST OF DISCIPLESHIP.

INTERNATIONAL UNIFORM LESSON FOR APRIL 19.

Luke 14:25-35. Memory Verses, 26, 27.

Golden Text—Whosoever would save his life shall lose it: and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake shall find it.—Matt. 16:25.

American Standard Bible.
Copyright, 1901, by Thomas Nelson & Sons.
(Used by permission.)

(25) Now there went with him great multitudes: and he turned, and said unto them, (26) If any man cometh unto me, and hateth not his own father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple. (27) Whosoever doth not bear his own cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple. (28) For which of you, desiring to build a tower, doth not first sit down and count the cost, whether he have wherewith to complete it? (29) Lest haply, when he hath laid a foundation, and is not able to finish, all that behold begin to mock him, (30) saying, This man began to build, and was not able to finish. (31) Or what king, as he goeth to encounter another king in war, will not sit down first and take counsel whether he is able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? (32) Or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassage, and asketh conditions of peace. (33) So therefore whosoever he be of you that renounceth not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple. (34) Salt therefore is good: but if even the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be seasoned? (35) It is fit neither for the land nor for the dunghill: men cast it out. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

BY REV. A. Z. CONRAD, PH.D.

From time immemorial nations, cities and communities have builded gateways through which only those might pass who were to receive glory. In human relations the arch of triumph marked rather a conclusion than a beginning. It is a token of victories achieved. The archway to the kingdom is a prophecy of the glory yet to be. The cost of entrance is self-dedication, self-effacement, consecration to a cause. Becoming a disciple of Jesus Christ is not that cheap, easy thing which is so often presented as constituting discipleship. Who, better than the Founder of Christianity, knew the true conditions of admission? Significant and vital as are the terms of admission laid down by Jesus Christ they are not beyond the reach of the weakest or the most unworthy. Righteousness is costly. High character is not attained without effort. We sing: "In my hands no price I bring, Simply to Thy Cross I cling," and we give expression to a great truth, namely, that no man has the price of admission to the kingdom. It is equally true that he must pay the price of complete self-surrender, which is no small thing. The costliest act of life is the act of complete submission to the will of God. There is no easy way to the summit of the Matterhorn. To reach it you must climb. You cannot be carried to its lofty peak. Prizes worth having cannot be purchased, they must be won. Honors are conferred, not bought. Monumental arches are memorials of valor. Deserters, traitors and cowards cannot be initiated into the mysteries of the temple of fame. Victorious generals with their battle scarred veterans march under the keystone to the emolument beyond. In the Kingdom of Christ sin scarred men, not because of honors gained but because of evils or sins renounced, pass through the archway to honors yet to be.

DISILLUSIONED DISCIPLES.

Jesus had not more than ninety days to live. He was preaching in the wild country of Perea. The mystery and majesty of his personality was irresistibly attractive to those not controlled by prejudices. His ministry was becoming increasingly popular. He spake with familiarity of the invisible, intangible realities of this world and the next which held his followers fascinated and almost entranced. Increasing multitudes attached themselves to his standards as he moved Jerusalemward. Jesus was intensely human in his sympathies and won men because of his interest in their struggles. His compassion was with the sad and the suffering. He drew them to him as the magnet draws steel filings. He well knew, however, the tendency of humanity to seek the soft side. He was not blind to the motives that were leading many to associate themselves with him. He had been talking of the kingdom. He knew their misinterpretation of his program. These people, many of them, had an eye to the main chance. They believed his miraculous powers would throw off the Roman yoke. It would be well to be in the procession when Jesus marched to the throne. He had talked to them of the Cross, but they were too fascinated with the crown to appreciate his meaning. Who would be so likely to receive honor as those who had declared themselves for him before he had reached the throne? Popularity invariably imperils religion more than does persecution. Great causes thrive on opposition and what we term hindrances are often veiled helps. Jesus did not propose to allow the throng now gathering about him to be deceived. He proceeded to disillusion those who dreamed of an easy way to exalted position.

THE TERMS OF ADMISSION.

He proceeded to state the terms of admission to the Kingdom. Were ever such words spoken by a man who sought a loyal following? "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother and wife and children and brethren and sisters, yea, his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." Here was one who was the personification of meekness, of kindliness, of gentleness, proposing apparently impossible conditions to initiation into the mysteries of the Kingdom. Paradox could go no farther than was presented between these words and the personality of Christ. The acceptance of this language at its face value would simply prohibit matriculation in the school of Christ. Yet, Christ uttered no idle or unmeaning words. We read, "God is love." Here is the Son of God dying to win a world yet proposing the severest conditions of discipleship. Everything Jesus taught he taught strongly. This is another way of declaring that Jesus cannot possibly take second place in the affections of any of his followers. Discipleship means the choice of Jesus Christ before and above all others. From that very hour until the present time it has been literally true that men and women have been compelled to choose between the dearest earthly relationship and Jesus Christ. Not once or twice, but thousands of times children have been given the choice of home without Christ or of leaving home with him. Jesus put the matter in its most startling form when he used the word, "hateth," and the term is to be understood only in contrast with the devotion the follower of Christ must have for his Master.

THE CROSS.

v. 27. "Whosoever doth not bear his own cross and come after me cannot be my disciple." The cross stands for unconditional surrender. It is a symbol of unselfish devotion for a cause. It typifies burden bearing for Jesus' sake. The Jew well understood the awful significance of the words of Jesus. Death on the cross was not uncommon. It was one of the most cruel methods of execution. The victim was usually compelled to carry a part or all of his cross to the place of crucifixion. Jesus used the symbol to represent both service and suffering in the interests of the kingdom. Suffering is not in itself a good. Jesus did not enjoin self-inflicted pain, as though there were virtue in that. It was no call for penance. When Jesus died on the cross he made unnecessary any further sacrifice for sin. The Christian ascetic who inflicts torture upon himself is far removed from the ideal of Jesus. Men who lived for years upon pillars added nothing to their own virtue nor did they contribute as they might have done for the benefit of others. Convents and monasteries are notably low in moral ideal. The cross Jesus commends is that which we have to bear when fulfilling life's responsibilities as disciples of Jesus. The revised version has introduced a most important word, "own," "must bear his own cross." Each must stand under his burden. The cross cannot be laid aside nor can it be laid upon others. It may not be abandoned, and it may not be ignored or despised. We cannot carry a part of it and leave others to bear the rest. We must live our own lives and no one can really assist us in bearing our cross, except the Great Burden Bearer, the great Consoler, Jesus Christ. Strength to fulfil life's great responsibilities is vastly more important than the removal of burdens.

SPIRITUAL FORESIGHT.

Under the parable of the building of a tower Jesus now portrays the importance of spiritual foresight. He who begins the construction of the tower must count the cost. Precisely this was what Jesus urged upon those who would now follow him. He would have every life lived intelligently. He proceeded to put these proposed followers of his directly to the test. Were they willing to become his followers if they knew what it involved? He was not willing to accept them on the basis of a momentary impulse. He demanded a permanent purpose. It is useless to enter the kingdom with no recognition of what it requires. On the other hand it is quite possible to introduce a great many subordinate matters not required and thus make admission to the kingdom burdensome. He wishes every disciple to understand that even should it involve social ostracism, much of personal sacrifice, yet, true discipleship must willingly accept all this because of the benefits and blessings which accrue. Christian confession should always find a calm consideration of just what it costs. Are we willing to pay the price in full surrender to the will of God? Nothing is so honorable, nothing so blessed as fellowship with Jesus Christ. The way into the church ought to be simple, direct, plain, but it should mean something vital.

UNFINISHED BUILDINGS.

Ridicule is an effective weapon. "This man began to build and was not able to finish." v. 30. Nearly every community has some monstrous failure in the shape of an unfinished building. Palatial residences with foundations constructed only, others with lifted pillars stand for years in solemn protest against imprudence and extravagance. Usually a tragic history is related in connection with these monuments of folly. A fortune expended and nothing accomplished. It brings reproach and discredit upon the name associated with it. The Panama Canal was left by the French and was an awful reflection upon national honor. Jesus warns against a profession of religion which stops merely with profession. No such failure is ever necessary where the unlimited wealth of the King of kings is at the disposal of his followers.

TRUE RENUNCIATION.

"So therefore, whosoever he be of you that renounces not all that he has he cannot be my disciple." v. 33. What then is true renunciation? It is simply a perfect willingness to give up anything essential to the completest unity with the spirit of Christ. We are not required or asked to give up all that seems delightful or desirable but we are asked to be willing to do so in the interests of the higher delight and the greater holiness of life. The demand is for that self mastery which comes only through the indwelling of the spirit of Jesus Christ, and which enables us to despise whatever stands between ourselves and the fountain of life. The good things of this world were designed to be used and not abused. We are to appreciate them and not to disparage them. Not one really delectable and ultimately blessed thing is to be regarded as useless or worthless. Christianity is a joy giving religion. It was the expressed prayer and desire of Jesus Christ: "My joy might remain in you and that your joy might be full." The renunciation Jesus enjoined is not shutting ourselves away from the world, but to remain in it actively, earnestly, appropriating and using its force, while at the same time we keep free from its entanglements, unsoiled and unsullied. It is through such renunciation that we fulfil the symbolic appraisement of Jesus, "Ye are the salt of the earth."

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

TOPIC FOR APRIL 15, 1914.

The Blinding Effect of Sin. Amos 6:1-3.

Righteousness increases intelligence and foresight: sin diminishes both. The righteous man looks at the whole of life and tries to understand it all: sin directs attention to the meaner aspects of life and hinders comprehensive thinking. Righteousness is breadth: sin is narrowness. Righteousness is kindness and generosity: sin is selfishness and meanness. The righteous man appreciates the motives that make for progress in intelligence and morality: the sinner knows the motives that stand in the way of progress. The righteous man has visions of the glory of God manifested in personal conduct and social structure: the sinner develops cunning in the defence of his evil privileges.

ABSURD CONCEIT.

We readily pardon the young if they have a slightly exalted opinion of themselves. We are quite sure that the world will quickly teach a sensible young man or woman to estimate personal ability at its true value. In fact, we are often pleased rather than displeased with an excess of self-esteem if the young person is trying to do something that is worth while. But the conceit of sin excites wrath. We blame the wicked man for his stupidity, as we do not blame the young for their inexperience. It is unnecessary to speak of the vile scoundrels who glory in their ability to betray innocence or of the knaves who congratulate themselves on their cleverness in getting the money of honest people.

IGNORANCE OF SOCIAL CONSEQUENCE.

The nobles of Samaria were blind to the social effects of their luxurious living. We wonder at times why men who are sinning to the limit do not shudder at the thought of the future. The trouble with these men is that they have blinded themselves. They do not see that they are undermining the foundations of religious and political institutions. They are moral idiots. The pleasure-loving leaders of Samaria were fascinated by sin. They could think of nothing else. The prophet who warned them of the coming invader was to them a fool, a calamity howler. If the poor were wretched, it was their own fault, thought these men who were at ease in Zion. It never occurred to them that a nation might be impoverished financially and spiritually by the injustice and lack of patriotism of a few powerful men. They blamed, if they were like the average exploiter of human weakness, the men they robbed rather than themselves for the bad plight of the nation when calamity came. And they talked optimism as long as they were comfortable. They did not feel the misery of others nor could they see that an ignorant and degraded peasantry was a menace to the nation.

IGNORANCE OF PERSONAL CONSEQUENCES

That certain gross sins destroy the health the most stupid can see, although some who ought to be wise shut their eyes to the outcome of their acts until health is gone. The loss of efficiency and prestige comes upon the envious and the irritable so gradually that they do not realize what is happening to them. Failure that is due to sin is laid to the charge of parents, husband, wife, friends, enemies. There is no greater example of folly than that of the man whose sin has ruined him and who loudly denounces the world in general or some circumstances or person in particular as the cause of his downfall. The deceitfulness of sin is a theme on which the preacher needs to dwell. It is all the more necessary that this characteristic of sin should be pointed out because we are coming to see that conditions have much to do with success and failure. It is so easy to shift blame from ourselves.

Amos 9:10; Jer. 5:11-13; 23; 17; 8:11-12; Is. 44:20; Rom. 1:21-23; Micah 3:7; Is. 29:10-11; John 3:19; 12:43.

Do you wish to teach the principles of Social Service

to your adult class? If so, you will want to use as the basis for your work. This is a monthly magazine, edited by Dr. Josiah Strong. In this little publication is given the most vital, timely, thought provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that has ever been offered to Sunday-schools. Rev. S. G. Buckner, pastor at Somerset, Pa.. who uses this literature in his great men's class of 150, says it is absolutely the best thing published for the men's Bible class. The subscription price—50c a year—makes it less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature. Pastors and church leaders who wish to put into their church work new zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting their classes in the study of Social Reform. SWIMS THROUGH PANAMA CANAL.

An American professional swimmer swam through thirty miles of the Panama Canal last November, covering this distance in a total swimming time of sixteen hours and thirty-five minutes. It is estimated that a vessel will require ten hours for passage through the fifty miles of the entire canal. The swimming feat required parts of two days for its completion.

WIRELESS MESSAGE TO EXPLORER.

Through Canadian government channels a wireless message was sent to Donald B. MacMillan and his fellow explorers at Etah, Greenland, from the American Museum of Natural History. It was a "cheer-up" message of Christmas greeting, and while no response was received or expected, it is believed the message reached its destination. Doctor MacMillan's party is equipped with wireless apparatus, although it is not able to send messages over the 1,600 miles, which separates it from New York.

BALLOON BREAKS WORLD'S RECORD.

The world's record for long-distance flights by spherical balloons was broken recently when the German balloon "Duisburg" rose from a village in Saxony and descended eighty-seven hours later at a point in European Russia near the Siberian frontier. The total distance covered in this flight was a fraction of a mile more than 1,738 miles. The longest previous flight was that of a French balloon which, in March, 1913, flew from Paris to a point near Kharkov, Russia, a distance of 1,492 miles.

A NEW WEATHER CHART.

On January 1, 1914, the Weather Bureau began publishing, at Washington, a daily weather chart which shows at a glance just what is happening, meteorologically, over the entire northern hemisphere, cabled weather reports from Europe and Asia being combined with the ordinary telegraphic reports from American stations.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System, published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

Shall We Live Again?

THE BELIEF in immortality is one of the most profoundly significant facts of human life. In a world where all things change and all men die, and no form of life is seen to continue, where man, himself short-lived, lives long enough to witness the death of almost every living type whose life begins with his own, men are found who cherish the strange belief that there is life beyond death. That any one sane man should hold such belief in the face of the facts which surround all men, is worthy of attention; that any considerable number of them cherish the faith would be a phenomenon worthy of study; and if the belief should be found to be wide-spread, no thoughtful student of human affairs could afford to ignore it, either as a philosophical dictum or as a force in the life of the race.

It cannot quite be said that all men believe in immortality. A few tribes are said to have been found so low in the scale of being that this hope has not yet been discovered among them. And a few men at the other extreme of life have cherished the hope inherited from their own past, and have outgrown it, or call it in question. It is here as in many other spheres of human relations that extremes meet. The men to be convinced of immortality are those who have not yet risen to where they can grasp a hope so large; or they are those who have risen to where they think they have outgrown it. With the former we have no present concern. But the latter group deserves consideration. Among those who compose it are not a few who would gladly believe in immortality if they thought they could. And with them is a still larger company of those who, believing, long for a surer footing for their faith; who strain their eyes, sometimes tear-filled are those eyes, in hope of discerning some more sure reality of what they fondly hope.

To both these classes Easter should bring a message of real help. For this reason we are to consider the immortality of the soul.

There is ground for faith in immortality in the moral nature of man. This was the faith of the great philosopher Kant. The most impressive fact in the world is duty. The "categorical imperative," enforcing upon the conscience the idea of obligation, he affirmed must have its rational explanation in the possibility of a perfection which is itself the progressive attainment of a goal infinitely distant. We have in our souls the command of obedience to a law infinitely perfect; that perfection we do not, cannot attain in this short and ignorant life; yet this life has in it the possibilities of the beginning of a life which, continued and purified, may attain at last to that ideal whose vision now beckons the soul onward in the path of obedience.

Somewhat to the same end was the teaching of Lotze, who said, "That will last forever which on account of its excellence and its spirit must be an abiding part of the universe; what lacks that preserving worth will perish." But this is less confident than the large optimism of Kant. It leaves us room to ask, "Am I certain that my own soul is of such enduring worth that the universe cannot get on without it? Am I of such excellence that my spirit must be an abiding part of the moral fiber of the creation?"

It would not be strange if we found ourselves compelled to answer in the negative, and we should answer, "No; with all our longing, we may as well be modest: The universe got on before we were born; it probably will survive our death. We are not necessary to God."

But let us not be too sure that God can get on without us. Not the dogma of immortality, but the spirit of it, is what Christ brings to us. Is the hundredth sheep necessary to the shepherd who has the ninety and nine? Yes, if his ideal is that of a complete flock. Is the individual soul indispensable to God? Yes, if he has expended millions of years in fitting up a world for its education, has brought it by slow stages to an appreciation of the meaning of it all, and now, after so much of waiting and labor, has succeeded in making the world a fit place for the perfecting of his own moral life in a conscious and independent soul.

Do we stand mourning by our silent tombs
  Of buried hopes and joys which long have fled?
Could we but harken, as the sisters did,
  To that sweet voice and strong, to which the dead
Gave ear and hear him say: "Take ye away
  The stone," which we perchance, by our own hands
Had stationed there; would we not find, as they,
  Our dead come forth; new life, new hope, new joy,
Come springing at His Word? Then why encase
  Our lives in our own selfishness? Our Saviour stands
As standing then, and looks with loving face,
  And calls us to himself—our Brother, Friend.

His Last Days in Jerusalem

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

"I came out from the Father, and am come into the world: again, I leave the world, and go unto the Father. His disciples say, Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no dark saying. Now know we that thou knowest all things, and needest not that any man should ask thee: by this we believe that thou camest forth from God. Jesus answered them, Do ye now believe? Behold, the hour cometh, yea, is come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall leave me alone: and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me. These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye may have peace. In the world ye have tribulation: but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world. These things spake Jesus; and lifting up his eyes to heaven, he said, Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that the Son may glorify thee: even as thou gavest him authority over all flesh, that to all whom thou hast given him, he should give eternal life. And this is life eternal, that they should know thee the only true God, and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ. I glorified thee on the earth, having accomplished the work which thou hast given me to do. And now, Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was."

EVERY year a larger number of Christians follow the narrative of the week which began with the triumphal entry and closed with the resurrection. The story requires the use of all four gospels, as it is impossible to construct the complete account from any one of them. The story of the leading event of this, the most memorable event in the world's history, may be told in a simple narrative.

Nothing could have exceeded the surprise of the disciples when Jesus announced to them his intention of going to Jerusalem at the time of the passover. For weeks he had been in seclusion because of the plots of the Jewish leaders against his life. But they had ceased to oppose or question. Thomas said, "Let us go with him that we may die with him," and they all assented.

Jesus left the little town of Ephraim, where he had been staying for a time, and crossed the Jordan, approaching Jerusalem by way of Jericho. He slept in Jericho on Thursday night, March 30, A. D. 30, he and his disciples being the guests of a prominent and wealthy man named Zacchæus.

FRIDAY—THE JOURNEY FROM JERICHO.

On Friday morning they said farewell to their hospitable host, and started early for Jerusalem. It was an all-day walk, and those who undertook it were accustomed to start in good season so as to put a considerable part of the journey behind them before the day grew hot. The distance would have been eighteen miles in a straight line, but the road winds considerably. And the taxing feature of the journey is not the distance but the climb. Jericho lies nearly 1,300 feet below sea-level, and Jerusalem is nearly 2,600 feet above. It is a climb of nearly four-fifths of a mile, and from a depth that gives an oppressive atmosphere into a considerable elevation.

They must have halted beside the way of the Apostles' fountain, the only spring for miles in the wilderness. They doubtless rested for some time in the heat of the day. Toward sunset they climbed the slope of the Mount of Olives, and arrived in Bethany. Lazarus was expecting them, and Mary and Martha were waiting inside the court to welcome them. The guest room was ready and was reached by an outside stair leading up out of the courtyard. Water was ready for the washing of their feet, and a simple meal was waiting.

THE SABBATH IN BETHANY.

Jesus and his disciples spent a quiet Sabbath in Bethany. He may have taught in the local synagogue, but he did not go into Jerusalem. The day was one of uneventful rest.

But on Saturday night, after the Sabbath sun had set, a great feast was served. A neighbor named Simon offered his home for the event, and Jesus and the disciples sat down with Lazarus, Simon and the prominent men of Bethany. Martha served; she was always serving. After the dinner Mary came in, bringing a flask of precious perfume, and opening it, poured the costly oil on the head of Jesus. It was an extravagant act of love; love that did not measure its cost. It shocked many who were present, and most of them thought what Judas said, "Why was not this ointment sold for $300 and given to the poor?" For that was the value of it, in terms of what it now would purchase; and there were many poor in Bethany.

There are times when love demands an expression in terms that will not accept commercial or prudential proportions. If Jesus had said what Judas said, it would have been one of the most popular texts in the Bible. The world still holds its breath at the extravagance of Mary's gift; but Jesus gave its true estimate.

"TO WHAT PURPOSE THIS WASTE?"

That night the Lord and his disciples rested in the home of Lazarus, and the guestroom, like the banquet hall, was filled with the odor of the ointment. Judas did not sleep well; and now and then finding one of the other disciples awake, he muttered, "To what purpose was this waste?"

"Arise, Let Us Go Hence"—By Schonherr.

SUNDAY—THE ENTRY INTO THE CITY.

On Sunday the little village was astir early. The Sabbath was past. Belated pilgrims who had camped around the Apostles' spring were passing early on their way to Jerusalem. Neighbors were running into Lazarus's home asking concerning the Lord's plans for the day; and the little they learned caused them to wait eagerly for more news. Two of the disciples were sent to a neighboring village where the Lord had a friend, and they returned leading a young ass and its mother. The colt was saddled and led to the courtyard door. The gathering crowd blocked the street. Pilgrims from below halted and waited eagerly, while people of Bethany assembled in ever increasing numbers.

At length the door opened and Jesus emerged. He wore a seamless garment of unusually fine texture; and his appearance was the signal for a demonstration. As he started toward Jerusalem some of his friends ran before, shouting, and others followed after. As they rounded the shoulder of Olivet, they met another company coming out from the city to meet him. The two companies met and mingled, and became a crowd, and the enthusiasm reached a high level.

The people snatched branches from the palm trees then abundant there and waved them in the air before him. Some of those who went before snatched off their loose outer garments, their "abbas," woven in alternate stripes of white and brown, and carpeted the ground ahead of him. They entered the Golden gate bearing all before them. Those who went before cleared the narrow streets, and the throng filled the way from wall to wall. People stood in doorways and gathered in street intersections and looked out from balconies and down from housetops. Used as Jerusalem was to sensations, it has seen nothing in many a day like this. For Jesus was entering the city where David had ruled, in the manner in which David's son was to come, when he came to his kingdom.

They came to the temple area, the procession continuing into the outer courts of the temple itself. The children caught up the happy shout of the multitude.

Jerusalem woke to new life and hope that morning in the shout, "Hosanna to the Son of David! Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!"

MONDAY—THE LORD IN HIS TEMPLE.

Jesus returned to Bethany that afternoon and spent the night. On Monday morning he and his disciples rose early and started for Jerusalem before breakfast. The Lord was full of indignation at the abuses which he had seen in the temple; and he was determined to clear the house of God from its defilements. No one resisted him. The doves flew free above the temple, and the broken cages lay behind. The angry, sullen traders fumed and fretted, but did not attack him. That day he was Lord of the temple; and he strode its courts the Master of men.

TUESDAY—THE LORD IN CONTROVERSY.

But Tuesday was a very different day. The enemies of the Lord gathered courage; and when he entered the temple on Tuesday morning, they met him and demanded to know by what authority he did these things. From that time on through the day, controversy followed controversy. The Lord met them all with readiness and decision, and one by one the groups of his adversaries retired, confused and silent. Yet all day the confidence of the priests was increasing.

By evening the result was certain. The Lord had presented himself in his temple, and had been rejected. Sadly he and his disciples withdrew to Bethany, and as they went, they sat upon the Mount of Olives and looked back at Jerusalem, beautiful in the sunset, while the Lord declared that not one stone of the temple should be left upon another.

WEDNESDAY—THE LORD IN RETIREMENT.

On Wednesday the Lord remained in Bethany, a quiet guest in the home of his friends. Part of the day he doubtless spent in prayer, and part in pleasant converse with his hosts. It is good to think about this day of quiet and sweet companionship that came before the final day of suffering.

On Thursday the Lord sent two of his disciples into the city where, by appointment, they met a friend at one of the public fountains. They followed him silently and without greeting until he entered a courtyard. They followed him inside, and he shut the door after them. Then, for the first time they spoke:

"The Lord saith, 'Where is the guest chamber, that I may eat the passover with my disciples?' "

The room was ready. The disciples had not been there before, but they knew the friend in whose home they were. It was a large room, and was used for gatherings at feast times. Doubtless there were many such rooms in Jerusalem.

"The Holy Communion"—By Joseph Aubert.

THURSDAY—THE LORD AMONG HIS FRIENDS.

The disciples entered the room by the outer stair that led from the courtyard, and there prepared for the feast. They bought and killed a lamb, and roasted him with the lamb that the family below was preparing, and when all was ready, returned to Bethany, and came back with the Lord and the disciples. Here they ate the passover, while the family below was doing the same. After the meal they remained in the room, and the Lord spoke wonderful words to them.

About midnight they left. The young man who had guided them to the home rose from his bed to shut the courtyard gate after them; and his wonder and curiosity growing, he followed them through the city and out across the valley of the Kedron. He was wrapped only in a sheet he had snatched from the bed. He saw the Lord arrested, and himself felt the rude hand of a soldier laid upon him. He ran through the night, leaving his loose garment in the hands of his captor, and lay shivering until morning.

For Judas, angry at the Lord's extravagance, and his refusal to bring in violently the kingdom of heaven, and being also a lover of money, entered into a plot with the priests by which he agreed to point out the hiding place of Jesus, and to identify him by means of a kiss.

The Lord knew what was coming, and had left his disciples on guard while he prayed for strength for the coming ordeal. But the disciples, weary and in the midst of the reaction from an anxious and arduous week, slept at their post; and when they wakened, the Lord was walking boldly past them to meet the betrayer and the mob.

FRIDAY—THE LORD AMONG HIS ENEMIES.

It must have been about one or two o'clock on Friday morning when Jesus was led into the house of the high priest. He was given a hasty examination, led through the court to the adjoining house of the high priest's father-in-law, and there examined again. A fire was burning in the courtyard, possibly the very fire that had roasted the passover lamb for the priestly family. The servants and some of the mob were gathered there, and Peter had entered and stood among them. They accused Peter of being one of the disciples of Jesus; and Peter was in the very act of denying it when Jesus was led through the court. The look of Jesus went straight to Peter's heart, and he went out and wept bitterly.

The full moon looked on Jerusalem. The night was light where the moon shone, but the shadows were dark. The disciples huddled in out-of-the-way places until morning; and not all of them had courage to go with the crowd that gathered in front of the high priest's house to wait for the formal condemnation of Jesus.

Pilate did not live in Jerusalem, but in Cæsarea; yet at feast time he came to Jerusalem. He was there at this time; and to him, the Roman governor, Jesus was taken. Pilate had no wish to send an innocent man to the cross, and while he did not understand Jesus, he felt sure that he was the victim of persecution. The more he saw of Jesus, the less he wanted to put him to death.

But the mob cried that if he let Jesus go he was no friend to Cæsar. Fear for his position at last constrained him to do what he knew was wrong. He washed his hands in the attempt to evade responsibility, but in vain. The church throughout its generations has preserved his name to an immortality of infamy. His is the only bad man's name preserved in a Christian creed—"He suffered under Pontius Pilate."

They crucified Jesus outside the city wall. We do not know where. The spot long connected with this event by tradition is that covered by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; but this does not at all meet the conditions. The place whose present situation most accurately makes real the events of the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus is the hill known as "The New Calvary," sometimes unhappily called "Gordon's Calvary," together with the garden and the tomb adjacent.

The hours of Jesus' suffering on the cross were mercifully short. Few men crucified died so soon; they sometimes lived for days. When the soldiers came to hasten his death, that the body might be removed before sunset, he was already dead.

Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathæa took his body, and wrapping it in fine linen, gave it hasty burial in a new tomb. Though so hasty, it was the burial of a prince; a hundred weight of spices lay about the tortured, blood-stained body. They rolled a great stone to the door, and went sadly home in the sunset.

SATURDAY—THE END IN THE GRAVE.

On Saturday the guard watched the tomb; and the disciples hid in dumb, unutterable sorrow. There is no record of what they said or did. It was a day of black, unrecorded agony.

Through these days a group of good women had been following Jesus. We catch infrequent glimpses of them; but we know they were there. They knew where Jesus was buried, but did not know that the body had been anointed and laid amid spices. They came, bringing spices which he had bought, to do their last sad act of love.

EASTER SUNDAY—THE MASTER RISEN.

It was a beautiful April morning. The valleys around Jerusalem were green. On the slope of Calvary grew the red anemone, red as blood drops. Daisies and cyclamens grew in the ravines. The women made their way among the gardens to the tomb. Lo! it was empty. And, while they wondered and questioned, the glad message came to them from the angel, "He is not here; he is risen. Come, see the place where the Lord lay!"

The Disciples and the Immigrants

A Statement, a Vision and an Appeal.

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

THE Disciples began their movement as an enterprise in Home Missions. The Christian Association was an organization to spread the gospel in needy places without sectarian bias so that it might be acceptable to all. In those days the city had not yet appeared as we know it now. Ninety-seven per cent of all the people were upon the farms. The supreme task of home missions was to follow the pioneer in his wanderings and to bring him to Christ. The success of our movement is the success of this particular phase of home missionary enterprise. No movement in America has ever been better adapted to the exigencies of such religious work as has our people.

Rev. O. F. Jordan.

After a hundred years of history, we find the whole face of the map in America is changed. There is no frontier in the west, for the adventurous settler has long since pushed his way to the Pacific Coast and sighs for more worlds to conquer. The frontier is now on the borders of great cities. It is to be found in new industrial cities that spring up like magic as Gary did. It is to be found in the colonies of the foreign speaking where the immigrant horde of Europe gathers.

OUR BROTHERHOOD IN PERIL.

If our people insist upon doing the work of a hundred years ago, a work entirely in English, for people in smaller communities, they must not be surprised to find their growth checked and their future one of second rate importance among the religious forces of America.

The immigrant is here. In ten years about ten million foreigners have arrived and already there has been born to these a considerable company of children. These foreigners have taken possession of our institutions in many cases. Their names are to be found on the tickets of the various political parties in all of our cities.

The Disciples have been successful with mission work among the Slavs. It may be a similarity of temperament. It may be that the historical development of this people has made them ready just now to receive our simple biblical message. At any rate, it has been shown that we can reach the Slav. Our work in New York, Chicago, Cleveland, and in Pennsylvania has proven this.

A PROTESTANT CRISIS.

Of the immigrants coming to America, the Italians are first in numbers, the Poles second, and the Jews third. The Bohemian is already here in large numbers. Among the Bohemians, strong infidel propaganda has sprung up. Halls are built to house their societies and an infidel catechism is taught the children on Sunday. When they reacted from Catholicism, there was no wise and competent missionary at hand to interpret Protestantism to them in a large way. Our work for them must be exceedingly difficult because of these facts. The Poles of America are now in the stage of thought that the Bohemians of this country were forty years ago. The Poles have already a strong independent religious movement of Catholic churches that have broken with Rome. They are quarreling with the ecclesiastics over the low educational efficiency of the Catholic parish schools. They are becoming imbued with socialism and American radicalism of various brands and the Catholic authorities now report that one-third of the Poles in this country are outside the Catholic Church. If the Protestant Church fails to sense this crisis, we shall probably have an anti-religious movement among the Poles that will as far exceed that among the Bohemians as the Poles are more intense in all their convictions than these fellow-Slavs.

RUSSIANS IN AMERICA.

The Russian Jew has been coming for a good while and has taken possession of the east side of New York but the movement of Gentile Russians to this country is of more recent origin. In Chicago, five years ago, there were few women in the Russian colony. Now women are appearing in greater numbers in public meetings, having come to join husbands or sweethearts. The great empire of Russia has all the conditions to compel an immigrant movement. It is just beginning but we shall yet see vast hordes of these people arriving.

The Scandinavian is already here but he continues to come by the hundreds of thousands. So long as he affiliates with the Lutheran Church of the fatherland, he will be well cared for spiritually. Thousands of Scandinavians are not so affiliated, however. The preacher in this country has not known how to interpret religion in the new situation the immigrant finds himself in. These Scandinavians not only form large and powerful colonies, but have taken possession of whole states.

The immigrant cannot be evangelized in the old spontaneous and haphazard way by which we did so much work for the pioneer. We must reach him through organized society work. In the first place, he must be reached in the first generation with a foreign tongue and this means in some cases the training of American workers in foreign colonies, in the language, for this special work. It means that the work is to be done in a population working for low wages and in great poverty where the mission cannot be made self-supporting in some cases for a whole generation. It is doing work among a people who have been used to worship in the homeland in beautiful and appropriate edifices. All of these facts make deeply significant the appeal of home missions.

A CALL FOR FUNDS.

Such work is expensive. The Presbyterians in Chicago have one single mission on which they spend forty thousand a year. Another mission costs them thirty thousand a year. They are spending more on a single plant in Chicago than the Disciples are spending on all their foreign-speaking work in the United States. We were tardy in the development of our foreign missionary conscience. At last we dream great visions for China and India. The last blot to be removed from our people as a great missionary force in the redemption of the world is their neglect of foreign missions at our very gate. Once we realize the significance of these newcomers, once we appreciate fully that their children are to be the future Americans and possess vast sections of our country, we shall see that if Disciples are to have standing room in the America of another generation, they must go seriously to the task of evangelizing the immigrant.

Our May offering for home missions will be a testing time. It will reveal the intelligence and conscience and imagination of our great brotherhood. It will show whether we are provincial or truly catholic in our conceptions of our task. Through the length and breadth of the land, the sermon, the printed page, and the missionary conference should make real to our brotherhood the peril and the opportunity of the immigrant invasion.

Shall We Catch the Train?

A Call to the Church in Recognition of a Present Crisis.

BY W. REMFRY HUNT.

IT IS obvious that the last hundred years of missions in Asia have wrought wondrous transformations. Missions are discovering the language of truth. Chairs of comparative religious science in our seminaries at home are giving the wider equipped missionary candidates a truer estimate of other religions. Points of contest apprehended through a wider religious discernment and gained by a clearer knowledge of the sacred systems of the east, have given a richness and promise to the future of missions.

These achievements, like all forward movements, in the divine plan, cost. Missions commenced inexpert and, somehow, have just grown. The art of kindly recognition had to be stretched till race ties loosened. Antagonisms had to be displaced by harmonies, and in the social and religious circles the best of the east and the best of the west have had to meet as brother men in quest of the divine life. So it is that as God and man have ensphered, so too, all races, climes and religions and societies must merge out in brotherhood as the day into the wider dawn. Arguments may fail to win the devotees of other faiths, because all men cannot reason, but even a child can see. Here is the crux of the theme. One clear vision of Jesus Christ in all the calm majesty of his divine revelation, articulated in the terms of human understanding, and "the vision splendid" will dawn upon the awakening minds of the newly emancipated millions of China.

MISSIONS AND THE CROSS.

Missions were born in the moments when the church had the cross before its eyes. Its visions looked at the outstretched hands of Calvary, and hitherto unexplored territories became centers of radiating evangelism. And so the great commission is being carried out. In the microscopic cloisters of sectarian creedology, or in the frigid zones of destructive criticism churches became cold, egotistic, and unimpressive. In the warmer realms of sacrificial service, dating from the twelfth century on, the missionary crusades saw the church with a normal, healthy circulation. A moving civilization and a stationary church would spell out a fatality for both.

It is the decisive hour for larger movements. No law is more sound or final than that the church will get out of missions more than it puts into them. Alike in their insistence on sacrifice and gain, the laws of the natural and those of the spiritual world bear the impress of the same hand. Each field demands its own preparation and yields its own proportioned harvest. It reads like a laboratory. When the church gives until it feels virtue going out of her, then, like the prodigal she may be said to have come to herself and will see anew that her own elective outgathering is in order to an universal ingathering from the kingdom of this world until it consummates in the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ.

THE PRESENT CRISIS.

The fruitfulness of sacrifice is the seal of the real and vital succession. As witness the heritage of the new missionaries in the rich bequests they are heirs to, in the language, letters, open doors, razed walls (and that sometimes done single-handed by some lonely apostle builder with a broken shovel). Facts tell.

Missions have invested too much in these great mission fields to leave the work unequipped or to call retrenchment at this critical juncture. If crises are calls to action, then the whole missionary body unitedly and expectantly calls the church to do a new and larger thing in missions. Lives as precious as those of Morrison, Muirhead, Nevins, David Hill, Dr. Young Allen, Charles Garst, Chas. E. Molland, Jos. Adams, and other pioneers of the new day in the persons of Dr. Hudson Taylor, Dr. Griffith John, and others among the sainted women who have lifted China and Japan, call the churches at home and the workers on the field to a heroism worthy of the splendid traditions of the days of the endued, endowed, and empowered apostolic personalities.

THE INSISTENT NOTE.

The one insistent note that has rung out clearly and impressively in the provincial conventions held by Dr. John R. Mott and his able colleague, Dr. Campbell Gibson, has been the call to prayer. In the minds of many of the workers in China too, it has seemed to be a deepening conviction that we "workers together with Him" have yet to know what it means to appropriate our resources and to discover anew what availability we have in God.

Speaking to this theme of fervid, sacrificial devotion, and of its call to the home churches, as also to the missionaries on the field Fletcher S. Brockman, B. A., sums up the situation with the vision of the prophet of the morning. "A picture comes before me today. One-half a billion of people gathered around the rim of the Pacific, people that have for centuries been divided from us by walls that are high. I see them, the youngest of all peoples on the earth, I see them as perhaps today the most intense and active. I see them in a state of flux. I see them with the manacles of the past fallen from them, and with the breath of the twentieth century upon their brows. I see them waiting for the very best that the world has for them."

"A WAR WHOSE END IS PEACE."

"If there is a heroism here today, I call you to a war whose end is peace. Is there patriotism, I call you to a statesmanship which is laying the foundations of God's kingdom. Is there imagination, I call you to see redeemed millions marching into the presence of our King. I would rather live in this hour than in any hour the world has ever seen. I would rather have a part in this task than any task the world has ever known. I would rather die in this cause than to live in another. I would rather go through it poverty-stricken and in want than in any other to have wealth and ease and all the honors that the world could bring."

SHALL WE MISS THE TRAIN?

There is a strategic element in opportunity. Sometimes there are epoch-making moments. One stands thrilled at the thought of the great missionary organizations sinking their primary departments and uniting in the great structural work of presenting the Lord Jesus Christ to these awakening nations. Christian union may be deferred a bit at home but we should miss the train to victory if we did not at once unite on the foreign mission field.

The Dead Line of Fifty

FROM "THE CONTINENT."

A man's mental attitude toward his own work is the determining factor of his development. The man who has satisfied himself has lost the only dynamic of further personal growth. And lacking growth, he is already caught in dry rot and decay.

A shrewd old minister lately said:

"The 'dead line' is not at fifty, but at thirty. If a man is still growing at thirty, he will last long past fifty. But if he quits growing before thirty, he won't outlast fifty at the farthest. The whole question is settled twenty years before."

Churches would never have contracted an objection to pastors of advanced age except that so many older ministers, bundled up in fine conceit of themselves, have complacently come to expect congregations to fit them instead of recognizing their own obligation to fit their congregations.

Just as fatal as hardening of heart to the inner spiritual life is hardening of habit to the outer life of helpfulness among men.

Anybody no longer able to reconsider his old method and substitute a better method for it, has come to the end of the chapter.

And the recurrence of just such inabilities in so many ministers tells how the prejudice against pastors above fifty got started.

But the worst thing about that prejudice and the spread of it is that its effect reaches out far beyond the men who have committed this stultifying blunder and affects others in middle life who have worked with wise eagerness to preserve their serviceability.

It is tragedy, indeed, when such men, prepared with the capital of accumulated experience to accomplish a larger service than ever, find opportunity cut off by the assumption of stubborn, unreasoning laymen that no minister over fifty can possibly be "a live one."

This is the enormous injustice which a church works against capable men in the ministry and against itself as well. when by arbitrary enactment before it begins search for a pastor it determines that no man older than forty-five or fifty shall be considered.

Many a congregation by such action has denied itself the precise sort of leadership it most needed—leadership sound and staid with the judgment of a settled mind. The penalty of the error is often a pastor pitifully callow and brash.

The only fair and sensible way for any committee sent to look for a pastor is to make no rules beforehand—to judge nobody by a tradition but everybody alike by the one crucial criterion: Is he growing and can he be depended on still to grow?

Don't classify by ages, classify only by individual quality. No pastoral committee is square and fair that proceeds by any other rule.

Meanwhile let the young ministers pray above almost all else to be delivered from the paralyzing effects of self-content.

He who escapes it not only delivers his own soul but helps to dissipate a heavy cloud from the lives of fellow-workers.

HE WAS RIGHT.

The amenities of political campaigning are amusingly illustrated by a story told by a southern congressman.

It appears that during the course of a stump speech delivered some years ago by John Sharp Williams in Mississippi he was interrupted by a sudden yell from a man in the audience:

"I have been robbed by pickpockets!"

"I did not know that there were any republicans present," promptly suggested Mr. Williams, in order to get a laugh.

"Oh, there ain't, there ain't!" roared the unhappy man. "I'm the only one!"—Lippincott's.

MURDOCK ON PROGRESSIVISM.

The first charge that meets anyone who is of a progressive tendency is that he does not believe in organization. Now, I do believe in organization, and yet all my life I have had to overcome the accusation that I do not. What is organization? What underlies it? Simply this: Self surrender in the individual, that is all. I learned this lesson early, and learned it curiously, so declared the Kansas Congressman for the ears of a Collier's Weekly reporter.

I was born in a little yellow huddle of cottonwood shacks, out on a bleak and floor-flat prairie, continued the Congressman. My youth was spent among booted and spurred cowboys, among feathered and blanketed Indians, and yet in our little primitive prairie town we learned the fundamental lessons of life, just as people in older communities learn them. And, as I said, I learned this lesson of organization curiously.

Living across the road was a family by the name of Patterson, and they had a little boy named Bud. Bud possessed remarkable mentality. Everybody in our town believed that Bud was to rise to high estate in this world, and his own parents believed that Bud might become President some day. So they began to train him up in the way he should go, took particularly good care of his table manners,—taught him which hand to use for his knife and which hand for his fork, and what he ought to eat with a spoon.

In time we all grew to understand that Bud was a marvel at table etiquette. But there is this about a new country that is noteworthy: On the frontier in the old days people were poor, and, like most poor people, were proud. Poor people do not invite one another to dinner, for various reasons, and the tragedy in little Bud's life was that he had never had an invitation out to dine with anyone, so that he could try those manners on somebody besides his own folk. But finally his opportunity came.

Living east of my town was an English family by the name of Smithons, and one Sunday they invited Bud and Bud's parents to Sunday dinner. Here was his chance at last, and he went to the Smithons' all cocked and primed to try those table manners. He got along famously. He did not make a mistake until the very last. The Smithons had for dessert some sort of preserved cherries, the kind that float around in their own juice; and as Bud was eating them he suddenly became aware that he had got something into his mouth that wasn't a cherry. He wallowed it around with his tongue a long time and tried to make out what it was. You know how difficult it is to identify a thing by feeling of it with your tongue. It seemed to have hair on it, and he was afraid to swallow it; so he just wallowed it around with his tongue.

What would you have done? Reach up in your mouth and place that thing on your plate in front of your mother and all those strangers after all those years of training? Ah, no!

Little Bud told me for the first time in my life the lesson of organization. I have had to relearn it many times. Everyone must learn it. Society would not get along without it. No domestic tranquillity is possible in its absence, or business or professional or political success. Little Bud said, "I'll tell you what I did. Finally I simply swallowed the infernal thing out of respect for the family."

A NEW KIND OF MINISTER.

Here is another sign of the times, which shows that a change has come over the world, says the Reformed Church Messenger. The Cambria Steel Works, Johnstown, Pa., employs a minister, who devotes his time and services to the religious life and the spiritual good of the men working for it. To be the pastor of a steel mill is something new and unique. That is an enviable position for a man who is anxious to do special work for the Master. He has a fine opportunity. He will learn some things himself. If he is faithful, he will be a better and a stronger man even than he is now. This experiment has been undertaken because many of these men attended the recent special evangelistic services held in Johnstown, during which many of the millmen were converted. There was an improvement in the conduct and the work of the men. The managers of the steel mill saw their opportunity and acted.

DEATH TO OPIUM SMOKERS.

They are thorough in China. Proclamations announcing the death penalty for smokers of opium have been promulgated, according to reports from various provinces. One soldier was found with the pipe. He was shot, reports the Central Christian Advocate.

We can but wish that we had an equally drastic enforcement of our liquor laws. Naturally, we do not mean the death penalty. We have penalties enough. But we are lax in enforcing them. Hence, bootleggers and jointists in some communities.

Our Readers Opinions

Editor The Christian Century:

I have read your editorial in this week's Christian Century, "Hurling the First Stone." Am somewhat surprised at your attitude, and beg leave to take exceptions to some things you say in it.

The preachers and writers you mention as using their abilities and energies against the Church of Rome, are alive to the situation. They are like the boy's pup getting their eyes open. They as well as others who study the condition of the times realize more and more that it is the influence of the Church of Rome that is the cause of much disturbance in this country.

You fail to recognize that they do not teach Christian union, and that their slogan is, "Make America Catholic." The Church of Rome is not a religion in the true sense of the word, but a thoroughly organized political body, a "system" to get control of everything for the benefit of the church.

They say the church is not in politics. Then, why do the priests advise from the pulpit the voting for the Catholic nominee for alderman, although he be a deposed policeman now running a saloon. Let me ask who controls the city council, who holds the important county and state offices? Catholics; and a more rotten condition never existed in the state and county. Even the president is dominated by a Catholic, and 80 per cent of all his appointments are Catholics. You say it would be a sorry spectacle for us to attempt to take care of the untaught communicants of the Roman Church; would it be any harder than teaching "the heathen Chinese?" In the first place they are not untaught in one thing, i. e. strict obedience to the priest and church. What can you expect from them? Can they be loyal citizens when their leading paper, "The Western Watchman" says when the government in any way interferes with the church, "To hell with the government?" It is time for the weak-kneed and spineless Protestants to get in line and really do something. If there is to be any advance in the Protestant churches, the press, pulpit, and people must awaken out of sleep, and work together to defeat the influence of the Church of Rome.

BY HELEN ROWLAND.

I WENT into a church last night as meek as meek could be;
And lo, the preacher rosē and aimed his sermon straight at me!
And while he railed at womankind I smiled behind my fan,
For, said I, "We may be dreadful, but we're good enough for man!"

Oh, it's woman this and woman that and "woman is to blame."
Remember, back in Eden, shifty Adam said the same!
It's "woman's clothes!" and "woman's ways," "her hats, her heels, her walk!"
It's woman, woman, woman!"—and I'm tired of the talk!

It's "the woman with the serpent's tongue," when poets wield the flail,
Or "the female of the species," far more deadly than the male!
It's "the hobble-skirted horror," luring men to sin and debt,
It's the vain and wily "vampire" or "the strong-armed suffraget!"

Pshaw; it's woman this and woman that! "The woman tempted me!"
But it's "Oh forgive me angel!" when they're waking from a spree.
It's the "mannish modern woman" or the "silly, frilly" one;
But it's "God bless home and mother!" when they want their cooking done.

It's the "sneakin', peeking woman," never known to work or think;
It's the "nagging, ragging woman," driving patient man to drink;
It's the "rambling, gambling woman," spending all her husband's cash;
It's the "ghoulish, clubbish woman," letting hubby live on hash.

Oh, it's woman this and woman that, and say, I didn't do it!
"Behold, the woman lured me on!" or else, "she drove me to it!"
It's woman here and woman there, man's burden all through life!
But when they get a toe-ache, it's "Oh, where's my little wife?"

Now, we aren't all plaster angels and it's lucky that we're not,
As long as we must live with men (a rather earthly lot),
We may have our faults and foibles, but if all your taunts were true,
Well, don't you think we still should be quite good enough for you?

Oh, it's woman this and woman that and "Let's reform her, quick!"
But it's "ministering angel!" when they're down and out and sick.
It's woman here and woman there, and "Ware the siren's snare!"
But if man gets into heaven, 'twill be woman got him there!

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

A RADICAL AND FLAGRANT DEPARTURE

FACTS have recently come to light concerning the constitution of Phillips Bible Institute, a school for training lay-workers and ministers, recently established at Canton, Ohio, and claiming Disciples' auspices, which indicate that that institution has made a radical departure from the distinctive purposes and program of the Disciples of Christ.

The departure is so radical and involves the betrayal of a principle so well established by consistent and conscious practice through our entire history that it will, if persisted in, inevitably put the young school outside the fellowship of Disciples' institutions.

Specifically, what has been done is this: The founders of the Institute have written a theological creed into their constitution and provided that any teacher suspected of non-conformity to that creed shall be tried by the trustees, whose final authority shall be the New Testament Scriptures "as interpreted by" a certain tract entitled "Our Position" by Isaac Errett and a certain book entitled "The Church of Christ" by Thomas W. Phillips, whose name the institution bears.

After setting forth the purpose of the Institute the constitution, in Article III, affirms the following creed of five articles:

A. The existence of a personal God, our Maker, our Redeemer, our Preserver and bountiful Benefactor, who has revealed himself to the world through Jesus Christ, who also is revealed through the Prophets and Apostles that by inspiration wrote the Old and New Testament Scriptures.

B. That Jesus is the Christ, the only begotten Son of God who died for the sins of the world and whose crucified body was raised from the dead by the power of God as declared in the Scriptures.

C. The presence of the Holy Spirit in the Church whose office is to comfort, sanctify and up-build in the Christian life and through the preaching of the Gospel to convict the world of sin and proclaim the Divine Salvation therefrom.

D. That God's people should be One. One Lord, one faith, one baptism. That the Bible furnishes an all sufficient revelation of the Divine Will and a perfect rule of faith and practice. That Peter's confession, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God," should be the universal creed of the church. That the ordinances of the Gospel should be observed as they were in the Apostolic days.

E. That all primary authority in religion dwells in God, who delegated this authority to Jesus Christ and Christ delegated this same authority to the twelve Apostles who by their teachings rule in the Church to-day. Apostolic doctrine, apostolic practices and apostolic ordinances are the only ones that are binding on the people of God to-day.

Teachers may not "hold, expound, teach or promulgate opinions or doctrines contrary to the fundamentals set forth in Article three."

And the provisions for a heresy trial are complete in case any teacher or officer does hold a contrary opinion. It is assumed that this creed of five articles embodies and explicates essential New Testament doctrine. But in the event of a heresy trial the ultimate appeal is not to the creed but to Isaac Errett's tract and T. W. Phillips' book.

A CREED AND A POOR ONE.

THUS the Phillips Bible Institute has fallen deeper into the pit of creedism than are the much pitied "creed-bound sects" around us! This Institute has placed itself four removes from the ultimate authority to which the Disciples of Christ have always appealed!

What is that ultimate authority in matters of faith?

The person, Jesus Christ.

But this institution appeals to Christ as interpreted by the New Testament as interpreted by this creed of five articles as interpreted by Isaac Errett's tract as interpreted by T. W. Phillips' book!

Tell it not in Gath! We should have wished to keep this skeleton in our own closet had not the trustees, apparently in sublime unconsciousness of the irony of the thing they had perpetrated, published abroad the news of it. One can almost hear the gleeful sharpening of the pencils in "sectarian" editorial sanctums in preparation for a sarcastic article entitled, "Creed-fighters Embrace a Creed and a Poor One!"

But the remarkable provisions of this unprecedented instrument deserve to be set down in the exact words of the constitution. Article VIII, entitled "Eligibility of Officers and Teachers," reads as follows:

In the employment of teachers, professors or officers of said corporation no person shall be eligible to any one of said positions nor to be appointed or elected a Trustee thereof who shall hold, expound, teach or promulgate opinions or doctrines contrary to the fundamentals set forth in Article III of this Constitution and the Charter of the Phillips Bible Institute, and all teachers, professors, officers and trustees shall upon their employment, appointment or election as such be required to subscribe in writing thereto, and should they while holding such employment or appointment so change their views as not to be in sympathy with said fundamentals or teach, expound, hold or promulgate opinions or doctrines contrary thereto, their office and position in said corporation shall thereupon and without further action upon the part of said trustees cease and determine, and their connection with said Institute shall be at an end, any contract with said Phillips Bible Institute to the contrary notwithstanding, and all employment and appointments shall be based upon these provisions and subject thereto. Should there ever arise any question in the minds of the Trustees as to the eligibility of any teacher, professor, officer or director in said Phillips Bible Institute on account of views or teachings alleged to be in variance from the purpose for which said Institute is founded, or contrary to any of the affirmations contained in Article III of this Constitution and the said Charter, such question shall be decided by said Board of Trustees by an appeal to the New Testament Scriptures as interpreted by "Our Position," a tract written by Isaac Errett, and the "Church of Christ," a book written by Thomas W. Phillips, and their decision shall be final and all property, real or personal, which shall hereafter be bequeathed, devised or conveyed to said corporation shall be taken and held for the purposes set forth in the Articles of Incorporation or Charter, and subject to the provisions hereinbefore stated, and for no other purpose. And no portion of the funds or property, real or personal, or income therefrom belonging to or at any time received by the said Phillips Bible Institute by way of benefits, devices, bequest, gift or otherwise shall by any device, plan, form of words or subterfuge be held or used, directly or indirectly, for any purpose at variance with the purposes set forth in the Articles of Incorporation or Charter hereinbefore referred to.

THE MEN RESPONSIBLE.

WHAT are the names of the trustees responsible for this radical departure from Disciples' principles? Who are the men who, forgetting the nature of the pit from which they were digged, have deliberately returned thither determined there to abide? Surely they are obscure men, unacquainted with the spirit and convictions of our century-old movement.

Indeed they are no such thing.

The trustees whose names are embodied in the text of this constitution are:

E. L. Hang, Canton, O.
O. M. Sala, Canton, O.
J. K. Baxter, Canton, O.
H. B. Webster, Canton, O.
B. D. Phillips, Butler, Pa.
T. W. Phillips, Jr., Butler, Pa.
P. H. Welshimer, Canton, O.
Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind.
W. W. Sniff, New Castle, Pa.
Russell Errett, Cincinnati, O.
H. C. Hodges, Greensburg, Ind.

Mr. T. W. Phillips, Jr., son of the founder of the institution, and spokesman and defender of this most un-Disciple constitution, says that Dr. Z. T Sweeney "was responsible for the final form in which the affirmations [paragraphs A, B, C, D, E,] were put." And so the marvel grows. There is the name of Mr. Russell Errett, publisher of the Christian Standard, son of the man upon whom the mantle of Alexander Campbell fell. There are the names of Rev. W. W. Sniff and Rev. C. H. Welshimer, among the best known ministers of the younger generation of Disciple leaders.

Could these men have fallen into the old pit inadvertently? Or do they have a defense of the thing they have done?

Either explanation is unthinkable.

We shall have to wait for them to make their own explanation.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE?

MEANWHILE, the facts as presented above will interpret themselves to our readers, without any labored editorial comment. It remains for us to remind our readers of the fact that Phillips Bible Institute is one of the educational institutions included in the apportionment of the Men and Millions Movement. This means that of every dollar given to the six-million dollar fund a portion goes into the endowment of this Institute whose charter and constitution are radically and flagrantly opposed to the purposes of the Disciples of Christ.

The wonder grows yet more when it is considered that the Commission of Business Men which allotted to this institution its share in the fund was not without knowledge of all the facts herewith presented.

The Disciples Divinity House, an institution loyal to the Disciples' principles and pre-eminently the embodiment of Disciples' ideals, was excluded by the Commission—although afterward grudgingly given half-way recognition—while Phillips Bible Institute was granted unquestioned participation in the brotherhood's alms.

As a result of the public disclosure of these facts there will be, we believe, such an expression of the sound sentiment of our brotherhood as will result either in the thorough reconstruction of the constitution of the Institute or the severing of its connection with the Men and Millions Movement.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S GREATER UTTERANCE.

THE world has hailed the Gettysburg address as Lincoln's greatest utterance, but there was one greater. Omitting the preliminary sentence which recited certain facts and principles, Lincoln said:

"By virtue of the power and for the purpose aforesaid, I do order and declare that all persons held as slaves within said designated states and parts of states are, and henceforward shall be, free; and that the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of said persons.

"And I hereby enjoin upon the people so declared to be free to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defence, and I commend to them that, in all cases when allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages.

"And I further declare and make known that such persons of suitable condition will be received into the armed service of the United States to garrison forts, positions, stations, and other places, and to man vessels of all sorts in paid service.

"And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

"January, 1863. ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

With these words Lincoln emancipated two races; for slavery was the bondage of the master as well as of the slave.

THE WHITE SLAVE FILM QUESTION

IT IS always a debatable question whether the portrayal of crime, and especially of evil conditions of this nature, will have a greater effect in creating an abhorrence of such conditions or in arousing morbid interest through suggestion in minds all too easily influenced in the wrong direction. Much, it is true, depends upon the nature of the films chosen, and upon the locality where they are to be shown. One picture drama aims at instructiveness by showing that the traps set may be found in stores, railway terminals, steamship piers, etc., says The Standard (Chicago).

In a large city this might have its uses, but in some of the smaller cities, where conditions are different, it has been regarded rather as a poisoned arrow than a weapon of truth. Unlikeness to life is one feature to be deprecated; for if the innocent victim is represented as being saved, the circumstances as shown are likely to be different from those actually prevailing. The class of people who attend such exhibits is also to be taken into account. Those with tastes and standards already vitiated certainly will not profit by the instructive features, and to the untrained, susceptible mind the warning against danger is often lost in the trivialities which excite the imagination and overshadow the real issue by lending romance to the tragedy. A picture which would show the prosaic, hard steps back to anything approaching decent living after a serious misstep, might do good, but such would not prove attractive. The reasons for choosing less dangerous methods of instruction are, on the whole, numerous and convincing.

THE SIN OF EXTRAVAGANCE.

PUT your home in your wife's name. Do it openly, and where all your creditors can learn of it. Do it now, when everyone knows you can pay your debts. The most conservative business now has hazards greater than a man should compel his family to share. It is far more honest for the creditors to take those risks than that a man should load upon his wife and children burdens from which with the utmost of his sagacity and industry he may not be able to save them. Carry your home, but not your religion, in your wife's name; and let the world know where you carry both.

Be economical, even in this time of high prices. And what you save, put into conservative investments and not into those wild ventures in which the people of the United States every year sink more than enough money to pay the interest on the national debt. Let your life insurance be of the sort that will be paid to your family in annual instalments, larger while the children are small, and diminishing as they grow up; and not in the sort which your wife's cousin-in-law will invest for her in her own foolish ventures.

Teach the young people wholesome economy and the simple life. One reason ministers' children turn out so much better than other men's as a rule (and they do) is that they learn economy. Boys come to the city and begin to order silk-lined suits before they earn them; begin giving box parties at the theater; and the end of that road is ruin. Do not despise economy and thrift. Economy is no sin.

LOSING LIFE IN THINGS.

THOSE who have wealth in these days and can buy all their hearts desire are beset by the temptation to lose their lives in the midst of an over-abundance of things. The material is all around them in its lavish expression; it is not easy to find the spiritual and to keep the right relation between that which may be bought for a price and that whose worth is beyond the purchasing power of gold. For the old sense of wonder that made childhood glorious, and the yearning that prompted us to reach after God, and the purity of heart that sees Him, these cannot be purchased. These are not things in the market. To lose these is to lose life and there is no other tragedy to compare with that of a lost soul.

CREDO.

FROM THE CHRISTIAN BANNER.

Not what, but whom, I do believe.
That, in my darkest hour of need
Hath comfort that no mortal creed
To mortal man may give;
Not what, but whom!
For Christ is more than all the creeds,
And His full life of gentle deeds
Shall all the creeds outlive.
Not what I do believe, but whom!
Who walks beside me in the gloom?
Who shares the burden wearisome?
Who all the dim way doth illume,
And bids me look beyond the tomb
The larger life to live?
Not what I do believe,
But whom!
Not what,
But whom!

Presbyterians to Meet In Chicago.

Subjects relating to every phase of life—religious, social, educational, political and industrial—will be considered by the one hundred twenty-sixth General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., which will convene Thursday, May 21, in the newly erected $750,000 edifice of the Fourth Presbyterian Church—said to be the most beautiful Presbyterian church in the world—located within sight of Lake Michigan, near Lincoln Park in Chicago.

John Timothy Stone, pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, who was so unexpectedly elected moderator of the General Assembly at Atlanta, Georgia, last year, will open the Assembly in the forenoon with a sermon in which he is expected to survey the church's progress during the last year.

Only once before in the history of the Presbyterian General Assembly has the retiring moderator convened the new Assembly in the church of which he was pastor.

As the moderator mounts the platform to preside over the afternoon session at which the new moderator will be elected, S Hall Young, who spent forty years of his life doing missionary work in Alaska, where he established the first church of any denomination, will present Doctor Stone with a gavel made of the tusks of a walrus which Doctor Young himself killed on one of his expeditions in the Behring Sea. A similar gavel will also be presented to the newly elected moderator when he assumes the duties of his office.

Because of the precedent established last year in the election of Doctor Stone as moderator from the floor of the Assembly, without any preliminary electioneering, no aspirants to the office of moderator have appeared. It is expected none will appear. In previous years the pre-assembly scenes were very much like those attending the scenes before a national political convention, when rival candidates and their supporters fought for prestige.

President Wilson and Secretary of State William J. Bryan, both of whom are Presbyterians, are expected to be present and address the Assembly.

United Presbyterians and Unity.

The United Presbyterian publishes an article by John A. Wilson on Church union. This paper was read before the students of Pittsburg Theological Seminary (United Presbyterian) at their request, and it was at their solicitation that the United Presbyterian published it.

The author begins with this statement: "I am asked to give some of the reasons why I am opposed to the organic union of the churches in general and to the particular union proposed of the United Presbyterian and the Southern Presbyterian Churches."

Considering the general question of organic oneness, Doctor Wilson declares himself opposed to it for two reasons: "1. Because I do not believe in either the necessity or the expediency of oneness of organization for the church." In support of this statement he declares that this principle was neither taught nor practiced by Christ and his apostles, nor by the early church.

"2. I am opposed to the visible organic union of the church because it has proved disastrous in the past."

Taking up the matter of the proposed union with the Southern Presbyterian Church, the writer gives as his reasons for opposing it: 1. "Because we are strangers to each other."

"2. Because the denominations are not contiguols."

"3. Our views are diametrically opposite in social respects."

"4. It would involve us in heavy expenses and materially interfere with our home mission work."

"5. It would terminate the prospect of union with the Northern Presbyterian Church, if, later on, that should seem desirable."

"6. It would put an end to the hope of union with a genuinely congenial church,

Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, who discusses Church Unity.

the Associate Reformed Church of the South."

"7. It would sacrifice the solidarity of our Church."

"8. It would be impossible to get anything like unanimous consent to the proposed union."

"9. The basis proposed is a travesty on the term union; it would be absorption."

Doctor Wilson closes his paper with the following paragraph: "What would President Lincoln and General Grant have said fifty years ago if the Confederate authorities had said: 'If you give up all you have stood for and accept all that we have stood for, our constitution and our institutions, we will accept your name and call ourselves the United States of America.'"

All of which discussion, we must say, is at least interesting!

Methodists Evangelize New York City.

The Northwestern Christian Advocate presents a glowing report of the work of the New York City evangelistic committee of the Methodist Church. This work has ben carried on for nine years. An increase of 20,000 attendants at meetings is registered for last year, this being in part due to the fact that open-air and shop meetings began April 1, instead of June 15, as heretofore, and also to the increase of auxiliary meetings held by Brotherhoods and young people's societies. Many backslidden Christians have been reclaimed and gangs of street children have been infused with better ideals. One worker in a downtown center testifies that as a result of open-air meetings conducted in a city square known as "Bomb Block" and containing over nine hundred children, the children can now be heard singing the gospel hymns they have learned instead of the songs of the street. A special effort is made to interest the children in these open air and vacant lot meetings, of whom there was a total attendance of 95,807.

Doctor Jefferson on Church Unity.

In a recent number of the Constructive Quarterly, there is an article by Chas. E. Jefferson, D. D., entitled "The Church and World Brotherhood." Doctor Jefferson thinks that Church unity will not be brought about by discussion of the points of difference in the subjects of faith and order; or by mass meetings and enthusiasm for points of agreement; or by prayer and charity, which have always been more or less active in Christendom, but by force, i. e., the pressure of necessity induced by the foes of Christianity.

Six Thousand Student Volunteers.

During the four years since the Rochester Convention of the Student Volunteer Convention, 1,466 additional volunteers sailed, making a total of 5,882 that have gone to mission fields. This total is divided as follows: Africa, 638; Arabia, 26; Central America, 40; China, 1,729; India, Burma, Ceylon, 743; Japan, Korea, 1,133; Europe, 28; Mexico, 168; Oceania, 67; Persia, 51; Philippines, 163; Siam, Laos, etc., 104; Turkish Empire, 221; South America, 359; West Indies, 177; Other Countries, 225.

Pittsburgh After a "Men's Hotel."

Plans are on foot to provide Pittsburgh with a men's hotel and temperance club, similar to the Salvation Army's People's Palace, in Boston. The movement was fathered by Colon William Evans, head of the Salvation Army in the middle states. Colonel Evans met with twenty-one of Pittsburgh's leading business men and philanthropists March 25, presented his plans and secured the hearty endorsement of every one present.

Fight Overchurching in Pittsburgh.

The first meeting of Pittsburgh's joint church comity committee was held in the Fort Pitt hotel March 30. Seven of the leading denominations appointed committees of five each to represent them. At this meeting an organization was effected, officers elected and committees appointed to draw up and submit a set of rules and regulations to govern the joint committee in its efforts to solve the problem of overchurched communities and the location of new churches.

Missionary Transforms Community.

"Father" William Duncan, eighty-two years old, has recently retired from his missionary work in Alaska. Fifty-seven years ago as a lay missionary of the Anglican Church he began work among the Metlakathla Indians, then a cannibal tribe. Here he has built up a splendid modern community, with neat houses and sidewalks, church, town hall, school, and other improvements.

Laymen to Lecture Preachers.

For the first time a layman has been chosen to deliver the annual course of lectures on preaching on the Lyman Beecher Foundation at Yale Divinity School. The lectures on this historic foundation have always been given heretofore by some distinguished clergyman, but this year the lecturer is to be Mr. George Wharton Pepper, a conspicuous layman of the Episcopal Church.

Russians Desert State Church.

The Holy Synod of the Orthodox Church has just presented a doleful report to the Czar, complaining that the people are leaving the church in great numbers to become Baptists, Stundists, Old Believers, and Roman Catholics. Atheism is also claiming many. It is claimed that Russia will have as many nonconformists as Great Britain within a few years. It was in 1906 that religious liberty was granted in Russia.

Slavic Churches to Meet In Chicago.

On May 21-24 a conference of four Slavic nationalities—Poles, Bohemians, Slovaks, and Ruthenians—is to be held in Chicago. Among these are members of the Baptist, Methodist, Reformed, Congregational, and Presbyterian churches. The conference will have before it at least three definite objects; namely, the securing of a publishing house to furnish an adequate supply of Christian literature in the Slavic languages; the organization of an interdenominational insurance society for enlisting the immigrant's interest immediately upon his arrival, and for protecting him against the anti-Protestant influence of existing Roman Catholicism, infidel, and other insurance societies; and finally to take steps to provide an agent of the evangelical Slavic churches at each leading port of entry.

Publicity Campaign in Baltimore.

Up-to-date methods and the use of printer's ink are features of a publicity campaign just started by the Young People's Association of First Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, Md. The ammunition for the campaign includes a series of bulletins which are placed in the college buildings of Baltimore. Then these young people follow up this publicity with personal visitations.

Doctor Jowett's Theory of Preaching.

Dr. J. H. Jowett, of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, has just published a new volume containing his recent Yale lectures on preaching. His theory of preaching is summed up in a few simple principles:

First, it must be scriptural, and not only based in some general way on the Bible, but consisting wholly of an exposition of some scriptural truth. Next, it must be intensely spiritual, provided by the Holy Ghost and inspired by a life of intense and instant prayer. And, finally, it must be human. The preacher must not only aim at exposition of a doctrine or a text, but also at the conviction, comfort and uplifting of the man he addresses.

Parish System as Aid to Unity.

A plea for the introduction of the parish system as a method for accomplishing church unity was one of the principal points in an address given recently by Doctor Broening, a Presbyterian minister in Newark, N. J., to the members of his Men's Club. There are, he said, too many large churches within a stone's throw of each other which are necessarily forced into rivalry. The demand for social work, acknowledged by the members of all Evangelical churches, points to the need for effective co-operation.

A Notable Series of Articles.

Dr. William Hayes Ward, who has been for forty-five years associated with the Editorial Department of The Independent and who is now its Honorary Editor, is contributing during 1914 a series of papers under the general title, "What I Believe and Why." The aim of the articles is to present the results of recent scientific investigation and historical research in such plain language that the layman may understand their bearing upon religious belief.

Death of Bishop Scarborough.

The Episcopal Brotherhood sustained a loss in the death of Bishop John Scarborough, of New Jersey, who passed away March 14. Bishop Scarborough had won a position among the leading prelates of the church, and, until recent years, was one of the most active in the Board of Missions and in other phases of church work.

Rev. Charles F. Aked, Whose Theology Created a Stir.

A Cardinal and Prohibition.

Cardinal Gibbons declares that he does not sympathize with prohibition, and that it does not prohibit. A contemporary asks the Cardinal if it is not true that if prohibition becomes universal a large number of Roman Catholics, who are saloonkeepers, brewers and distillers, will be thrown out of business?

Methodists to Change Name?

A change of name proposal will come before the General Council of the Methodist Church South, which meets during May in Oklahoma City. It is pointed out that the word "South" is a misnomer, since this body of Methodists has churches in the Northwest and on the Pacific Coast. It is predicted by those who know the facts that the change of name project will be beaten this year, but that by 1918 it will be carried.

Peace Union Takes Step.

The Church Peace Union recently founded by Mr. Carnegie's $2,000,000 gift has taken its first step: to secure the co-operation of pastors to preach on the peace movement Sunday, May 17, which is the Sunday immediately preceding Peace Day.

Doctor Eliot's "New Religion."

The Watchman-Examiner (Baptist) submits the following indictments, against the Unitarian faith, which the Examiner believes is the religion Doctor Eliot predicts for the world:

(1) "It is a religion that has no large churches;" (2) "Draws no great congregations;" (3) "Gathers no interested and earnest bodies of children in Sunday-schools;" (4) "Has no missions nor missionaries;" (5) "Never enrolled a martyr nor a saint;" (6) "Is every year dropping in rank among the religious bodies of the world."

Doctor Mott at Harvard.

Dr. John R. Mott delivered the Hyde lectures before Andover Theological Seminary on March 25, 26, 27 and 30, and April 1. The lectures were given in Memorial Hall, Harvard University and were open to the public. Doctor Mott also preached at the Harvard University chapel Sunday morning, March 28, and conducted chapel exercises during the week.

Old Boston Church Celebrates.

The two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of First Baptist Church, Boston, will be celebrated next year. This was the third church organized in Boston, and the second Baptist Church formed in Massachusetts, coming next after the church in Swansea, formed by a company of Baptists from Wales. It is intended to make this anniversary of the First church impressive and significant, not only for the church, but for the city of Boston.

Swiss Churches Urge Peace.

An alliance of the churches of Switzerland has invited the churches of Europe to a conference to pronounce against standing armies and armaments.

Doctor Aked Controversy Subsiding.

The stir at San Francisco over the discussion of the fitness of Dr. Charles F. Aked to continue as president of the Federation of Churches of that city, because of his doubts regarding the Virgin Birth, has largely subsided. The Congregationalist remarks that "it looks as if the providential purpose of this controversy over Doctor Aked were the bringing into fresh prominence of the central beliefs of the Christian Church."

Immigrants Address Classes.

Dr. Jenkin Lloyd Jones of the Abraham Lincoln Center, Chicago, has been conducting a class on immigration. Doctor Jones, as a part of the class exercises, selected a competent representative of a foreign group to state to the class the point of view of that group of people, their characteristics, ideals, and the results of their experiences under immigrant conditions in America and Chicago. In this way representatives of the Lithuanians, Scandinavians, Germans, Poles, Bohemians, Armenians, and Russian Jews were heard.

Church Enlists "Big Brothers."

One hundred and thirty members of Wagner Place M. E. Church, St. Louis, Mo., Rev. John McCarthy, pastor, have each agreed to adopt a boy, between the ages of twelve and sixteen, as a sort of foster-brother. The boy obligates himself to be an attendant at the church Sunday-school.

Every Member Canvass in Detroit.

On a recent Sunday afternoon 3,500 homes in the vicinity of Central United Presbyterian Church, Detroit, Mich., were visited by a hundred members of that church, who extended invitations to attend church services to 11,000 men and women. At least 3,000 who were called upon attend no services now.

Of Human Interest

President Wilson Lauds Bryan.

"Your reference to the secretary of state shows how comprehensively you have looked on during the last few months," wrote President Wilson to a correspondent recently. Not only have Mr. Bryan's character, his justice, his sincerity, his transparent integrity, his Christian principle made a deep impression upon all with whom he has dealt, but his tact in dealing with men of many sorts, his capacity for business, his mastery of the principles of each matter he has been called upon to deal with have cleared away many a difficulty and have given to the policy of the state department a definiteness and dignity that are very admirable. I need not say what pleasure and profit I myself have taken from close association with Mr. Bryan or how thoroughly he has seemed to all of us who are associated with him here to deserve not only our confidence, but our affectionate admiration."

A Story of King Edward.

A story about King Edward is worth repeating. Just before the illness which caused the postponement of the coronation he was racing down one of the country roads in his motor car at a speed which was beyond the legal limit.

"Hi! Hi!" called a policeman. "Stop there, in the name of the law!"

His majesty is said to have slackened speed and called out: "But I'm the king!"

"Jest you come aht o' that," was the reply; "yer the third king wot's come along the morning."

Ex-Mayor Shank on Trusts.

Apropos of a policy of trust reformation, ex-Mayor Shank of Indianapolis said at a banquet in New York:

"If a trust is inherently bad, kill it. You can't reform it. It's like the singing lady.

"One man said to another:

"'I hear your wife has been taking singing lessons.'

"'Yes,' was the reply.

"'Well, what do you think of her voice since it's been trained?'

"'It's no better; but there's a lot more of it.'"

Ex-President Eliot on Psychology.

Dr. Charles W. Eliot is against labor unions on the ground that, while increasing wages, they have reduced happiness—the happiness which comes from initiative and from emulation. At a tea in Boston a young lady attempted too heatedly to put Doctor Eliot in the wrong. She talked of the psychology of work, declaring that work, as understood by a college president on the one hand and by a garbage collector, say, on the other was not by any means the same thing.

"The psychology of work—" she cried, when Doctor Eliot ended her too-warm argument very wittily.

"Now," said he, "when you talk of psychology I'll tell you what I think psychology is like. It is like a man splitting a log. When it is done he has two more to split."

A Bryan Story.

Secretary Bryan in one of his eloquent chautauqua addresses said of drunkenness:

"A frequent cause of drunkenness is the desire to drown sorrow. No sorrow can be drowned, though, in any such way.

"Once in Paris I found a promising young friend seated on a cafe terrace swallowing glass after glass of absinthe hurriedly.

"'My boy,' I cried, 'what on earth are you doing?'

"My young friend made a gesture of despair, and, looking up at me with bleared and sorrowful eyes, he replied:

"'Mr. Bryan, I am trying to drown a care that has learned to swim.'"

Unflattering.

Charles F. Murphy, apropos of Richard Croker's famous letter, said good-naturedly at Good Ground:

"Mr. Croker's letter makes me feel like the lady at the Norristown Hotel. This lady was plainly dressed, but she did not think that she looked out of place at the hotel's 75-cent table d'hote. Yet her waiter, having set before her a plate of soup and a plate of fish simultaneously, bent down and whispered in her ear:

"'Eat yer soup first.'"

A Speedy Friendship.

Paderewski tells Harper's of an amusing incident which occurred while he chanced to be dining at a famous restaurant in New York. It so happened that the members of a large national trade association were holding a celebration dinner in another part of the building, and at the close of the feast one of the guests made his way to the cloak-room, where he encountered the famous pianist.

The newcomer stared for a long time at the fair-haired Pole, and at last said:

"You are very much like Paderewski. Do you know him?"

"I am Paderewski," rejoined the other, modestly.

"What?" shouted the stranger, and, dashing at him, he shook both his hands.

Before Paderewski sufficiently recovered from his surprise the man stepped to the door and, calling the others of his party, yelled: "I say, Brown, Wheeler, Carey, and all of you, come here! I want to introduce you to my friend Paderewski."

The Clever Mr. Gladstone.

Once when Mr. Gladstone was traveling, he purchased a beautiful bunch of grapes. At the custom house the officer refused to let the grapes pass, saying that they were dutiable. Gladstone refused to pay the duty, whereupon the custom house officer insisted. Gladstone took them out of the basket and ate every one of them. "Now stop me!" said the "Grand Old Man," triumphantly, as he took his seat in the train bound for Brussels.

The World is Growing Better

Chicago Bars "Family Entrance."

Hope of divesting barrooms and rear rooms of saloons of furniture and partitions so as to afford an unobstructed view from the street have vanished for a time as a result of the action of the Chicago city council last week. After a lively debate the aldermen, by a vote of 30 to 25, refused to table a motion sending the ordinance bearing on that matter, back to the judiciary committee. Immediately afterward a motion to refer again was carried by acclamation.

But, it is pleasant to report, the ordinance prohibiting signs which may be misleading over the rear or side entrance of saloons passed unanimously. The old familiar "Ladies' entrance," "Family entrance" or "Private entrance" must be torn down under this ordinance. It was introduced by one of the aldermen, and becomes effective as soon as the mayor signs it.

Woman Runs Against "Bathhouse John" Coughlin.

John J. Coughlin, better known as "Bathhouse John" is a perfect example of what a Chicago alderman ought not to be. Yet he has been "serving" the big city in that capacity from time immemorial. But the women are now answering to the roll call, and the fight is on. The Progressive party has placed in nomination for alderman, first ward, Marion H. Drake, and she is being boosted with great enthusiasm.

Here is the way the Chicago Municipal Voters League sums up the two leading candidates for this important position:

Marion H. Drake, progressive; lives Auditorium Hotel; court reporting agency, 1301 Ashland Block; born in Beloit, Wis., 1864; stenographer for Attorney Harry Rubens, 1891; 1891-8 for Attorneys Moran, Kraus, Mayer & Stein; since 1898 in court reporting business: in Chicago forty-four and in ward four years; has interested herself in the Immigrant Protective League; graduate Chicago College of Law and admitted to the bar; self-reliant, capable and energetic woman of experience and excellent character; well qualified for the office; signed league platform.

John J. Coughlin, Democrat; lives 2034 Indiana Avenue; insurance broker with other sources of income; finishing eleventh term with notorious record; one of the original gray wolves; in past term voted against nonpartisan city elections, for loading park consolidation bill with tax increase, for original Marshall Field tunnel ordinance, and against creating office of civilian deputy police chief to clean up vice conditions; held in office by special interests and commercialized vice; for a time ran a Turkish bath patronized by race track touts, and later was proprietor of the notorious "Silver Dollar" saloon, a "hangout" for low characters of both sexes.

By the time this issue of The Christian Century reaches its readers, the story will be told.

Women Improve Voting Conditions.

The inevitable first result of equal suffrage is the removal of all polling-places from the neighborhood of saloons, declares George Crell in the Century Magazine. What was good enough for men is not good enough for their women folk. For the most part, voting-booths are in churches, parlors, corner groceries, or schools. Illinois had many of its polling-places decorated with potted plants, many Kansas towns introduced "no-smoking" regulations, and in all the older equal-suffrage states there is yet to be recorded an instance of insult to women in connection with the franchise.

Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

A Mystic from the Far East

There are many definitions of mysticism, but for our purpose we may take it as meaning, "The effort of the human soul to attain to actual communion with the Divine Being."

The saying of Francis of Assisi, "That there were but two things in the world, God and a man's soul—and to know God, and purge one's soul of all that was unlike God," is the very heart of Christian mysticism.

The type of mystic is as varied as the definitions of mysticism—it ranges all the way from the practical benevolence of Johann Tauler, and the meditative spirituality of Thomas a Kempis, to the ascetic absorption of the Hindu devotee. It had its birth in the mysterious East—both Brahmin and Buddhist teach the life of mystical contemplation. With them, the existence of God as a being, the outward world, their own personality, all become unreal, and absorption into Nirvana is their ultimate goal.

HAS MYSTICISM PERILS?

With this oriental type as a warning it is not strange that the dangers of mysticism in the Christian life have been over-emphasized; we are told that the very intensity with which the soul seeks for divine communion has a tendency to make God an experience, rather than a beneficent Being, and to unfit the individual for action and service.

And yet, despite these various perils, the student of church history often finds the highest types of holy living and dying among the Christian mystics. When the church's spiritual life was at lowest ebb, their words and lives frequently came as a protest of spirit against letter, and of active benevolence against dead formalism.

The nature of the German mind made it a fruitful soil for mysticism, and from the Thirteenth century till the time of Martin Luther, the German Mystics embodied nearly all the heartfelt piety in the Church—they have often been called Reformers before the Reformation. Their lives were a reaction and a protest against the worldliness of the church, and the scandalous lives of the clergy—they seceded from mere dogma and formalism and insisted on the spiritual freedom of the individual.

THE GERMAN MYSTICS.

It is interesting to recall that the beginning of German mysticism was in the hearts of devout women, especially was it professed by the nuns; the visions of Hildegarde, and the saintly life of Queen Elizabeth of Hungary seem to have been the inspiration of Meister Eckhart, the first of the great German Mystics. His followers formed themselves into a little band, called "Friends of God" in the dark and stormy days of the Fourteenth century, and their avowed purpose was strengthening one another in the living intercourse with the Good Father. Chief among these was Johann Tauler, whose eloquence made him the center of religious life in South Germany for more than a quarter of the century. He was the purest and highest type of German Mystic—personal relationship to God, and the uselessness of good works without a renewal of the inward life are his great themes. It was said that Luther ranked one of his books of devotion next to the Bible itself.

But the most familiar manual of medieval mysticism to modern readers is "The Imitation of Christ,' by Thomas a Kempis, the little monk of Mount Saint Agnes. It has been translated into more languages, and printed in more editions than any book but the Bible, and so voices the yearnings of the soul for good and for God, that it is said to have been the favorite book of its kind, of such spiritual antipodes as George Eliot and John Wesley.

TAGORE A MYSTIC.

The thoughts on mysticism were suggested by some of the works of Rabindranath Tagore, the Bengali poet who recently received the Nobel prize; as I read some of his prayers, especially those in his "Gitanjali," they seemed like a haunting echo of some familiar strain, and presently it came to me that they recalled some of those communings of the soul with God, in Thomas a Kempis' immortal little book.

Might not this vivid "Aspiration" for the Lord of All Life, have been written by the little brown-eyed monk himself!

Day after day, O Lord of my life, shall I stand before thee face to face?

With folded hand, O Lord of all worlds, shall I stand before thee face to face?

Under the great sky in solitude and silence, with humble heart, shall I stand before thee face to face?

In this laborious world of thine, tumultuous with toil and with struggle, among hurrying crowds, shall I stand before thee face to face?

And when my work shall be done, alone and speechless,

Shall I stand before thee face to face.

A NOBLE PRAYER.

And is not this a noble prayer for strength, with its longing for both being and doing?

This is my prayer to thee, my Lord —strike, strike at the root of penury in my heart.

Give me the strength lightly to bear my joys and sorrows.

Give me the strength to make my love fruitful in service.

Give me the strength never to disown the poor or bend my knee before insolent might.

Give me the strength to raise my mind high above daily trifles.

And give me the strength to surrender my strength to thy will with love.

And what a high dedication of himself and his work to God is the closing poem-prayer in the book!

In our salutation to thee, my God, let all my senses spread out and touch this world at thy feet.

Like a rain cloud of July, hung low with its burden of unshed showers, let all my mind bend down at thy feet in one salutation to thee.

Let all my songs gather together their diverse strains into a single current, and flow to a sea of silence in one salutation to thee.

Like a flock of homesick cranes, flying night and day back to their mountain nests, let all my life take its voyage to its eternal home in one salutation to thee.

Does it seem a strange thing to say that we of the West may learn a lesson from this mystic of the East? This is pre-eminently a commercial age, and there is danger that the Church itself may become tainted with the ever present poison of materialism; not only the passion for fine buildings and rich appointments, but the emphasis on outward observance—even the insistence on religion as a historical belief, or an ethical code, may leave out the very heart and essence of it all—and that is, that the supreme aim and end of life is the soul's quest for its God.

And so, it is well for us to hearken to the voices of seekers after God today, and to tune our hearts and lives to the messages of the saints of long ago—Francis of Assisi; Bernard of Clairvaux, and the noble group of German mystics. And most of all, to strive for that hunger and thirst for the divine, that the Hebrew poet and prophet felt when he said:

"As the hart panteth after the water brooks,
So panteth my soul after Thee, O God.
My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God;
When shall I come and appear before God?"

—I. W. H.

HYMN.

Resplendent sun, your brilliant beams
Should make my heart confess
A deeper awe of Him, who is Our Sun of Righteousness!

O little star, that sweetly shines
In heaven like a gem,
Your light recalls salvation's star—
The Star of Bethlehem.

O falling rain, your welcome drops
Will make the parched earth live!
Our Saviour to all thirsting souls
Water of Life will give.

O flower, opening to the sun,
Teach my heart ne'er to close
To Him whose pure, sweet life was like
The lily and the rose.

O guileless lamb, bring back to me
That life of toil and pain,
The suffering of the Heavenly Lamb
Who for my sins was slain.

Dear Saviour, may we love Thee so,
That all good things may be
But mirrors, where our longing eyes
Seek images of Thee!

—Ida W. Harrison.

The breath of God's upon the world,
His winds are strong and His surges long,
For they sweep and roll from pole to pole.
The West is yeast to the foaming East,
The heathen soul's awake to the goal
Of its highest meed and its deepest need.
Refreshed and quickened the hearts of men,
By the touch of the Spirit felt again,
By the presence that rules beyond our ken—
The breath of God blows o'er the world.

Disciples Table Talk

Indiana's Diamond Jubilee.

Central Church, Terre Haute, George Darsie, pastor, extends a most cordial invitation to Indiana Disciples, and others, to attend the Diamond Jubilee convention which will assemble in Terre Haute, May 11-14. Oscar E. Kelley, chairman of local publicity committee, writes that preparations are being made for a record-breaking attendance.

All who attend will be entertained in the homes for lodging and breakfast without charge and dinner and supper will be served in the basement of the church at twenty-five cents per meal. There will be no registration fees, and programs will be furnished free. This is expected to be "the greatest convention in the history of Indiana's state work."

Kentucky Pastor Discusses Dancing.

T. S. Tinsley, pastor at Midway, Ky., discussed the very-much-in-the-air subject of dancing in a recent sermon. In closing his sermon, Mr. Tinsley proposed principles by which modern amusements—novel-reading theater-going, card-playing, dancing—may be judged. The following is his statement:

"GOD.—Good will cultivate the sense of God's presence and approval. Evil will destroy it. Your faith in God will help you. SOUL.—Good will improve and enrich your soul's experience. Evil will injure and impoverish it. Your faith in your soul will help you. RELIGION.—Good will always harmonize with religion. Evil is always discordant. Your faith in religion will help you. BIBLE.—Good finds its natural outflow from the Bible. Evil is the suggestion of Satan. Your faith in the Bible will help you. CHURCH.—Good is always congenial with the true church. Evil is enemy of it. Your faith in the church will help you. JUDGMENT.—Good will prepare you for the final judgment. Evil will make you fear it. Your faith in the judgment will help you. ETERNITY.—God gives you Heaven both here and hereafter. Evil gives Hell both here and hereafter. Your faith in Eternity will help you. GOD, Soul, Religion, Bible, Church, Judgment, Eternity: these are all key words for young Christians—in fact for all Christians."

E. L. Powell on Christian Science.

E. L. Powell, of First Church, Louisville, discussed Christian Science in his month-end sermon, taking as his text 2 Tim. 4:3, 4. "For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine, but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers having itching ears, and they shall turn away their ears from the truth and shall be turned unto fables." Dr. Powell pointed out as logical conclusions to which this so-called "science" leads, the following: 1. The destroying of any great moral purpose, any enthusiasm of humanity. 2. The utter extermination of conscience. 3. The extinction of sentiment and sympathy. 4. The reign of selfishness. In concluding he presented a fact which he declared proved Christian Science absolutely out of the question—the Scientist's conception of God. "What is the conception of God entertained by this philosophy?" he asked. "God is all. God is the whole and the only reality. There is nothing outside of Him. If this be true, then God exists in Himself, for Himself, and has nothing whatever to do since He has no field of operation. The Scientists' conception of God is an imprisoned and fettered Deity, hardly on a plane of thought with the impassive Buddha, enshrined in placid silence and looking with Sphinx-like eyes upon the desert of life. A God who is all, and having no relationship, therefore, of Saviour or of redeemer or of healer, is the logical conclusion which follows from the declaration of Christian Science that the Divine Mind is the only reality." Over against this, Dr. Powell presented the God of the Christian: "Ah, friends," he said. "I think that the God of the Christian is more worth while. I believe in a God who is imminent in nature and in life, in a God whose life is in the sap that flows through the trunk of a tree, whose will is imminent in the governance and guidance of every star which makes its way through the pathless heavens; a God outside whose life and interest no sparrow falls to the ground; outside whose life no rivers flow, no winds blow. I believe in a God who is imminent in this body for healing purposes, but He must have some actual healing to do. I believe in a God who is imminent in this mind to quicken the intellect and to quicken the spirit which can use that intellect even as the organist uses the keys of the organ to startle it into the energy of grand music. I believe in a God concerning whom Jesus Himself said, 'The Father worketh hitherto and now I am carrying on His work;' a God who never slumbers or sleeps; a God who is present in all of the pulsing, throbbing energies and activities of human life; a God who showed Himself so pre-eminently alive that He came down to earth and clothed Himself with flesh and blood; a God who in the person of Jesus Christ swung Himself forward to victory by way of the cross."

Association of Colleges to Meet.

Garn, Christian University. "Qualifications of Faculty Members," T. B. MacCartney, Transylvania University; discussion led by E. V. Zollars, Phillips University. Central Church, Des Moines, Grows.

Central Church, Des Moines, under Finis Idleman's leadership, is in the midst of a campaign to provide adequate equipment for the needs of its church life. An addition will be built, which will take care of pastor's duty, dining-rooms, gymnasium, play room, etc., in addition to several Sunday-school rooms. It is proposed to live up to the responsibility which the Central has for the social and religious life of 400 girls and young women and 300 boys and young men. The completed Sunday-school room will accommodate 1,000. The young people, it is reported, are pledging royally to this growing work.

Dr. Willett at Des Moines.

Dr. H. L. Willett's series of lectures, given at Central Church, Des Moines, April 6-8, comprised the following topics: General topic: "The New Order in the Orient, or Darkness and Dawn." Monday, 4 p. m.—"The Lighting of Lamps." (Educational work.) Monday 8 p. m.—"The Changing Orient." Tuesday 4 p. m.—"A Nation in Tears (Korea)." Tuesday 8 p. m.—"The Oldest of the Nations (China)." Wednesday 4 p. m.—"The Social Significance of the New Order." Wednesday 8 p. m.—"Cross and Crescent (Mohammedan Lands)."

B. A. Abbott Addresses Credit Men.

B. A. Abbott, pastor of Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, speaking before the Credit Men's Association at the St. Louis City Club, declared more sentiment was needed in the business world. Some of Dr. Abbott's epigrams, in his talk to the credit men, were: "You will never have an honest horse-race, until you have an honest human race." "We hope to dissipate the old prejudice that the preacher is invisible six days of the week and incomprehensible on the seventh." "Someone has defined a pessimist as a person who Fletcherizes his quinine pills, while the optimist is one who eats his doughnut and throws the hole away." "The credit system is based on faith in human nature."

Massillon Pastor on Practical Topic.

H. Erwin Stafford, minister at Massillon, O., in a sermon on the subject, "The Right of Every Child to Be Well Born," urged that a uniform law be passed, demanding that candidates for marriage register at least 90 days before the granting of licenses in order that authorities might have time to investigate the health and moral records of the contracting parties, even though they be foreigners from very distant countries. This law, he said, should provide against the union of physically, mentally and morally unfit. In the meantime each minister or officer of the law who has the right to marry, should absolutely refuse to join the unfit in marriage." Mr. Stafford declared that he practices what he preaches in this last respect.

New Texas Superintendent of Missions.

A. D. Rogers, pastor of First Church, Denton, Tex., has been appointed successor to J. C. Mason as state secretary and superintendent of missions. He will take up his work about June 1. Mr. Mason, who recently resigned, served as secretary of the mission board for eleven years, and consented to serve until June 1. The annual Texas Christian Missionary convention will be held at Gainesville May 11-14. Judge Anson Rainey is chairman of the board. E. S. Bledsoe is president-elect of the convention, and J. C. Mason corresponding secretary.

Drake Graduates at Atlanta.

Drake graduates, former students and friends who attend the 1914 convention of the Churches of Christ at Atlanta will hold a reunion and dinner. Arrangements have been completed with the Ladies' Aid society of the First Church at Atlanta for the use of their parlors and dining room for the occasion. The dinner will be held October 10.

C. A. McDonald, pastor of church at New Philadephia, Ohio, gave a lecture at First Church, Massillon, Ohio, on Social Purity recently. Mr. McDonald has a great address, writes H. E. Stafford, Massillon pastor, and presents this delicate question in a very direct and educational manner, yet with a nicety that dignifies the theme. Mr. Stafford believes that Mr. McDonald ought to have an opportunity to present his lecture in all of our churches.

The work in South Omaha is in a more vigorous condition now than in many years.

W. J. Hastie resigned some months since and the work is now led by John G. Alber, a graduate student of the University of Nebraska. Until recently Mr. Alber was the pastor of the church at Auburn where he succeeded in building one of the handsomest structures in the state.

J. L. Thompson, pastor of the Temple church, Kansas City, Kansas, was called to Omaha March 29 to assist in "Go to Church Sunday." In the evening, E. E. Elliott, National Brotherhood Secretary preached for Mr. Thompson, and the Brotherhood Quartette of the Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City, Missouri, furnished the music.

L. S. Cupp gave his illustrated lecture on Christian Education at the Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City, March 29. Mr. Cupp is supplying the pulpit at the church until Frank L. Bowen finishes his city work and becomes its pastor.

Geo. P. Taubman, minister at Tulsa, Oklahoma, was seriously injured recently, but happily escaped death by a small margin. An automobile in which he was riding collided with a street car and Mr. Taubman was thrown out on his head. He was unconscious and it was believed could not live. We are glad to report his rapid recovery.

A. F. Hensey reports from Bolenge, Feb. 1: "Six more baptized here today, four from Bolenge, and two from Bojia."

It is rumored that Peoria, Illinois, Des Moines' and Cleveland will each bid for our 1916 National Convention.

Sumner T. Martin came to Nowata, Oklahoma, last July. He found a city of 5,000 surrounded by flowing oil fields, and crowded to the brim with people. The self-sacrificing pastor's family lived in the church for three months until a house could be secured. There are five churches in Nowata, the Christian Church being the largest and most prosperous.

H. W. Elliott, State Secretary of Kentucky Missions, is sojourning in Florida on account of the illness of his wife.

Redlands, Cal., sends $125 as an offering from the church.

Darrow, Ill., more than doubles its apportionment.

F. S. Sellick, of Indianapolis, Ind., preaches for the North Madison, Ind., church. They have exceeded their apportionment.

Ferris, Texas, sends $62 in addition to $14.10 sent March 7, for Foreign Missions. H. T. Sutton ministers to that congregation.

Williamsburg, Ky., sends $25 additional and now have reached their full apportionment.

Two churches which have done very well are Detroit, Tex., and Blooming Grove, Tex. The former exceeded its apportionment, and the latter sends more than five times its apportionment.

During the month of March we had much bad weather, which hindered the offering for Foreign Missions, especially in the country churches.

However, the income for the month amounted to $40,272, a gain over the corresponding month, 1913, of $228. The number of contributing churches was 1,287, a gain of 73. There was also a gain in the number of contributing Sunday-schools, and an increase in the amount from the schools. The individual offerings were $4,857, a gain of $594.

There was a loss of $3,300 in annuity gifts, but a gain of $3,200 in bequests. The gain in regular receipts was $328.

We are enconuraged to believe that during April we will be able to make a better proportionate showing in the regular receipts. Let every church be in line at once. No church should neglect this great work to which our Lord has called us.

The missionaries are looking to our people expectantly. They are ready to move forward if the churches speak the word.

Please send to the undersigned at once.

F. M. RAINS, Secretary.

The Congress to Meet at Indianapolis

The following statements from President E. L. Powell and C. H. Winders, of Indianapolis, will explain the substitution of Indianapolis for Louisville as the place of meeting of this year's congress, April 28-30.

"On account of local reasons it has been found expedient to change the place of meeting of the Disciples' Congress from Lexington, Kentucky, to Indianapolis, Indiana. It was not understood that the occurrence of the Lexington races from April 24 to May 6 would practically make it impossible for the congress to be entertained at the date announced. The late discovery of this fact and the brief time allowed to locate another date determined the change of place to Indianapolis. The sessions will be in the church at Irvington, Charles H. Winders, pastor. The other Indianapolis brethren will co-operate and we know from past experience that this city does the handsome thing always.

"The railroad accommodations are all that could be desired and we are safe in predicting an excellent attendance. The full program of the congress will be announced next week.

"E. L. POWELL, President.
"C. M. SHARPE, Secretary."

C. H. Winders, whose congregation will be host to the congress writes as follows:

"The congress will be held in the Downing Avenue Church, Indianapolis, Ind., in the place of Lexington, Ky. On behalf of the churches and ministers of Indianapolis I wish to extend a cordial invitation to all interested. A good location, a good program and there should be a large attendance.

"Take Irving car to Downey Avenue and walk one block south. Please notify us of your coming.

"708 Ritter St. C. H. WINDERS."

One Hundred Missionaries for Settlement Service in Cities

The announced purpose of our Home Missionary Society, to help train One Hundred Missionaries for settlement service in our large cities of the United States, meets with my hearty approval. For many years my lot has been cast with the down-town work in some of our cities. The problems of this work have grown upon me with the passing years. The down-town field is ground between the upper and nether mill stones of rampant vice and so-called respectable indifference to God's work. The trained settlement worker with a generous field equipment is an absolute necessity.

The effort of our Home Board to enter upon this work ought to double the offerings this year and so furnish the sinews of war to begin this much-needed preparation of acceptable workers. There is no time to be lost while we delay or debate.

Detroit, Mich. C. J. TANNER.

The Northeast Iowa convention of Christian churches will be held in Cedar Falls, May 5-7, where J. M. Morris is pastor of the local church. About 500 attendants are expected.

The church at Ashland, Okla., was destroyed by fire March 19. It is believed the fire was of incendiary origin. An oil can was found in the church yard.

The church building at Anaconda, Mont., where H. F. Ritz ministers, had a narrow escape from destruction by fire March 22.

Walter M. Jordan, pastor at Butte, Mont. has been elected president of the County Sunday-school Association.

Iowa's state convention will be held this year at Colfax, July 13-20. B. W. Garrett is preparing the program.

W. B. Slater, pastor at First church, Davenport, Iowa, will give the Decoration address in that city.

R. A. DOAN TO VISIT MISSION FIELDS.

R. A. Doan, consecrated layman of Nelsonville, Ohio, will sail with his family for the mission lands in July. He and his wife and son expect to visit all the Asiatic fields and probably Africa before their return. For years Mr. Doan has been deeply interested in the foreign work and has desired to take this journey. He now has his business affairs in shape so that he can go. Under Mr. Doan's leadership one of the largest men's classes in America has been built up. For some time the feeling has been strong in Mr. Doan's heart that he should give up the personal management of his business and devote the rest of his life to distinctly Christian work here in America. The time has come now when he feels that he can do this, and he has so arranged his affairs. After spending about a year intimately studying the foreign missionary work at first hand, he expects to return to America for service.

NEWS FROM THE FOREIGN SOCIETY.

Our great Union Educational Institution at Nankin, China, publishes "The University of Nankin Magazine." Volume 5, No. 8 is before us. It embraces about forty-eight pages and is published in English and Chinese. The object of the magazine is to set forth a record of the university activities in all departments.

Recently that terrible enemy to humanity —smallpox—paid its visit to a number of cities in China, including Nankin. It has already swept away many human lives.

W. R. Hunt, Chuchow, China, says: "The secular papers in China commenting on the union of the work of missions predict great and widespread movements in the direction of a new Christian civilization. Have concluded my 25th year of service in China and am singing yet new Doxologies."

The church at Colorado Springs, Colo., is a Sustaining Living-link in the Foreign Society, and supports the work of W. R. Holder, Monieka, Congo, Africa. S. E. Brewster is the pastor.

Dr. G. W. Brown, Jubbulpore, India, writes in a recent letter as follows: "There are signs that within the next few years in our area people will be turning to Christ in large numbers. We have just closed our annual convention, and have had the largest number of baptisms which we have had in the mission since it was first organized. But we must have more help from home. I wish to call attention to the fact that our number of missionaries remains practically stationary. We have no more missionaries on the field this year than we had when I first came to India fourteen years ago."

The Central Church, Peoria, Ill., M. L. Pontius, pastor, expects to step into the Living-link column this year.

Last week the Foreign Society received $2,700 from the estate of the late Mrs. Catherine B. Self, of Hillsdale, Kans.

The church at Cameron, W. Va., W. E. Pierce, minister, for 10 years, supports Mrs. C. P. Hedges, at Longa, Congo, Africa. The church has recently voted unanimously to continue her as their Living-link.

The church at Wellsville, N. Y., will support the work of C. P. Hedges on the Congo, Africa, and thus become one of our Living-link churches.

The Blooming Grove church, Texas, James A. Crain, minister, raised more than five times its apportionment in the March offering. Mr. Crain never failed to take the March offering during his ministry.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon and J. B. Daugherty writing from Manila, P. I., say: "The native missionary society started last October is now supporting Juan P. Garcia, an evangelist firmly grounded in the faith and an aggessive preacher. The church at Rizal, of the province of Laguna, has planted a church in the neighboring town of San Pablo, and to this new church were added six during January. The total number of additions reported for the month of January is twenty-six."

The work on the hospital in Manila, P. I., goes on apace, the missionaries say. The plumbing is now being installed. The people are beginning to find the location and the hospital force is kept very busy.

The College of the Bible at Manila, P. I., recently graduated Mr. Ignacio E. Recio, who completed the prescribed course in five years. He is a promising young man and enjoys a lucrative position with the government during the week and is active for the Lord on Sunday.

Leslie Wolf and family of the Philippine Islands are now on their way to America for their regular and most necessary furlough, after more than six years of successful labor among the Philippine brethren. They are soon to visit their aged parents.

The church at New Union, Ky., gave $160, in the March offering. This is the largest amount they ever contributed. Prof. A. W. Fortune of the College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky., is the minister.

The church at Mayfield, Ky., J. J. Castleberry, minister sends $600 as their March offering. This congregation finds great joy in supporting a missionary on the Congo. They are delighted with the service they are rendering.

The church at Owensboro, Ky., sends $410 on its Living-link. Dr. M. G. Buckner is the pastor. He has served that congregation many years. It is a growing and prosperous church.

Within the past two weeks the Foreign Society has received six annunity gifts. Four of these were new, that is, from friends who have not given on this plan before. Of these amounts $1,000 came from Kentucky; $500 from Indiana; $500 from West Virginia; $500 from Illinois; and one gift of $500 and another of $400 from Ohio. This makes a total of $3,400. We hope many other friends 50 years of age or older will make gifts in this way.

The board also agreed to assist the Soniat Avenue Church, New Orleans, to secure a $13,500 lot by agreeing to furnish two-thirds of the amount in cash, provided the church would raise the other one-third in cash. This is one of the best lots in the residence portion of the city on the corner of St. Charles and Henry Clay avenues.

The demands on the Church Extension Board are increasing every month.

THE SUPREME APOLOGETIC.

(From Toronto Convention Address of A. D. Harmon.)

The care of the unfortunate is a natural, sane and fundamental expression of Christianity. Jesus was the Norm of gospel propagation. He was in his ministry what he would have us to be. He emphasized things fundamental and cast the program for all ages. The sick, the helpless, the homeless, lay like a crushed flower upon his bosom. They were in abundance then. Their name is legion now. The individual and social sins and industrial misfortunes that produced them then produce them now. It is a mistake to suppose these are peculiar times. They are peculiar only in magnitude, not in kind. If the care of these was germane in Jesus' ministry then, it ought not to be secondary in ours. Jesus so related his gospel to physical wants that he broke up every funeral he attended, confronted every sorrowing heart, fed every hungry crowd, and released every infirm captive. Most of his parables emphasize the open hand, and every miracle was benevolent but one. He taught that man's first duty is to God, his second duty to man. The proof that a man's heart is on the perpeculiar is that his hand is on the horizontal. Jesus, as the Norm of God incarnate, pulsating in consonance with infinite love, could not do otherwise. Can the church do less and finish his uncompleted work? Has she not lost his heart when she is little moved by the cries that wrung his soul? It is not a sufficient excuse to say he worked by divine means called miracles. The answer to that is we worked by divine means called hospital and home. That the method is immaterial and the result material is evident in that he rebuked James and John who forbade the man that cast out devils because he had no conventional commission. That we can do this work at all leaves its neglect without defence.

In this splendid ministry we have made a commendable beginning. We journeyed seventy-seven years preaching the gospel before we looked around to see whether the signs promised of Jesus were following. Then six women and one man observed the absence of these signs and by their prayers the National Benevolent Association was born. It carries on four lines of work. It homes the dependent aged. It homes the orphan child. It heals the sick in his poverty, and provides homes for dependent widows with their children, believing the normal home is one in which mother and child are not separated. It has established twelve institutions with a capacity for five hundred children and seventy-five aged. It has nursed and healed one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three of the world's sick and poor. It has homed one hundred ninety-seven aged. It has helped to self-support one thousand one hundred fifty-one destitute women. It has fathered and mothered seven thousand one hundred and four parentless children. It has graduated twenty-six nurses. It has now over three hundred and fifty thousand dollars for a new hospital enterprise in Kansas City. The plans are now perfected and the building will immediately be begun, which, when finished, will be one of the most up-to-date hospitals in the land. In this benevolent work this association has property valued at three hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, not including the Kansas City Hospital and the Child Saving Institute of Omaha, Neb. This is a commendable beginning, but brethren, for a people who have been preaching the primitive gospel for one hundred years, who stress the apostolic order, whose offerings for missions pass the million, whose individual assets are billions, and whose religious pride is a full gospel, it is not sufficient.

Teach Christ

TO YOUR ADULT AND YOUNG PEOPLE'S CLASSES. The Uniform Lessons for 1914 are based upon the life of Christ. This means that the emphasis in the year's work will be placed upon that matchless study. The best book on that theme published for young people's and adult classes is Dr. Loa E. Scott's

"LIFE OF JESUS"

Why You Should Use This Text:

1. It is not a study of men's opinions of the events of Christ's life, but is a direct study of the Scriptures themselves. You cannot use this text without your Bible in your hands.

2. It is positive. There is not a skeptical question in this book. It speaks with authority.

3. It is simple and practical. The poorest teacher should find it a pleasure to instruct a class with this book as a basis.

Your class, whether high school students or grandfathers, will enjoy Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus." A new era in your work will begin if you take up this charming study.

THE LOST SHEEP AND THE LOST COIN.

INTERNATIONAL UNIFORM LESSON FOR APRIL 26, 1914.

Luke 15:1-10. Memory Verses, 8-10.

Golden Text—There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.—Luke 15:10.

American Standard Bible.
Copyright, 1901, by Thomas Nelson & Sons.
(Used by permission.)

(1) Now all the publicans and sinners were drawing near unto him to hear him. (2) And both the Pharisees and the scribes murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them.

(3) And he spake unto them this parable, saying, (4) What man of you, having a hundred sheep, and having lost one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it? (5) And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing. (6) And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and his neighbors, saying unto them, Rejoice with me, for I have found my sheep which was lost. (7) I say unto you, that even so there shall be joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine righteous persons, who need no repentance.

(8) Or what woman having ten pieces of silver, if she lose one piece, doth not light a lamp, and sweep the house, and seek diligently until she find it? (9) And when she hath found it, she calleth together her friends and neighbors, saying, Rejoice with me, for I have found the piece which I had lost. (10) Even so, I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.

BY REV. A. Z. CONRAD, PH.D.

"Jesus was willing to be misunderstood. Every teacher must reckon with misrepresentation. Do not explain. Do not apologize. If conscious of honorable intention go ahead and do your work. Jesus had been maligned because he mixed with the mob. It was not to the liking of the religious aristocracy of his day that a Rabbi should interest himself in the rabble. He perplexed the people by the paradox of perfect holiness unhesitatingly coming in contact with corruption. There was no disease which he feared and no danger which he did not challenge. His life was a sufficient vindication of his conduct. He did not in the parable of the lost sheep and the lost coin stoop either to explanations or apologies but he did compel an immediate recognition of the reasonableness of his search for lost souls. He smashed custom with impunity when it stood in the way of God's chariot of love. He was courteous beyond all others, yet threw caution to the winds when questions of eternal life were the issue. He shocked every sense of propriety as he consorted with perjured publicans or admitted to his presence sinners who were under the ban of public contempt. He punctured the bubbles of pride and withered with scorn imperious self-righteousness, but he never stepped aside to explain his own conduct. He uttered no words he ever had to retract. He did nothing for which he ever expressed one word of regret. His mingling with the unwashed found its warrant in redemptive purpose. Nothing less than this will ever justify associations with the unbelieving and the besmirched.

GOD'S CLAIM.

"What man among you having an hundred sheep." God claims all. But all do not recognize the claim. Jesus taught every man to say, "Our Father," but filial devotion is no part of the program of self-indulging sensualists. What about every person being a "child of God?" It depends upon what you mean. In the sense in which it is much used in our day it is utterly untrue. If you mean that God is the Creator of all and has a claim upon all; if you mean that God is Father in the sense both of Creator and Benefactor, then let the term be used understandingly. But if you mean that all humanity sustains equal relations to God nothing could be farther from the fact. How absolutely absurd to call a blasphemous infidel or a heartless libertine "a child of God." Yet, as the Author of all being, the worst and the most degraded individual is not beyond God's claim and care. He claims the drunkard. He claims the pharisaical, self-sufficient, insolent man who worships culture instead of God. He claims the unregenerate, yet professing church members. But only those who answer the claim are in reality children of God. The parable concerns itself with the relation of the shepherd to the lost sheep.

UNINTENTIONAL DEPARTURE.

"Having lost one of them." The lost sheep did not maliciously turn its back on the fold. There was no intention at the outset of permanent departure. It grazed its way to the edge of its own grave. It followed the appeal of appetite. It degenerated by indulging desire. It went toward its doom with head down. Leaving God is by no means always intentional. Few men who are sinking in the quicksands expected ever to be there. The drunkard one time ridiculed the idea that he would ever be a forlorn, forsaken wreck. The man in the cell did not intend to depart from the path of honor and never expected to feel the sharp claws of the law. The De Luxe-book-swindlers did not begin life with any intention of breaking with honesty and honor. The avowed unbeliever occupied his mind with unhealthful and doubt awakening literature, going from point to point very much as the sheep reached for the next tuft of grass, until both flock and shepherd were lost. We are foolish enough to try to excuse the unintentionally imperiled. But for what has God given us reason? Why are we endowed with will? It is not enough not to have intended to do evil. We must intend to do good. It is no sufficient excuse to say, "I meant no harm." We are expected to do purposefully and mean well. It was the business of the sheep to keep within the sound of the shepherd's voice. Of course the application of the parable has its limit, and may not be too much strained. But there are some very significant suggestions about the responsibility resulting from human endowment. The fact that we have been given reason, a will and a conscience removes all excuse for perils resulting from carelessness.

GETTING LOST GRADUALLY.

The sheep was not lost all at once. "It is the little rift within the lute, Which growing wider makes the music mute." The gradualness of all degeneration increases its probability and does not lessen its peril. Roads very nearly parallel are far more confusing and dangerous than those that separate at abrupt angles. The pin prick with its secreted poison gives no evidence of the disaster and death which has begun. The very nearness of the flock, the sheep with its head down intent only upon the suggestive clumps of juicy grass before it added to the certainty of the hopeless end. Christian relationships and even fellowship with the church sometimes prevent a man's consciousness that he is getting away from God. Everything is determined by direction. Though the departure was gradual it was none the less sure. No man would be a drunkard if the agony of delirium resulted from the first step down. If the thorn scene and the quagmire scene of the lost sheep were the immediate consequnce of leaving God fewer people would be found in indifference or despair, with no hope and without God in the world.

THE SHEPHERD'S SOLICITUDE.

It was not the bleating of the lost sheep that called the Shepherd. When the shepherd began his search not a sound had reached the sheep-fold. It was the solicitude of shepherdly love that determined the course of the shepherd. "Doth not leave the ninety and nine and go after that which is lost." We must not misinterpret the attitude of the shepherd to the "Ninety and nine that safely lay in the shelter of the fold." They were not neglected. They were not left unattended. They were not left unprovided. They were not left unprotected. Our human weaknesses and limitations lead us into peril at this point. When we search for the lost we sometimes do neglect the responsibilities of the fellowship with the saved. We cannot be too much interested in rescuing the victims in the city slums. It is perfectly possible and perfectly justifiable to yearn with unspeakable intensity for the recovery of the lost people of far away lands. But, meanwhile the ninety and nine have some rights which we are bound to regard. Our sympathy and love for those in our immediate spiritual relationship must be manifest in the Christlike kindness and co-operation due on account of our very relationships to them. We are not to think that the ninety and nine were either forgotten or forsaken by the shepherd. Every sufficient provision was made for them. "God is mindful of his own." The value of an immortal soul to God is beautifully portrayed in the parable. The individualism of the divine method is also indicated. It was the one lost sheep that claimed the daring devotion of the shepherd. We understand how Christ would die on the Cross to have the world, but that he would make the costly sacrifice to save me, that taxes belief to the utmost. The shepherd might have dismissed the matter as of small moment. Only one out of a hundred! The sheep had no need to get lost. There was every inducement for it to stay. It had never been neglected by the shepherd. Its departure was its own fault. Let it suffer the consequences. Right here we see the significance of the divine sacrifice. It was to reconcile his enemies that God almighty came to earth in the person of Jesus Christ and by an irresistible love reaches the lost. No sinner has ever left the church of his own accord because neglected by his Lord. The coming of Jesus into this world is simply the shepherd on the wilderness journey to find the lost sheep.

THE LOST COIN.

"One out of ten." A mere trifle. No. In the eye of God valuable beyond any commercial estimate. The lost coin had much beside its purchasing value. It was the custom for a girl thus to wear her dowry in silver coin. The custom still continues. It had a sentimental worth. The loss of it broke the charm. You cannot measure values when you get into the realm of love's emotion. The point of the parable, however, is the diligence of the search. Again, Jesus is represented as so intent upon the discovery and restoration of what men call insignificant, but what to him has eternal value, that he will leave nothing undone which can be done to make the discovery and to effect the return. Redemptive passion is intensely active. Zeal quickly wanes in Christian service when we have ceased to believe that any one is lost. The holiest passion of life is the redemptive passion. The purpose to reclaim and to restore wonderfully changes our harsh judgment and marvelously increases our willingness to make sacrifices for others.

"UNTIL HE FIND IT."

The dimensions of divine love are only discoveries when we read these words, "Until he find it." There are positively no limits to the solicitudes of God for the well being of his children. Calvary proclaims what God is willing to do to save a soul. It is at the Cross alone we can read our own worth to the Eternal Father and the blessed Saviour. Awful as is the Cross it is fully equalled by the glory of victory. The parable reaches its splendid climax in an outburst of song. The mountain struggle is minimized and recovery is magnified. All the bells of Heaven are set ringing when a lost soul has been won by the love of Jesus Christ. The Cross is awful to contemplate but the victory is heaven-filling. No ecstasy of earth is comparable for one minute with that which comes to a disciple of Jesus who is conscious of having been used of God to lead a lost one into the Kingdom. Never is one brought safely into the fold without swelling the anthems of earth's joy and flooding Heaven with song.

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

TOPIC FOR APRIL 22.

The Fruits of a Religious Life. Gal. 5:22-24; John 15:1-5.

"By their fruits ye shall know them." This test we are to apply to the disciple as well as to the teacher. The church must meet it. It must demonstrate its right to be called the church of the living God by manifesting the fruits of the Spirit. The heat and noise of a revival can be matched in an assembly of savages. What remains after the evangelist and his singers have gone? What comes out of the revival? What sort of support does the teaching of the Sunday-school and the pulpit receive during the hours of business and pleasure?

LOVE.

Love is the practical principle of Christian conduct. He who has love has all the other excellencies. The quarrelsome Galatians were about to omit this principle from the list of spiritual goods. All sin is sin against love. As long as we know what it is to love one another, and exert ourselves to the utmost to live up to our knowledge, we are in no danger of committing the outrages that have many times been perpetrated by men who thought they were serving God. The persecutor substitutes loyalty to forms of church government, to theological statements, to ceremony, for appreciation of human values. Jesus taught us to guard the interests of souls.

JOY AND PEACE.

To go about with the countenance of one who is ready to write failure as a true description of life is to deny the faith. Joy is an essential element of the religious life. Christianity provides for the joy of childhood. One of the sweet pleasures of mature and aged disciples is to witness the play of happy children. There is, however, a deeper joy than that of the child; it is the joy of those who know the sorrow of life and who have found a faith that turns sorrow into joy. Such have peace. The war within ends in the victory of faith. The lusts of the flesh and the pride of life give place to the gifts of the Spirit.

LONGSUFFERING AND KINDNESS.

Willingness to suffer wrong rather than to do wrong is the mark of the disciple. He does not stand by and watch with indifference the evil deeds of men. He rebukes by word and deed all workers of evil. But he watches himself and keeps himself from answering evil with evil. For the sake of the man who wrongs him, for the sake of the church he loves, he will restrain himself when he is lied about, when he is misunderstood, and when wicked men misuse his friendship. He endures for the sake of his better self, rather, his better self asserts itself by enduring reproaches. His kindness is moral, not merely impulsive.

GOODNESS AND FAITHFULNESS.

The religious life is consistent. The variety it displays possesses inner unity. Its thought is clear. When we become religious, we obligate ourselves to think about the whole of life. The material world, human experience, life, death, all these we must think through according to our ability.

MEEKNESS AND SELF-CONTROL.

The opposite of meekness is boorishness, rudeness, wildness. The religious man is courteous, refined, civilized. He is sensitive to the needs of others. He responds to the higher feelings of his friends. He makes his appeal to the good sense and humanity of his associates, not to their folly and animalism. His power is conserved for the highest uses. If he risks his reputation, it is for something that has value. He does not test the loyalty of friends by bursts of passion but by demands for sacrificial living.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

SWIMS THROUGH PANAMA CANAL.

An American professional swimmer swam through thirty miles of the Panama Canal last November, covering this distance in a total swimming time of sixteen hours and thirty-five minutes. It is estimated that a vessel will require ten hours for passage through the fifty miles of the entire canal. The swimming feat required parts of two days for its completion.

WIRELESS MESSAGE TO EXPLORER.

Through Canadian government channels a wireless message was sent to Donald B. MacMillan and his fellow explorers at Etah, Greenland, from the American Museum of Natural History. It was a "cheer-up" message of Christmas greeting, and while no response was received or expected, it is believed the message reached its destination. Doctor MacMillan's party is equipped with wireless apparatus, although it is not able to send messages over the 1,600 miles, which separates it from New York.

BALLOON BREAKS WORLD'S RECORD.

The world's record for long-distance flights by spherical balloons was broken recently when the German balloon "Duisburg" rose from a village in Saxony and descended eighty-seven hours later at a point in European Russia near the Siberian frontier. The total distance covered in this flight was a fraction of a mile more than 1,738 miles. The longest previous flight was that of a French balloon which, in March, 1913, flew from Paris to a point near Kharkov, Russia, a distance of 1,492 miles.

The Lost Christ

Joseph and Mary supposed that Jesus was in the company. They did not look so as to be sure. They were having so much else that needed attention; they were having so good a time with old friends; they took for granted the presence of the Christ child. And He was not there. They woke to the bitter discovery that He was missing.

They had other things to attend to. They had come a long journey and were about returning. They had to say many farewells, make several purchases, perform several neglected social obligations, and do all the last things that must be done before such a departure. But they overlooked the one supremely important interest. The Christ who had come to abide with them twelve years before was their one most glorious responsibility. And Him they forgot. Not for very long, but long enough to lose Him.

Men do the same still. They have so many interests, and many of them good and important. They cannot be thinking of religion every minute. Before they know it they have lost it among the baggage. It has come to be one of many miscellaneous interests, as important as many others but not more so. Then in some fatal moment they let their faith get mislaid, and in the hour of need it is not there.

They do not mean to lose their religion. Not by any means. But the cares of the world come in. The pleasures of life usurp the foremost place. What with the buying and selling, the cooking and baking, the salutations and farewells, their lives are filled with other interests, and they lose the Christ.

Have you not seen it happen? Have you not felt the temptation to let it happen to you?

There is another condition which we cannot help noticing. Joseph and Mary had let the presence of Jesus in their home become commonplace. They loved Him, of course. They had shown their devotion to Him. For His sake they had fled to Egypt; for His sake they had endured and given much. It would be cruel to charge them with indifference. But they had come to take his presence in the home as something that needed no special attention. It was something that gave them satisfaction, of course; not for the world would they have lost Him out of their lives; but they no longer felt that strange thrill of wonder and of holy solicitude which had been constantly in their thought twelve years before.

How many men have looked into the coffin and have been smitten to the heart, not because they did not love, but because they did not realize the pricelessness of that which they loved. This is the bitterest drop in the cup of grief—the fact that the loss had already occurred before death came, and that it might have been prevented.

They realized their loss. Thank God for that. Some people do not realize. They traveled a whole day without Him. Mary kissed him in the morning and hurried to her packing and her leave-taking, and the caravan started. She was busy chatting and wondering if she had forgotten anything and she did not miss Him. Joseph, too, was employed. He had bought a new saw in Jerusalem, and his neighbor, the potter, had learned a new way of tempering clay, and they had to talk about it, each about his own interest, and each about the other's. And the day wore on till they camped for the night.

"Where is Jesus?"

"I don't know; I thought He was with you. When did you see Him last?"

Ah, what an anxious night that was in camp! How much they had to reproach themselves with! What if they should never find Him? They dared not think of anything so terrible. What now mattered the new saw? How insignificant now seemed the interests which had occupied their thought all day! How their loss suddenly restored things to their right proportion. But one thing in life was supremely worth while, and that was to find Jesus.

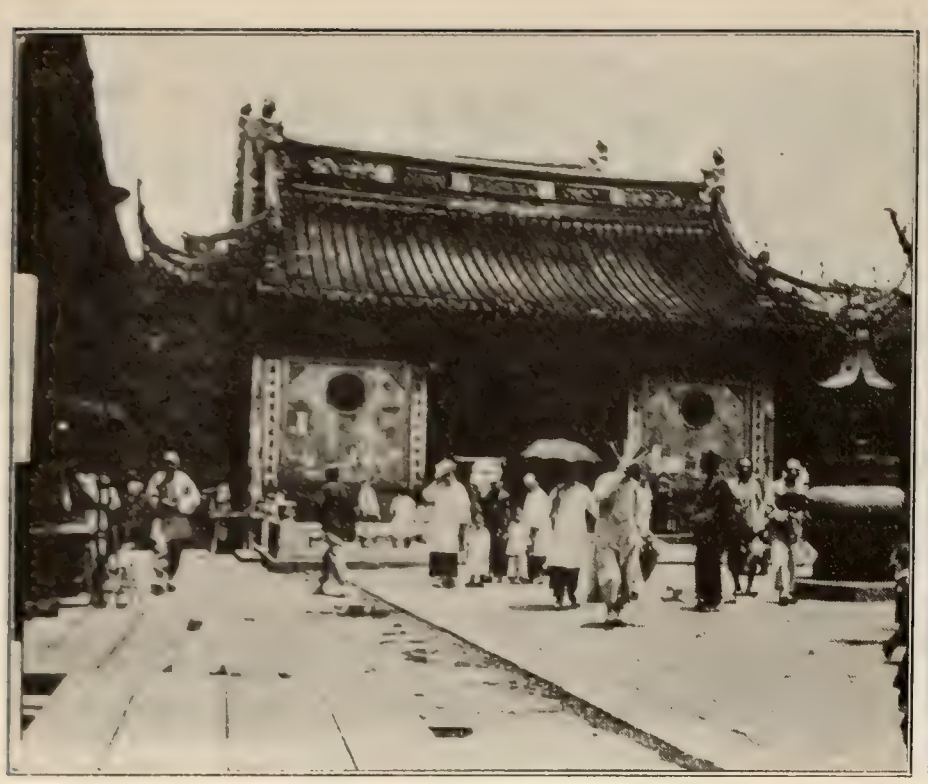
We could wish everyone were as much concerned. The saddest fact is that sometimes there seems no sense of loss. On goes the procession, and there is much to think about. We have forgotten salt for the soup, and one of the donkeys has cast a shoe! These are the vast concerns we measure against the loss of the Christ and we forget Him!

They found Him!

Breathless they hurried back the day's journey to Jerusalem, and they hunted the city over. He was not in the home where they had lodged; not in the streets or shops. They found Him in the House of God. It was the right place to seek Him. Let us seek Him there, and in the home and the heart. Let us love better that which already we love best. Let us never hold love cheap while that which we love is with us. For in so doing many a home has been wrecked, and many a man has lost his most precious faith; and some have never found either again.



A Temple Gate, Shanghai, China.

Corner of a Mandarin Garden in Shanghai.

The Spirit of Shanghai

Some of the Interests and Institutions of the Commercial Metropolis of China.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

IN SO large a country as China it is impossible for the people to avoid those sectional suspicions which distance and lack of acquaintance breed. We can easily recall the evil results of distance and distrust between the North and the South in our own land. Even little Palestine suffered from the mutual jealousies of Israel and Judah, and the feuds fought across the frontier would have done credit to a larger country and nobler causes. In China the distances are very great. The railroads are comparatively few as yet, and intercommunication is difficult. For this reason the north and the south have manifested toward each other a spirit of distrust and hostility.

Pekin, the capital, is a wholly modern city. Many centuries have gathered about it elements of monarchical tradition and conservatism. The efforts for liberty have originated in the south. Canton and Shanghai have furnished the elements of unrest and democratic aspiration. And even since the revolution of three years ago, which overturned the Manchu throne and ushered in the Republic, the same contrasts have appeared between the two sections. Yuan-Shi-kai, the president at Pekin, has never been regarded as more than a moderate republican. The more ardent revolutionists in the south are of the opinion that he is not a republican at all, but a monarchist at heart, with the purpose of restoring the imperial power as soon as possible, with himself as the wearer of the yellow robe. It is this cleavage between north and south that caused the troubles of last year, with serious disturbances along the Yangtse River and in other parts of China.

SHANGHAI A REFORM CENTER.

Shanghai is the home of some of the most enthusiastic lovers of reform. At their head is Dr. Sun Yat Sen, whose career is one of the most romantic in modern times. A Cantonese student of medicine, he was early suspected of democratic designs and on various occasions has had to experience the hard fortunes of an exile from China, a fate to which, after his brilliant and popular leadership for a short period, he has now returned. He studied in Europe and America, but kept up his revolutionary correspondence, and was increasingly hated by the old Manchu leaders. On one occasion he was arrested in London at the instigation of the Chinese embassy there, and was on the point of being sent back a prisoner, which would inevitably have led to torture and death. He was rescued in the nick of time by influential English friends.

DR. SUN YAT SEN.

When the revolution had won its way and the Manchus were driven out of power, Dr. Sun was chosen president of the Republic. It was an honor of which he was fully worthy, and he seemed in every way the man of the hour. But he knew the temper of the Chinese and felt the wisdom of enlisting the more conservative men of the north in the new enterprise. He has always preferred the role of a Washington to that of a Bonaparte. With great magnanimity he resigned the presidency and secured the election of a man whose attitude toward democracy he had always had reason to suspect. Yet he felt that Yuan-Shi-Kai was the one man who could unite all factors, if indeed such a task were possible. With the clear perception of the dominant need of China commercially he placed himself in the attitude of a servant, and undertook the organization of China's railway system. His offices were the rendezvous of men from all over the world, who were interested in every phase of China's development.

MEETING DR. SUN YAT SEN.

When I met him there last year, through the courtesy of Mr. Amos Parker Wilder, the American Consul General in Shanghai, his offices, just back of the Bund on one of the busiest streets in the modern section of Shanghai, were thronged with visitors, and several secretaries were hard at work. Yet Dr. Sun's bearing is that of a modest man concerned but little for his own advancement or even his own safety, but absorbed in the desire to promote the welfare of his land. He spoke with great enthusiasm of the rapid progress which China was making toward a competent system of railways. He expressed his strong belief that the Republic would succeed, though he was not so certain as to the form its government might have to take. For the work of Christian missionaries he has the heartiest sympathy. In fact, he comes from a missionary family, as his father was an assistant to a missionary in the south, and Dr. Sun is himself an honored Christian leader. He is in close touch with men like Pres. Bowen and Doctor Macklin.

Many of his friends felt it to be a very serious mistake when he encouraged the revolt against Yuan-Shi-kai last year. Opinions will differ on this topic, but those who know the situation best, even those among the missionary and consular groups, who are the warmest friends of Dr. Sun believe that it was a serious error in judgment which led him to encourage the revolt against the new government at Pekin, and to plunge the nation afresh into the turbulence of civil war. It may be true that the patriotism and intelligence of modern China were in large degree on the side of the revolutionists like Sun Yat Sen and Wu Ting Fang, but the authority, such as it was, lay with the Pekin administration, and moreover, Yuan-Shi-kai possessed the power to secure funds from abroad. The revolution was short-lived. Its forces were dispersed, and today Dr. Sun, the man on whose wisdom and consecration China has more cause to rely than any other, is an exile in some unknown place, probably in Japan, with a price upon his head and hired assassins on his trail. If he is not murdered before he can set foot on Chinese soil again it will be because of his wonderful good fortune such as has saved his life so often before.

A NOTABLE ASSEMBLY.

One of the interesting events of our stay in Shanghai was a meeting of the American University Club, held in the parlors of the Palace Hotel, and attended by probably seventy-five men who had attended one or another American educational institution. The meeting was presided over by Consul General Wilder, and several addresses were made regarding the educational prospects of China, the opportunities for Chinese students in American universities, the relative advantages of the small college and the great university, and other timely questions. Quite a sizable minority of those present were Chinese men, graduates of American institutions now at work in governmental or educational lines in Shanghai. The intellectual and social stimulus of the occasion were very great.

THE SHANGHAI Y. M. C. A.

The Young Men's Christian Association in Shanghai, of which Mr. Fitch is secretary, has a splendid building and is performing a notable service, not only to that city but to the entire country. Here Mr. F. A. Brockman, who most efficiently represents the Y. M. C. A. throughout China, has his headquarters. The equipment of the building is equal to that in most of our American cities. Many forms of physical, social and educational work are carried on in addition to the regular religious services. But one of the most interesting phases of the work of the Shanghai association is the maintenence of a laboratory, where Prof. Robertson, a scientific expert, prepares apparatus to be used in public lectures in all the cities of China under Y. M. C. A. auspices. We spent a most informing evening with him, while he explained the methods of his department and performed a large number of experiments with apparatus illustrating wireless telegraphy, color photography, moving picture work and other interesting scientific activities. His materials are constructed in such simple form that they can easily be packed into convenient space for shipment and taken from place to place for courses of lectures, or even shipped for the use of other men competent to give such instruction. In addition to this, many sets of photographic slides are sent out to the different associations, illustrating important lines of social service, public improvements, house and city sanitation, and other forms of welfare work. The Chinese people of every class crowd to hear such illustrated addresses. The written lectures are sent with the slides, and can be read by any one with a fair degree of familiarity with Chinese. This is proving a most effective means of interesting the Chinese people in modern methods of living, in social uplift, and in Christianity.

A CHINESE PUBLISHING PLANT.

One day we spent several hours in the large establishment of the Methodist Book Concern, of which Mr. Lacey is the efficient head. His son we had met on the Tenyo Maru going out to Japan, and he went with us through the various departments, from the composing room, with its enormous cases of type to accommodate the thousands of Chinese characters required in printing, on through the electrotyping, printing and binding departments to the store and sales rooms. One gets a more vivid impression of the splendid equipment which the Christian churches are supplying to the missionary lands by a study of such a plant as this.

Of a similar character is the Christian Education Society, of which Dr. Timothy Richards is the head. He is one of the pioneer missionaries to China, who has for many years devoted himself to this special line of literary work, editing and publishing a vast number of tracts, pamphlets, journals and books on the various phases of Christian teaching, for distribution among the Chinese. It is the aim of this society to reach all classes with literature appropriate to their needs. Dr. Richards insisted that the great opportunity now offered in China for a literary propaganda requires the preparation of a type of books particularly suited to the hour. I learned from him, as well as from missionaries in all the Orient, the fact that an imperative need of the times is a literature prepared especially for the Oriental mind. Few books are appropriate for translation in the form which they circulate in America, and thus far the missionaries have been too busy with the hand-to-hand tasks of their fields to permit them to write many books. Therefore the opportunity offered to a society like that of which Dr. Richards is the efficient head, to produce and distribute the sort of reading matter most competent to interpret Christianity to the non-Christian peoples.

SOME MISSIONARY "LITERATURE."

It is astonishing how ill suited to the modern world is some of the reading matter furnished by the missionaries to their inquirers and converts. In many instances quantities of tracts and pamphlets devoted to some side issue of Christian teaching, or some obscure cult, have usurped the place which an intelligent and convincing interpretation of the gospel should have occupied. Faith healing, holiness, perfectionism, millenarianism, adventism and various other odds and ends of religious theory have been pressed upon the attention of people barely able to catch a few ideas regarding Christ and the new life. It is pathetic to see the field invaded by these vagaries when the simpler, nobler conceptions of our holy faith would be eagerly welcomed. The ground once sown with such seed is not easily regained for the essentials of Christian truth. It is to be feared that not a few of the books and tracts which have been used by the best of our missionary forces have reflected too much a mechanical and legalistic type of Christianity.

Shanghai reveals almost every side of both the Orient and the Occident. In a former article I have named it the "Paris of the East," and the gaiety of many phases of its life bears out this title. The European section along the Bund is full of life and movement. The rickshas and carriages are always rushing up or down the line, and perfectly modern electric cars reach all parts of the city and environs. The tall Sikh policemen are the immovable observers of this motley and rapid display of life from all lands. The majestic buildings and handsome gardens along the Bund face just across the avenue the open water front, where comes the commerce of the world.

A few streets back lies the Oriental city, and here an even greater confusion and variety of life and color are to be seen. Foochow Road is one of the show places of Shanghai, and unhappily much of that show is of the underworld type. The street is lined with elaborately built and decorated restaurants, the interiors and balconies of which are the gathering places of crowds of merrymakers. Along the street in the evening one is jostled by every class of adventurers whose business it is to cater to, amuse and prey upon the public. Theaters, opium houses, places of evil resort, crowd upon each other in this section, and it is a Vanity Fair of Oriental life.

A SACRED SPOT.

Near the center of the city there is an old cemetery where many of the missionaries of former years have been buried. It is a sacred spot to the Christian visitor, for some of the names made memorable by missionary labors and heroism are to be read upon the modest stones of this little inclosure. Directly in the center of this cemetery, strangely enough, rises a high bell tower which is used as a fire alarm. From the top one commands a view over almost the entire city.

I have mentioned a number of the missionary establishments of Shanghai, yet have barely touched the theme of missions and education as it is illustrated here. One sees everywhere if he is in observant mood the signs not only of western life but of western ideals and religious interests. The Baptists of America have a fine college here, of which Dr. S. J. White is president, and I ought not to forget the important Roman Catholic School at Siccawei, some five miles out from Shanghai on the electric line. It is maintained by the Jesuits, who have also here a large cathedral. The institution is an industrial mission and has departments for men and women. The former are taught woodcraft, carpenter work, carving, furniture building and other similar arts, and some of their work is exquisite in design and finish. The needle work of the women in their section of the school is famous all through the region.

One comes away from Shanghai with regret. Its progressive spirit marks it out for vigorous conflict in the recent civil outbreak, and its leaders may always be counted upon to maintain the traditions of love of liberty and progress. Its religious influence in behalf of Chistianity is far-reaching through the nation, and it was not without significance that at the conference held by Doctor Mott in Shanghai on March 11 of last year the very important step was taken of declaring in favor of the name "The Christian Church in China" for the entire body of Christian believers in the new Republic. Such things are a promise for the nation and its religious future.

THE LOVE OF GOD.

By Maltbie Davenport Babcock.

God's boundless love and arching sky
Above us when we wake or sleep,
Above us when we smile or weep,
Above us when we live or die.

God's tireless love! Beside the cot
Of her sick child the mother sleeps.
The Heavenly Father ever keeps
Unweary watch—He slumbers not.

God's patient love! Misunderstood
By hearts that suffer in the night.
Doubted—yet waiting till heaven's light
Shall show how all things work for good.

God's mighty love! On Calvary's height,
Suffering to save us from our sin,
To bring the Heavenly Kingdom in,
And fill our lives with joy and light.

God's changeless love! The wandering one
Forsakes, forgets, dishonors; yet,
Repenting, going home, is met
With no reproach—"Welcome my son!"

God's endless love! What will it be
When earthly shadows flee away,
For all eternity's bright day
The unfolding of that love to see!

Jeremiah Among the Prohibitionists

Including a Note Concerning the "Jerusalem W. C. T. U."

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

THERE are some reforms that are always on the map, and have been from the dawn of history. Others are new, and grow out of advancing intelligence, experience and righteousness of communities and nations. Sometimes these reforms seem to work progressively and sometimes in reactionary fashion. You remember the minister who had doubts about the right of a Christian to eat pork, and who was invited to ask the blessing at a banquet of roast pig. He said, "O Lord, if Thou canst bless under the gospel that which Thou hast cursed under the law, then bless this pig." Whether the pig cursed under the law was blessed under the gospel, there are certainly some things which were permitted under the law which ought to be prohibited under the gospel in its modern application, and we have come to believe that the use of alcohol as a beverage is one of them. But it was different in Jeremiah's day.

I shall have to admit that Rev. Dr. Jeremiah was not himself a teetotaler. Like practically all men of his day he drank wine, and when he served a dinner, he gave wine to his guests. I hope no one will think less of him on that account. Some day our descendants will be more ashamed of us for some of our habits of eating and drinking than we are of men of the olden time for the moderate use of wine.

JEREMIAH ENTERTAINS SOME GUESTS.

Jeremiah had a visiting list of moderate length. We do not know much about his entertainments, but we have an account of one of them which gives us some insight into his habits. One day in wandering about in the vicinity of Jerusalem he fell in with a group of people who lived in tents, and introducing himself to the head man of the little settlement, he learned that his name was Jaazaniah, and was interested in finding that his father had been named Jeremiah. Jeremiah got to talking with him and doubtless was entertained in Jaazaniah's tent and he invited Jaazaniah to call on him some time when he was in the city. Their terms of acquaintance grew pleasant and congenial, and one day Jeremiah invited Jaazaniah and all his male relatives to a little dinner party in the city. At this time Jeremiah had no home of his own. He lived in a boarding house, but spent a good deal of his time in the temple. It must be remembered that the temple was more than a place of worship. It had sleeping apartments for priests on duty, some of whom lived out of town. It had offices for various religious and benevolent societies, and it had some club rooms available for the use of priests and their friends. Jeremiah had the privileges of the temple club, and it was a satisfaction to him now and then to spend an hour or two among the leather chairs and push-buttons. When it came to entertaining Jaazaniah and his friends he ordered a nice little luncheon in one of these club rooms, and ordered the caterer not only to provide something good to eat, but to look in the ice chest and see what the club had on hand in the way of rather good wine. This story is recorded in the 35th chapter of Jeremiah. He takes pains to tell us that he thought he was doing right in this. It was an act of hospitality in which he was entirely conscientious. After the wine had come in and he had signed the check for it and had it poured out beside the plates, he was surprised to find that his guests were all teetotalers.

"How does that happen?" he asked.

Jaazaniah replied, "It is a tradition in our family, based on the command of our ancestor, Jonadab, the son of Rechab."

A STRANGE TRADITION.

Jeremiah had heard of Jonadab, the son of Rechab. He was an acquaintance of Elisha, and there was a story about him in II Kings 10:15. It told how Jehu, who drove a good horse, had an idea that he would get some enjoyment by taking Jonadab out for a little spin behind his best pair and Jonadab enjoyed it as much as Jehu did. This same Jonadab, it appeared, had been a third party Prohibitionist, and his boys have been voting that ticket ever since with the same ardor with which some Democrats still are voting for Andrew Jackson.

"Do you mean to tell me?" asked Jeremiah, "that all these generations, your ancestors, including your father Jeremiah, turned their glasses down in faithfulness to a family tradition against the use of wine?"

"Yes," replied Jaazaniah, "and for the same reason we sleep in tents, and find it is good for our health. Our average expectancy as shown by the mortality tables is higher than that of people who live in steam-heated flats and drink wine. We have kept it up for several generations and our experience goes to show that Jonadab had distinctly sensible views on that subject, but that is not our prime reason for doing it. Our ancestor left us that command, and his sons naturally disposed to carry out their father's wish, and each man's son after him had done the same. It is a good habit, and we intend to keep it up."

JEREMIAH PREACHED ABOUT IT AFTERWARD.

There is evidence that Jeremiah kept this incident in mind for a good many years. When later there came upon Jerusalem a terrible calamity, he went back to that incident, and said to the people of Jerusalem and the frightened band of fugitives who came huddling into the city, "My mind goes back a good many years to an incident that occurred one day when I was serving a little dinner to some friends of mine, who belonged to the Prohibition Party. I was surprised to find that they would not touch wine, and while the reasons that they gave me were based on their belief that that habit of theirs would tend to longevity, their primary reason, as they frankly confessed, was that father and son had handed down that tradition among them from the days of Rechab, who advised Jonadab to be a teetotaler. I found that not only the young men, but the girls also, were thoroughly committed to this policy. There was not a girl in the tribe who would marry a man if he drank, but you people have had far more reason than they to be loyal to your faith, for your command is from God. Even the heathen are more consistent in their poor make-shift of a religion than you men are, who have received a Divine revelation and to whom God has been sending a succession of faithful prophets. Here you are going around Jerusalem, every man acting as if he had the stomachache, and the trouble is all your own making. If you would be as faithful to God as the Rechabites are to the traditions handed down from father to son, there would be some hope for Jerusalem."

I must not let you forget that Jeremiah once preached a powerful sermon against the sin of drunkenness. He obtained a full bottle of a well advertised brand of liquor, and took it into the pulpit. He said in substance: "How do you like to see this bottle of wine here on the pulpit? You think it does not look very well? Neither do I. But it looks as well here as in the courthouse, or in other places where it is common. It seems to me very nearly every man in Jerusalem has his bottle, and keeps it filled. Men in high places get drunk, and the king is no better than he ought to be. Sons and fathers have family brawls, and liquor is to blame for it. It is working national destruction." This sermon is recorded, in part, in Jeremiah 13.

THE JERUSALEM W. C. T. U.

This same chapter contains an appeal to the women voters, if there were any. At any rate, in that chapter Jeremiah put the matter up to the queen mother, who, I imagine, was at the head of the suffragette movement in Jerusalem. I think this cannot have been the widow of Jehoiakim, for she went to Babylon with her son, and was a friend of Ezekiel (Ezekiel 12:1). Her name was Nehusta, and she went with her son into Babylon, sharing his sorrows there, but afterward doubtless sharing in his honor; for he got an office there under a change of administration. (2 Kings 24:8, 15; 25:27-30.)

I think this queen mother must have been the mother of Jehoiakim, the widow of Josiah, Mrs. Zebidah, the daughter of Mr. Pedaiah, one of the leading citizens of Rumah. (2 Kings 23:36.)

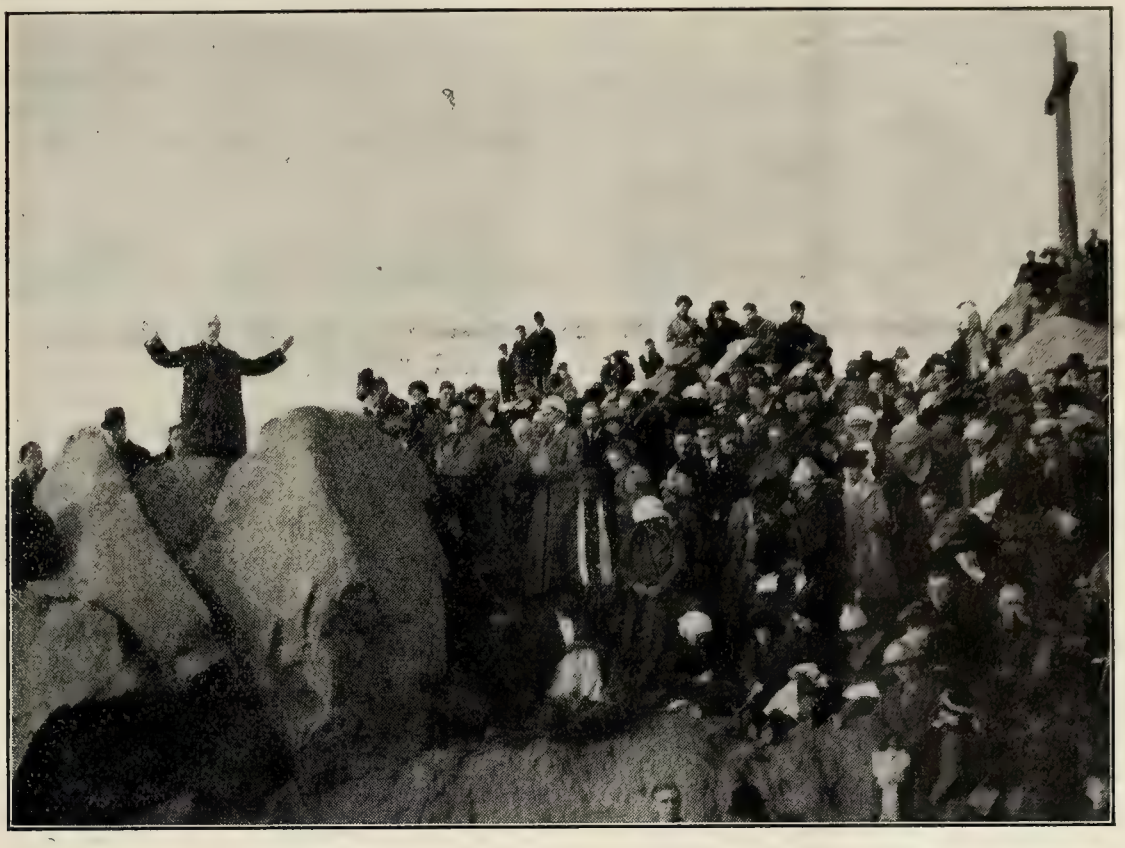
Josiah left more than one widow, for Jehoiakim's mother was not the same lady who was the mother of his brother Jehoahaz, nor yet the mother of his other brother Zedekiah (2 Kings 24:18; 23:31). Josiah is the only king in the Old Testament of whom only good is recorded. The having of three or more wives was not regarded as any bar to membership in the church in good and regular standing. That is the reason why I am not quite sure of the several possible queen mothers it was to whom Jeremiah preached the sermon referred to. But I think it was Mrs. Zebidah. In any event it illustrates again that certain things were permitted under the law which are deemed inadvisable under the gospel. So I think I have reported Jeremiah accurately on the liquor question.

But all this time he was growing older, and the years were doing things to him. Do you remember how he crossed the dead line of fifty, and how he considered the question of retiring from the pastorate and devoting himself to literature? If not, it is time you knew about that, for it is one of the most interesting chapters in his life.

God of the Open Air

A POEM BY HENRY VAN DYKE.

NEAR Riverside, Cal., rises Mount Rubidaux, a rocky elevation reached by two roads; one commonly used in ascending, two and one-half miles long, the other, used in descending, one and one-third. On top of this mountain stands a cross, erected in memory of one of the early Franciscans. A natural rock pulpit is near.



Henry vanDyke in the Natural Rock Pulpit.

It is the beautiful custom to celebrate Easter in this spot. The time chosen is sunrise.

Last Easter scores of automobiles, and hundreds of foot passengers, climbed the ascent, and welcomed the dawn of the Resurrection Day.

The services were conducted by President J. Willis Baer of Occidental College, who was assisted by ministers of note.

The principal speaker was Henry Van Dyke, who read an original poem, entitled, "God of the Open Air."

Three thousand people were in attendance.

GOD OF THE OPEN AIR.

I.

Thou who has made thy dwelling fair
With flowers beneath, above with starry lights,
And set thine altars everywhere,— on mountain heights,
In woodlands dim with many a dream,
In valleys bright with springs,
And on the curving capes of every stream:
Thou who hast taken to thyself the wings
Of morning, to abide
Upon the secret places of the sea,
And on far islands, where the tide
Visits the beauty of untrodden shores,
Waiting for worshippers to come to thee
In thy great out-of-doors!
To thee I turn, to thee I make my prayer,
God of the open air.

II.

Seeking for thee, the heart of man
Lonely and longing ran,
In that first solitary hour,
When the mysterious power
To know and love the wonder of the morn
Was breathed within him, and his soul was born;
And thou didst meet thy child,
Not in some hidden shrine,
But in the freedom of the garden wild,
And take his hand in thine,—
There all day long in Paradise he walked,
And in the cool of evening with thee talked.

III.

Lost, long ago, that garden bright and pure,
Lost, that calm day too perfect to endure,
And lost the childlike love that worshiped and was sure!
For men have dulled their eyes with sin,
And dimmed the light of heaven with doubt,
And built their temple walls to shut thee in,
And framed their iron creeds to shut thee out.
But not for thee the closing of the door,
O Spirit unconfined!
Thy ways are free
As is the wandering wind,
And thou hast wooed with thee,
In peace of soul and simpleness of mind.

IV.

Joyful the heart that, when the flood rolled by,
Leaped up to see the rainbow in the sky;
And glad the pilgrim, in the lonely night,
For whom the hills of Haran, tier on tier,
Built up a secret stairway to the height
Where stars like angel eyes were shining clear.
From mountain-peaks, in many a land and age,
Disciples of the Persian seer
Have hailed the rising sun and worshiped thee;
And wayworn followers of the Indian sage
Have found the peace of God beneath a spreading tree.
But One, but One,—ah, child most dear,
And perfect image of the Love Unseen,—
Walked every day in pastures green,
And all his life the quiet water by,
Reading their beauty with a tranquil eye.
To him the desert was a place prepared
For weary hearts to rest;
The hillside was a temple blest;
The grassy vale a banquet-room
Where he could feed and comfort many a guest.
With whom the lily shared
The vital joy that breathes itself in bloom;
And every bird that sang beside the nest
Told of the love that broods o'er every living thing.
He watched the shepherd bring
His flock at sundown to the welcome fold,
The fisherman at daybreak fling
His net across the waters gray and cold,
And all day long the patient reaper swing
His curving sickle through the harvest-gold.
So through the world the foot-path way he trod,

Ascending to Greet the Sunrise.

Drawing the air of heaven in every breath;
And in the evening sacrifice of death
Beneath the open sky he gave his soul to God.
Him will I trust, and for my Master take;
Him will I follow; and for his dear sake,
God of the open air,
To thee I make my prayer.

V.

From the prison of anxious thought that greed has builded,
From the fetters that envy has wrought and pride has gilded,
From the noise of the crowded ways and the fierce confusion,
From the folly that wastes its days in a world of illusion,
(Ah, but the life is lost that frets and languishes there!)
I would escape and be free in the joy of the open air.
By the breadth of the blue that shines in silence o'er me,
By the length of the mountain-lines that stretch before me,
By the height of the cloud that sails, with rest in motion,
Over the plains and the vales to the measureless ocean,
(Oh, how the sight of the things that are great enlarges the eyes!)
Lead me out of the narrow life, to the peace of the hills and the skies,
While the tremulous leafy haze on the woodland is spreading,
And the bloom on the meadow betrays where May has been treading;
While the birds on the branches above, and the brooks flowing under,
Are singing together of love in a world full of wonder,
(Lo, in the marvel of Springtime, dreams are changed into truth!)
Quicken my heart, and restore the beautiful hopes of youth.
By the faith that the flowers show when they bloom unbidden,
By the calm of the river's flow to a goal that is hidden,
By the trust of the tree that clings to its deep foundation,
By the courage of wild bird's wings on the long migration,
(Wonderful secret of peace that abides in Nature's breast!)
Teach me how to confide, and live my life, and rest.
For the comforting warmth of the sun that my body embraces,
For the cool of the waters that run through the shadowy places,
For the balm of the breezes that brush my face with their fingers,
For the vesper-hymn of the thrush when the twilight lingers,
For the long breath, the deep breath, the breath of a heart without care,—
I will give thanks and adore thee, God of the open air!

VI.

These are the gifts I ask
Of thee, Spirit serene:
Strength for the daily task,
Courage to face the road,
Good cheer to help me bear the traveller's load,
And, for the hours of rest that come between,
An inward joy in all things heard and seen.
These are the sins I fain
Would have thee take away:
Malice, and cold disdain,
Hot anger, sullen hate,
Scorn of the lowly, envy of the great,
And discontent that casts a shadow gray
On all the brightness of the common day.
These are the things I prize
And hold of dearest worth:
Light of the sapphire skies,
Peace of the silent hills,
Shelter of forests, comforts of the grass,
Music of birds, murmur of little rills,
Shadow of clouds that swiftly pass,
And, after showers,
The smell of flowers
And of the good brown earth,—
And best of all, along the way friendship and mirth.
So let me keep
These treasures of the humble heart
In true possession, owning them by love;
And when at last I can no longer move
Among them freely, but must part
From the green fields and from the waters clear,
Let me not creep
Into some darkened room and hide
From all that makes the world so bright and dear;
But throw the windows wide
To welcome in the light;
And while I clasp a well-beloved hand,
Let me once more have sight
Of the deep sky and the far-smiling land,—
Then gently fall on sleep,
And breathe my body back to Nature's care,
My spirit out to thee, God of the open air.

The Worth While of the Quiet Walk

JOHN TIMOTHY STONE, MODERATOR OF THE PRESBYTERIAN GENERAL ASSEMBLY, IN THE "CONTINENT."

HE PASSED me on the street one day. We were both walking briskly and apparently he was as intent upon his errand as I was on mine. There was only a quick glance of recognition, a friendly uplift of the eyebrows, a wave of the hand, and we were away. But it started a wave of thought.

What a prosperous, alert, manly fellow he had grown to be! Yes, I had indirectly learned of his college career, of his opening in business, of his sensible marriage, of his success in trade and his official relation to the church in his suburb. Five, ten, fifteen, yes, almost twenty years' memory retraced, back to a young people's meeting in a little church in an eastern town. He was one of the boys who read a verse and quoted a thought and added a few sentences of his own. What he said did not make an impression, but the lad himself stood out in the utterance. The spark of his personality started fire.

I had reached the office I was to visit, and the imminence of my errand dashed thought of the man from my mind. An hour later, standing with the other strap-hangers in a homeward bound street car, the memory returned.

Yes, there was something in that boy's personality which prompted response on my part. It had been only a word after that meeting. He accepted my invitation, and a few days later we were walking together for a stroll. What we said was not important. It was the being together that counted. Suddenly he and I had found in each other common interest and companionship, though it never ripened into close friendship; with the exception of an occasional word or letter the years had passed without opportunity of talking together, just as we lose touch with many of our acquaintances.

But he was a lad and I was a man. We spoke of the meaning of life, its chances, its reality, its object and motive; of the power of right to conquer wrong, of the place God held and the influence Christ exerted over men. He opened his heart as we strolled along. He asked a few questions that were real. We stopped to watch some children at play and before we knew it took a hand and were children with them. He had lost his reserve now; we were no longer minister and parishioner—just two companions. Just what was said neither of us would remember. As the sun began to lower we parted, he with a spring in his step more lithe and strong, and I with a prayer in my heart and a new duty demanding immediate attention.

It was only an incident, after all. Yet—"only?" I recalled the loss and sorrow in his life; I remember his mother, that little brave soul who wrote me such a mother's letter a few days after the walk. He had confided in her. The little church was honored by his college record; his name figures in the hero worship of the men who are his immediate juniors in his town. Best of all, he is now a force for right in his community, and a Christian father in his own home.

The walk was worth while. It was only a faint underscoring, no doubt, of the character lines that mother and home had written, but it was worth the time just the same. Men are inspired by a sermon, and won by truth, but the element we are likely to overlook in these busy days of multiplied demand is the personal word and the quiet walk on the way to Emmaus.

THE SUPREME COURT BIBLE.

It is a tiny little book, only five and a half inches long and three and a half inches wide. It is bound in bright red morocco leather, with the word "Bible" printed in diminutive gold letters on the back. But one doesn't see that red morocco cover unless he removes the little black leather slip which protects it. Long, long ago the little red Bible began to show wear and then the black leather slip was made to protect it—so long ago in fact that fifteen of those covers, made to protect the venerated little volume, were worn out in the service. It is without doubt one of the oldest Bibles, if not the very oldest Bible, connected with the government, and is certainly the most historical. It is the book upon which, since 1800, every chief justice, with the single exception of Chief Justice Chase, and every member of the supreme court, has taken the oath of allegiance when accepting his appointment to our highest tribunal. More than that, every attorney who has practiced before the supreme court since that date 1800, has pledged his allegiance over the little volume. All, with one exception also, and that exception was Daniel Webster. It is told even yet of the supreme court of that day that Mr. Webster's fame as an orator had so preceded him that on the occasion when he came to argue his first case before the court, the clerk, Mr. Caldwell, in his eagerness to hear the great speaker, forgot to administer the oath.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

RECENT SUFFRAGE VICTORIES.

The vote last month in the United States Senate in favor of the nation-wide equal Suffrage amendment, though nominally a defeat, was in reality a victory. Thirty-five senators voted for it, thirty-four against it; the resolution failed of passage, because a two-thirds vote is necessary for a Federal Amendment to the Constitution.

This writer, being a firm believer in the doctrine of State Rights, thinks that the extension of the franchise should come by way of amendment to the State Constitutions—so she is not grieving over the failure of the National Amendment to pass. But she is rejoicing greatly over the fact that the most conservative legislative body in the country has registered a majority vote in favor of woman suffrage.

The favorable vote in the Senate came after weeks of thorough debate, in which practically all of the expressed opposition was based on the State Rights grounds. Senator after Senator testified to the good results of equal suffrage in the free states or to his firm conviction that women should no longer be disfranchised.

Mrs. Medill McCormick, chairman of the National Congressional Committee, says: "For the first time in fifty years, the women of America demonstrated their impression upon the U. S. Senate as shown by a majority vote. That a majority of the Senators registered themselves in favor of national suffrage for women is the sign of the times, and it portends that all womanhood in this country will be emancipated in this generation."

As a result of this action, the equal suffrage amendment will come before the voters of Nebraska in the fall of 1914, as it does those of Nevada, Montana and North and South Dakota. The borderline has been crossed and the real race is on.

NEBRASKA A CAMPAIGN STATE.

On March 14, 1914, Mrs. Draper Smith, president of the Nebraska Woman Suffrage Association, filed with the Secretary of State in the presence of the Governor and a large representation of suffragists from over the state, the initiative petition with 42,523 signatures accompanied by most impressive ceremonies. There are fifty per cent more counties represented and 5,000 more names than required by law. These were secured largely by women without remuneration.

VICTORY IN MASSACHUSETTS.

"The Massachusetts House of Representatives last week voted, 168 to 39, in favor of the woman suffrage amendment to the State Constitution, which had already passed the Senate, 34 to 2. For the first time in history the Bay State Legislature has carried this measure. Both Houses must adopt it again next year, and it will then go to the voters in November.

With the Senate already recorded in favor by so large a majority, there was a feeling of confidence abroad that the amendment would succeed in the House. Nevertheless, a two-thirds vote was necessary, and it was with more or less trepidation that the women who crowded the galleries at the State House waited for the verdict. When it came, they made no demonstration in the chamber, but the moment that they were outside a jubilee burst forth."

Massachusetts is the fifth State in which woman suffrage has passed one legislation, but is required by law to pass another before the vote can be submitted to the people. The other States are New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Iowa.

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY CONFERENCE.

The third conference of the Mississippi Valley States was held in Des Moines a few days ago, with about 200 delegates in attendance, from nineteen middle western and southern States. Hundreds were turned away from the opening meeting, at which Governor Clark of Iowa, and Jane Addams were the principal speakers, and an overflow meeting had to be held. Subjects of discussion were, the great victory in Illinois, the preliminary victory in Nebraska, the hopeful outlook in Nevada, Montana, and North and South Dakota, the advance being made in the eastern States, and the growth in the number of adherents throughout the country.

Mrs. Ella Seass Stewart, of Chicago, whose great services in the education of both men and women in the principles of Woman Suffrage have been a potent factor in recent suffrage achievements.

A REASONABLE REQUEST.

The women of the Southern Methodist Church will present the following petition for "lay privileges" in this church to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, soon to meet in quadrennial session in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. They very modestly disclaim any desire for the "privilege of the clergy. They request simply that their disabilities as lay members of their church be removed." May their "Fathers and brethren" have the grace to perceive the reasonableness of this petition, and the justice to grant it!

Dear Fathers and Brethren:

Inasmuch as one of the most important questons that will be presented for your consideration will be that of extending to the women of the church the rights which are now enjoyed by the laymen, the Woman's Laity League of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, begs the privilege of addressing you this communication for the purpose of placing before you briefly what it is that they are asking at your hands.

In a word they ask that the Board of Discipline be so interpreted as to admit women to the lay privileges of the Church, from which they are now excluded, that is that they may be entitled to sit as members in quarterly, district, annual and general conference, and be elected to serve as stewards and trustees. Women are permitted to serve as stewards, but are not eligible to election to the office of steward, according to an Episcopal decision, rendered in 1906. The sole purpose of this legislation was to exclude them from membership in the quarterly conference. For the same reason they are denied the right to act as trustees of local church property even though they may be the chief agents in securing the funds for its purpose.

We believe that it is inconsistent and unjust to perpetuate this discrimination against the women and girls of the Church, who constitute by far the larger portion of the membership, and whose service is indispensable to the outgoing of every Sunday-school, Epworth League and Missionary Society in the connection. We beg you to do this majority of the Church's membership the honor of recognizing them, not as partial members of the Church, but as full members, entitled to all its privileges, as they were assured they were when they took its vows and assumed its obligations, but which they have since discovered is not the case.

May we be permitted to remind you that the women are not asking for the privilege of the clergy. They request simply that their disability as lay members of the Church be removed. In making this request they believe that they are thoroughly in accord with the present day spirit and policy of our Church, which is making larger and larger use of the services of women.

Very respectfully,

THE WOMAN'S LAITY LEAGUE OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH,
MRS. ARCH TRAWICK, Chairman.

DEATH OF NATIONAL W. C. T. U. HEAD.

Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens, president of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, died at Portland, Maine, April 6. She had been ill for several weeks with kidney trouble.

Mrs. Stevens, who was born in Dover, Maine, seventy years ago, continued to the last the temperance work to which she had devoted most of her life. Her mind remained clear, and late last week she was able to dictate correspondence in connection with the duties of her office, which she had held since 1898.

With her when the end came were her husband, Michael Stevens; her daughter, Mrs. Gertrude S. Leavitt of this city, and Miss Anna Gordon of Evanston, Ill., vice president of the National W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Stevens had been president of the W. C. T. U. ever since the death of Miss Frances E. Willard. Because of her failing health she was forced to spend a great part of her time at her home in Portland instead of the national offices of the organization at Evanston, Ill.

ILLINOIS WOMEN.

ILLINOIS put 1,000 saloons out of business last week. The woman's vote was the decisive factor in most of the communities where the saloon was an issue.

But the women had a chance to put 3,000 more saloons out of business on the same day and failed to do so. In some communities the woman's vote was "dry" by a very small margin. In three cities—Springfield, Quincy and Joliet—a majority of the women actually voted "wet." The prohibition leaders in these cities are stunned. They have no explanation to offer.

Admitting the substantial reinforcement which woman's suffrage brings to the anti-saloon cause, it is obvious that the campaign of education cannot yet be closed.

Woman's suffrage is not a substitute for the Anti-Saloon League.

THE PRESIDENT'S VICTORY.

IT SEEMS that President Wilson completely won out in his fight for the House verdict on the repeal of the toll exemption clause. His victory is in a peculiar sense a triumph of conscience. Even those who do not agree with the President have been profoundly impressed by the moral earnestness of his short message asking for this repeal. An appeal to conscience is seldom lost on the American people. When Abraham Lincoln was President, the people came to trust his moral intuitions. Lowell, in his second series of Bigelow Papers, represented Jonathan as saying to John Bull anent the return of the officers taken from the Trent:

"We gave the critters back, John,
'Cause Abr'am thought 'twas right;
It want your silly clack, John,
A-stumpin' us to fight."

Not fear but conscience caused Lincoln to reverse the action of the government in the Trent matter. Not fear but conscience, and the desire to stand with clean hands among the nations, impels us now to recede from the position we had taken in the matter of the Panama tolls. The concurring action of the Senate, even though there be a hard struggle, can hardly be doubted.

NO MORE GROG IN THE NAVY.

AND still the banner of prohibition flies higher. Now it is at the topmast, high as the stars and stripes. After July 1 there is to be no more drinking in the navy!

This order, constituting one of the most notable victories ever won by the prohibition forces, was issued on Palm Sunday on the recommendation of Surgeon General Braisted. It reads:

"The use or introduction for drinking purposes of alcoholic liquors on board any naval vessel, or within any navy yard or station, is strictly prohibited, and commanding officers will be held directly responsible for the enforcement of this order."

In a statement issued by Secretary Daniels, he said:

"I am in hearty agreement with the views expressed by the surgeon-general in his paper accompanying the recommendation. There should not be on shipboard, with reference to intoxicants, one rule for officers and another and a different rule for the enlistened personnel. The saddest hour in my official life is when an officer or enlisted man must be punished for intoxication.

"During the last week it has been my painful duty to approve a courtmartial for dismissal from the service of an officer for intoxication. He told me that he had never tasted intoxicating drink until he did so in the wine mess on his cruises. Others, who have been disciplined for drinking to excess, have made similar statements to me.

"Officers are now commissioned at the early age of twenty-two years. Has the government a right to permit this temptation which too often destroys the highest usefulness of young officers? I think not. If there is one provision more than any other that calls for a clear head and a steady hand it is the naval profession.

"I believe experience has demonstrated that a uniform rule should prevail in the navy for all who enlist in the service, from the highest rank to the youngest enlisted man or officer who comes into the service, and that the abolition of the wine mess will be justified."

"As matters stand today," wrote Surgeon General Braisted to Secretary Daniels, "an enlisted man is very properly subjected to severe disciplinary measures if wine or beer be found in his possession on shipboard, yet the same man is constantly aware of the free use of alcoholic liquors on board ship, which is officially permitted to officers, and the too frequent derelictions which occur among them in consequence. The prohibition of alcohol to the men has rendered alcoholism among them almost a negligible quantity.

"Surely the officers should be in all respects models for the enlisted men in duty, habits, and deportment, and the example of officers drinking aboard ship, as fostered by the wine mess, and the numerous courts-martial of officers for drunkenness and the effects of alcohol are destructive of discipline and morals, bad for the enlisted men, and detrimental to the reputation and good name of the service."

AN INSTRUCTIVE OMISSION.

WHEN Dr. Peter Ainslie was asked, on his recent visit to England and Scotland, to state what the Disciples of Christ stood for he used one word: "catholicity." This one word he amplified into an outline with five points: the catholic name, the catholic creed, the catholic book, the catholic mode of baptism and the catholic fellowship.

He was speaking to virgin minds, unacquainted with the history or actual practices of the Disciples, and he no doubt felt freer to assume the role of an interpreter over against that of a mere recorder. That is to say, he idealized the Disciples' actual practice by his conception of what they ought to practice and what their basic principles should impel them to practice.

A perfectly legitimate and admirable role for him to assume. His brethren are under grateful obligations to him for it.

But when Doctor Ainslie states the Disciple position in the columns of The Churchman, an American Episcopalian newspaper, he constructs his article on the basis of four points. He feels compelled to omit the fifth point of catholicity—the catholic fellowship. The facts on this side of the water would contradict him. He knows that the Disciples do not generally practice a catholic fellowship. They have fallen into the practice of an exclusive, a partial, a sectarian fellowship. They deny admittance into their churches to a large portion of those whom Christ has received into his Church.

Their fellowship is narrower than Christ's fellowship! It is therefore not catholic.

No doubt Dr. Ainslie intends to instruct us by this significant omission as well as by the good things he explicitly says.

DO IT RIGHT.

WE noticed that the upright standards of the express trucks in Cincinnati's union station bore a legend, and we approached and read. In white paint on the dark green beam the words were inscribed "Do It Right." It was a gentle reminder to express handlers not to throw packages marked "Fragile," nor to drop boxes marked "Glass," nor to send parcels North that were labeled South. There was no threat or penalty; no declaration that "Any employes damaging packages will be discharged," simply the injunction, "Do it right." It is promised in the Bible that every pot shall be holy, and that the bells of the horses shall bear the motto, "Holiness to the Lord." Why not? To do right in God's sight is as worthy in a baggage-smasher as in a minister of the gospel. There is no good reason why they should not act from equally high motives. The same religion is good for both.

ELEMENTS THAT ASSIST LEGISLATION.

THE Nation remarks that the history of the passage of the Currency bill would not be complete without a reference to the Christmas spirit and the haste of the members of Congress to get through and get home. It says "Congress was as eager as a small boy to get off for the holidays, and there stood the cruel resolution of the Democratic majority not to adjourn unless the bill was passed."

This is by no means the only case where the occurence of a holiday or even some smaller incident has affected legislation. The Declaration of Independence was helped along by the fact that the venerable body which adopted it was holding its meeting in close proximity to a livery stable, and a swarm of gnats entered the hall and there took up their abode. It was a hot afternoon, and the discussion had been long and trying. Those gnats bit through the silk stockings of the members of the Continental Congress and kept them switching their handkerchiefs in more and more desperate attempts at self-defense. Those men were not afraid of King George and all his armies, but the gnats were too many for them. A general spirit of restlessness overspread the assembly, the members grew impatient with debate. It grew more and more evident that a vote could not long be deferred and finally the vote was taken and the old Liberty Bell rang out.

The settlement of the issues of the Russo-Japanese War was much assisted by the occurrence of a Sunday. The Saturday had been hot and oppressive and the mosquitoes were troublesome. Then came a quiet Sabbath, cool and restful, and the plenipotentiaries suspended negotiations and went to church. There is an interesting story about that church-going, but it need not here be told. The Japanese went to church in the morning and the Russians in the evening and they heard public prayer for peace and knew that that prayer was being repeated in thousands of churches all over America. It gave them pause and they returned to their negotiations next morning in another frame of mind than that which had characterized their work on Saturday. That day they agreed on the first article in the protocol and the negotiations for peace went successfully on to a complete agreement.

THE CONGRESS.

"HOPING to meet you at the Congress"—it is in these words that so many of our letters are concluded these days. It encourages us to believe that there will be a large attendance at the Disciples' Congress, April 28-30, in spite of the perilously late change of the meeting place from Lexington, Ky., to Indianapolis, Ind.

Perhaps the shift in location will increase the attendance. Kentucky folk who had made up their minds to go will probably go anyhow. Kentucky people are not in the habit of changing their minds with change of circumstances. And without doubt many Indiana and Illinois and Ohio people who had not considered going will be lured by the new location and attend.

The program is worth a long trip. The fellowship of mind is always stimulating and delightful.

Downey Avenue Church, Pastor C. H. Winders and Butler College will make a quality of hospitality that even Lexington, Ky., could not surpass.

Baptists Discuss the Practice of Unity

OUR steady-going Baptist neighbor, The Standard, has stirred up a spirited discussion of the "open-membership" question by the publication of an article by Dr. E. Y. Mullins, president of the theological seminary at Louisville, Ky. Doctor Mullins took a strong position against receiving unimmersed Christians into Baptist churches and assailed what he called "composite churches" as "repugnant to the enlightened Christian conscience." By "composite churches" he referred to those congregations formed by the union of small groups from various denominations, such as are found in many small communities where sectarian divisions are unable to maintain a separate existence. The publication of Doctor Mullins' article and the sharp replies which it immediately brought forth from readers of the paper have made The Standard's department for the expression of general opinion look like "Our Readers' Opinions" department in The Christian Century some three or four years ago when the same question was discussed among the Disciples. The only difference is that in The Christian Century's case the editor took a hand in the discussion while in The Standard's case Doctor Gray, more discreetly perhaps, lets his readers do the talking among themselves. But he promises in the latest issue to have something to say on his own account "when the returns are all in" from Vox Populi and the rest.

Our readers will be interested in following this discussion even though it does cover some ground that they have been over again and again. So we begin by reproducing Doctor Mullins' statement complete:

> I do not believe Baptists should ever adopt the policy of open membership, admitting the unimmersed into church relations. Experience has shown that such "union" does not succeed. Inevitably the discordant elements reappear and serious consequences ensue. The New Testament is not neutral or indifferent on the points of difference which are set aside in order to realize such union. It is not a normal or enlightened conscience which is able without scruple to waive these points of difference as if they were nothing. A church made up of elements so discordant would be but a mechanical form of union and would by its very existence proclaim that it preferred something other than the will of Christ as its supreme guide and authority. Such a body of people would make a feeble appeal to the outside world. The general impression would be that the question of the church and church relations is an unimportant matter anyway.
> "Composite" churches formed by the union of small groups from various denominations are equally repugnant to the enlightened Christian conscience. If no conviction exists among the various groups as to church order then it ought to be easy for all to unite on some one of the various conceptions of the church. If any conviction does remain among the various groups when the "composite" church is formed it is certain that discord will arise in due time. It follows from the above that a Baptist with his convictions as to the polity of the New Testament church cannot consistently join "composite church" movements.
> In my judgment there is no greater blunder than to suppose that removing all barriers will make people anxious to join the church. This is not only a bad interpretation of the New Testament, but also bad psychology. It betrays a lack of knowledge of human nature. If all barriers are removed and nothing distinctive, nothing worth while, is left for a man to join, who wants to join it? Tickets of admission are sometimes printed and distributed for lectures which are entirely free simply to create the appearance of conditions of admission. This is based on the well known fact that men are attracted by what has conditions attached more than by that which has none. Make church membership meaningless and no one wants it. The strong denominations are those which believe in themselves, and which impose real conditions of church membership.

To this utterance of Doctor Mullins, Rev. W. H. Thompson, of Lansing, Mich., protests, saying that the article is "a piece of ancient history rather than the voice of a prophet." He continues:

> I am sorry such an article could get into The Standard without an accompanying editorial setting forth the facts of how present-day progressive churches are working out that problem. The living Christ at work in the home mission fields of the western United States is not dictating such paragraphs; the living Christ at work in the leading Baptist churches of England is demonstrating the opposite; and if the average man will study the average rural church field anywhere in the United States he will discern that such a doctrine has been the death-knell of the country church.

In the same vein but more explicitly Rev. Frank B. Bachelor, of Ann Arbor, Mich., suggests that the trend of scholarly thinking in most of the theological seminaries today is away from the point of view which Doctor Mullins' statement assumes. He takes the Louisville professor to task for seeming to make immersion the chief requirement to admittance into Baptist churches. He says:

With reference to Doctor Mullins' article, are we to understand that it represents the teachings of the Louisville seminary as to church membership and church federation? The article indicates that immersion is the chief, if not the only requirement for church membership. If the unimmersed were admitted to church membership, "the general impression would be that the question of the church and church relations is an unimportant matter anyway." The article further says: "If all barriers are removed and nothing distinctive, nothing worth while, is left for a man to join, who wants to join it?" And further, "Make church membership meaningless and no one wants it."

Does Louisville teach that immersion should be retained as a barrier to make church membership attractive, a sort of ticket of admission to create the appearance of conditions to that which is entirely free? Does it teach that the rite of immersion is so supreme over any and all other doctrines of the church that without it church membership is meaningless? Does it teach that we have so emphasized the rite that the general impression is that, aside from the rite, "the question of the church and church relations is an unimportant matter anyway?"

Mr. Bachelor then describes a country cross-roads with which he is familiar where three church buildings of three different denominations stand on three of the four corners. The place is significantly named "No-God's-Corners." These three denominations with churches there are referred to in Doctor Mullins' language as "denominations which believe in themselves, and which impose real conditions of church membership," which believe in holding to something "distinctive," in which "conviction exists among the various groups as to church order."

These churches probably all believe in God as he is revealed in Christ, in the condemnation of sin, in Christ as Saviour, in man's duty to study to know God, and to cultivate righteousness, to love and serve God and man. But instead of having a church fellowship on such ground and uniting their forces to magnify God and his kingdom, they must have something "distinctive," and remain "discordant elements" on three corners. And Doctor Mullins' article seems to sanction the policy. Is that the present trend of the teaching of our schools with reference to church federation?

A Toronto correspondent, Mr. C. J. Holman, comes to Doctor Mullins' support by declaring that the "modern trend of theology" has nothing at all to do with the case; that the people are familiar enough with this "modern trend" and are "weary of it." He points to the practice of the English churches where the better and more prosperous churches have for a long time had "open membership." He declares that the practice "has been tried out across the sea and found wanting."

The lack of progress of the Baptists in England, as compared with Baptists in America, demonstrates clearly the hurtful and disintegrated efforts of "open" practices. The weakening on the part of some in the northern convention in these later years has borne similar fruit. Doctor Carroll's religious statistics show that during the last twenty-two years the southern Baptists (whose position Doctor Mullins expresses) have increased 93 per cent, while northern Baptists, who have been less sturdy, have increased in the same time but 46 per cent, while the Disciples of Christ who stand by their principles head the list with 108 per cent increase.

This same writer treats with scorn the efforts for Christian union which characterize the church life of today and can see in such efforts nothing but a weakly compromise of principles. He calls the present union sentiment a "mania."

There is a mania for "getting together," "uniting forces," etc., which saps fidelity to the truth. Obedience to Christ is given a back seat. The scriptural position and principles which our fathers maintained, and which have brought Baptists to their present position, are treated as airy trifles. Surely no true union can be based on other than the teaching of scripture. "Any union founded on compromise must inevitably end in a wide apostasy followed by inertia, indefiniteness, confusion and waste of spiritual force."

One writer sees in the discussion a chance to press home the disloyalty of Christian people to the Lord's teaching concerning divorce. While you are so sensitive about obedience to an assumed command of Jesus to be immersed in water, he would say, how can you be so insensitive to the indisputable will of Christ on marriage? In a closing paragraph, with a naivete which we are at a loss to interpret, whether as unconscious or affected, he says solemnly:

For more than thirty-five years this writer has been a Baptist pastor and has no purpose to be otherwise to the end; but in his opinion, gathered from this wide experience, the easy way of breaking the home obligations when desired by either party and the adulterous second marriage have caused more harm to the kingdom of grace than the conscientious substitution of sprinkling for immersion in baptism.

The question whether a "thus saith the Lord" can be found for making baptism a condition of church membership is raised in a lengthy article by one who signs himself "A Hereditary Baptist." He describes how he went back to his New Testament wondering whether all this time the American Baptists could have been mistaken in their assumption that Jesus commanded baptism. He felt that an explicit command of our Lord would certainly appear on the pages of the Scriptures. "Surely," he reflected, "nothing but a plain 'thus saith the Lord' could have started Baptists—those traditional sticklers for a spiritually qualified membership as against a ceremonially qualified membership—on a course so apparently contradictory of their fundamental principle." But he could not find any such text as he was seeking. He recalled the great Commission as recorded by Mark: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned," and the injunction of Peter on the day of Pentecost: "Repent and be baptized every one of you for the remission of your sins," but was compelled to decide that neither of these texts had any bearing upon his inquiry. Those familiar with the long contest between Baptist and Disciple teaching as to the design of baptism in conversion will be intensely interested in the following comment on these Scriptures. It is delicious.

We recalled these passages, and then realized that they were the ones upon which we have been subconsciously relying; but when we came to read them with our present inquiry clearly defined, we found that these passages on their face only seemed to make baptism a condition of salvation or remission of sins, and we long ago learned how to rid them of that meaning by interpretation, and having gotten rid of their apparent surface teaching of the essentiality of baptism to salvation, we found that they contained no teaching as to the essentiality of baptism to anything.

As to Matthew's Commission, it fell far short of being imperative in the matter of baptism. The participle "baptizing them" is parallel with the participle "teaching them." Instead of being a command to baptize, its meaning is: "When you baptize let it be in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit."

"Hereditary Baptist" has added much fuel to the camp-fire by his article, and the correspondents are clamorous for space in which to make reply, though the good-natured Editor has already stretched it out into full three pages a week.

A woman who signs the modest anonym, "A Sister," quotes a long line of proof texts on "Hereditary Baptist." The one in Romans about being "buried with Christ by baptism," together with its context, and the words of Jesus to Nicodemus about being "born of water and the spirit" impress her as most pertinent. She bravely accepts the tremendous burden of her exegesis and assumes that the physical act of immersion (which she and all these correspondents regard as baptism) has something essential to do with the state of one's soul. There must be, she contends, something morally or spiritually lacking in these unimmersed "Christians." She says:

Now the question is this: Can a person who thinks himself holy enough without water baptism, which even Jesus insisted upon receiving, be dead to sin, even though a pedobaptist church accepts him? Can one who is crucified to self, and dead to carnality, have such a repugnance to that ordinance which our Saviour honored, as to insist upon ignoring it, though our Lord said it was "becoming" to us thus to fulfil all righteousness? It was after Christ's submission to this symbolic rite, that God honored him from heaven, saying, "In him I am well pleased." And if we reject the symbol of death, by refusing to be buried in baptism, how may the church know that we are risen with Christ, and living the new life? Even though some other society composed of unbaptized men and women does accept such, should we set aside our Lord's standard of judgment as revealed to Nicodemus and verified in his own life by example? If so, if we may receive unbaptized persons into church fellowship because their unbaptized brethren do so, or because they have become unequally yoked with Baptist believers, and do not love the church enough to accept the Christian ordinance which would without question admit them to the kingdom, we might as well cease to call ourselves Baptists and be Congregationalists. But if we are true, regenerated, Baptist Christians, and have among us friends or companions who have never been baptized although members of some pedobaptist denomination, let them become Baptist in practice as well as in name by embracing the faith and principles of the church in which they wish to hold membership. If they cannot accept the doctrine which is held by the church, how can they be loyal members of it? Let us be careful what material we use in building.

Rev. E. P. Brand, secretary of the State Association of Illinois Baptists, writes contemptuously of the status of "Hereditary Baptist." "If he is a Baptist at all," says Doctor Brand, "he must be one by inheritance, for he certainly is not one by conviction." Doctor Brand declares that it is unreasonable for "Hereditary Baptist" to insist upon a definite passage from the Bible which teaches that baptism is essential to church membership. It is as unreasonable "as for a Unitarian to insist on some passage in which Jesus taught his own deity." The baptisms following the Samaritan revival, the baptism of the eunuch, that of Cornelius, of the Jailor, of Lydia and of others are referred to, and "Hereditary Baptist" is criticized for not seeing in them an sufficient answer to the question with which he re-examined the New Testament. Doctor Brand declares that the proposal to receive unimmersed Christians involves the Baptists in making concessions that no other religious body would think of making.

The Methodists, Presbyterians and others make no sacrifices of principle and no concessions whatever when they receive Baptists on their believers' immersion. They receive what they believe in, and sometimes practice. But if the Baptists should receive them on their infant sprinkling, they would be sacrificing two of their distinctive principles. Other denominations would not consent to do this in order to get Baptists into their fellowship. Presbyterians and others have too strong conviction of what they believe to be truth to do this, and I believe about 999 out of every 1,000 Baptists in the world, outside of England, would not consent to such a surrender of conviction of truth. One here and there among American Baptists would consent to such surrender.

In the latest issue of The Standard, "Hereditary Baptist" makes reply to his critics, going over the Scriptures to which they have called his attention. He reaffirms his contention, though, as it seems to us, at the cost of great violence to the Scripture text. More convincing as to his main position is the reply to a critic who argued that to receive unimmersed Christians would involve the "recognition" of infant baptism.

May we call him [the critic] back to the question by pointing out that when he has recognized that baptism [immersion] is not an imperative condition of membership, his reception of members on letters from other Christian churches will signify nothing as to his valuation of what may have been called baptism administered by those churches; because a member will be received not because he has been baptized, but because he is believed to be spiritually qualified for membership.

Is it not possible to keep the vital question clear? . . .

The single, simple question we want an answer to is: Have we a right to require it [immersion] as a condition of co-membership with us in the Church of Christ of one of whose genuine conversion we are satisfied? Do we believe, can we believe, that Jesus whose last and most earnest prayer was for the oneness of his followers, who taught so insistently the impotency of ceremonial and the spiritual nature of the relation of his disciples to him and to each other, would have them bar each other from organic relationship in the work of advancing his kingdom because of different views as to a ceremony which he never mentioned once in his whole ministry from the Jordan to the Cross?

In the same issue appears a splendid article written by a layman, charged with feeling but luminous with clear thought. He believes the time has come for the church leaders, both laymen and ministers, to speak out their minds on the subject without timidity. There has come a change of conviction, he is strongly assured, on the whole question of denominational distinctiveness and exclusive fellowship, and he appeals for frank, untrammeled speech and proceeds himself to set an example of it. He is proud of Baptist principles, of its history and its great contemporary leaders:

But I am also thorougly convinced that the question of immersion has had little, if anything, to do with these things for which I am proud. I think the ideal of religious liberty and insistence on a vital religion rather than a creedal religion has had more to do with it than anything else. And insistence on immersion [in the case of those who are already Christians] is insistence upon a creedal religion rather than a vital religion and contrary to the ideal of liberty of conscience and a living religion. I care not whether immersion was the original mode of baptism or not. Most of our pedobaptist friends concede that point, but they do not consider it vital to Christianity, and history and experience seem to bear them out or else we must claim an immersed Christian is better than the non-immersed, which I think history and experience disprove. Try as hard as I can, for the life of me I cannot see any difference between the immersed and the non-immersed Christian which can be traced in any way to the rite. We seem to have good and bad Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Baptists and Episcopalians, but I never have been able to trace the difference to the amount of water used in the initiation. For some years I have talked, as occasion offered, with ministers and laymen and I have yet to find a satisfactory reason for insistence upon immersion, and I have found many ministers and laymen who believed that it was contrary to the spirit of Jesus Christ, a hindrance to the progress of the church and that it puts us in a false light. We may talk about "regularity" and all that sort of thing, but what does it amount to, forsooth? It seems to me it is either tweedledee or tweedledum, or else we must insist that the immersed Christian is a superior product to the non-immersed. We are willing to work side by side in Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A., we hold union services, we admit them to the communion service, we treat them as equal fellow Christians—all except actual admission to our churches, and then we insist on something they care nothing about and which insults their previous church affiliation and for which they are neither the better nor the worse. Did not the Christ direct his finest scorn against the scribes and Pharisees for their insistence upon form and ceremony and letter instead of the life and the spirit? Somehow I feel that he would direct that same scorn against us whenever we insist upon acceptance of theological definitions in order to obtain membership in our churches rather than evidence of a desire to live in accord with his spirit. The great mass of people, both in the church and out of it, care little or nothing for theological discussion—in fact, they are impatient with it. They realize its unimportance.

This clear headed layman, whose name is Wm. R. Davis, of Flint, Mich., touches the quick spot of the problem when he says above that the present practice of Baptist churches "insults the previous Church affiliation" of unimmersed Christians. He sees a vision of the possibilities of church work in his home city if once their irrelevant denominational distinctions and organizations could be cast on one side and Christian fellowship could be organized upon the basis of the great undenominational fundamentals. "Only denominational pride keeps us apart," he says, "and it seems to me denominational pride is not half so important as Christian efficiency."

I am not from Missouri, but I do want to be shown why such a union so devoutly to be wished should not be consummated. Be specific, my friends. Don't give a reason which makes a rite or denomination more important than the kingdom of God. Show how separation produces more righteous living. Tell us if the good Lord is preparing a superior mansion in the world to come for the Baptist than for the Presbyterian. If insistence on rite and dogma doesn't produce better living here and better chances in the world to come, of what use is it?

Many say the day is surely coming, but how shall it come unless we say and do as we think? Many are holding back waiting for others to take the initiative. Let us have the courage of our real convictions. Shall not we as Baptists make a beginning by receiving others into our membership who we know are Christians without humiliating them, and where one church would be better than two or three be ready to meet our brothers and work for such a consummation?

This writer closes with these words:

Sometimes I have a dream of being a member of such a church that shall be neither Baptist nor Presbyterian nor Congregationalist, and shall not demand for membership assent to theological dogma or a certain form of baptism, but will allow liberty of conscience upon all these matters—whose service shall be acceptable to all who love truth and justice and righteousness—one whose music and prayer and message shall strike the chord of the best that is in us and help us to realize it a little nearer—a church which, as Bishop Williams expresses it, will inspire the finest ideals and furnish the dynamic to go out and solve the problems of life.

It is a notable thing that this issue has come to the discussion point among Baptists, and that already a number of their congregations have taken their stand for a more generous and consistent treatment of Christ's people of other names. The Baptists lack one of the chief motives which impel the Disciples of Christ to a similar course. Baptists are avowedly a denomination. They have never, as a body, felt the sin of the denominational order and of participating in it. They have accepted it and their status in it.

But Disciples have always opposed the denominational order. They have set their faces against having any part or lot in it. They have steadfastly refused to be a denomination in creed, in baptism, in name, in communion. Gradually in these days it is coming over them that the practice of a plan of church fellowship which excludes any soul whom Christ has received into his Church is the very essence of denominationalism, of sectarianism. And as this insight becomes more clear they will lead the way to the more Christian practice which their ideal of Christian unity makes imperative.

It is well to know that among Baptists there are some, at least, who will accompany us into the larger fellowship of Christ's people.

As the discussion proceeds we will keep our readers informed of any significant turn it may take. In this article it has been our endeavor only to make a digest of the correspondence, not to contribute any suggestion or criticism.

Christian Laymen as Witnesses.

A contemporary remarks upon "what seems to be the birth of a new passion for gospel witnessing upon the part of Christian laymen," especially marked in the west. In Kansas gospel teams under the leadership of Mr. Henry J. Allen, editor of the Wichita Beacon and Progressive Party candidate for governor, have made a sensation over a wide territory. In Washington City Senators Clapp of Minnesota, Kenyon of Iowa, Norris of Nebraska, and Ashurst of Arizona are preaching lay sermons frequently in the pulpits near the Capitol. Vice-President Marshall is reported as having lately said: "In my judgment, the first blush of dawn is already apparent on the horizon of the world's spiritual day."

Are Social Workers Church Men?

It is often said by persons outside the church that most of the genuine social service work of today is being done by men and women who are not church-members. If the questionnaire recently conducted by the American Institute for Social Service is to be taken seriously, this view is wrong. This Institute sent inquiries to a large number of persons engaged in social and philanthropic work, in an effort to discover whether they owed their inspiration for service to the church. Of the 1,012 persons who replied, seventy-six per cent were communicants in some Christian church; twenty-one per cent belonged to the Episcopal church, sixteen per cent were Congregationalists, fifteen per cent Presbyterians, fourteen per cent Methodists, 6 per cent Universalists and Unitarians, and five per cent Roman Catholics.

Reform at Pittsburg Meets Opposition.

The recently organized Social Service Union, of Pittsburg, including as members eleven pastors of various denominations, seems to be stirring up some opposition, and for that reason may be voted a success already. A speaker made the following declaration at a recent mass meeting: "The city official who is honest and who is sincerely working for a cleaner and better city has absolutely nothing to fear from the Christian Service Union. Such a man will receive our hearty persistent support." The object of the union is stated as follows: "In the service of God and in the spirit of brotherhood, to marshal the religious forces of the city and county so as to make them effective for social service along larger lines; not to conflict with other worthy civic and social organizations, but to afford the very assistance they most need." Under its plan and scope are included the following: Publicity, Social Purity, Civics and Legislation, Social Education, Industrial Relations, Community Surveys. The Union now has three committees actively at work: The Committee on Amusements, the Committee on Organized Vice and the Committee on Civic Action.

Pan-Presbyterian Federation in South.

The Continent reports that there is on foot in the south a movement looking toward a Pan-Presbyterian federation. The Presbytery of Asheville, it states, will overture the Southern Assembly, which is to meet in Kansas City in May, as follows: "1. To appoint an ad interim committee, and to request the supreme judicatories of other Reformed churches in this country, holding the Presbyterian system of government, to appoint similar committees, to meet and confer together in regard to a plan for the federation of these churches through a federal congress, with lower and upper houses; representation in the lower house to be based on the number of communicants, and each church to have equal representation with every other church in the upper house; the concurrence of both houses to be necessary for conclusive action by the federal congress in such matters as shall be committed or referred to it. 2. That the several supreme judicatories of the aforesaid churches be requested to instruct their committees, if they shall see fit to appoint such, to formulate in joint conference a plan and constitution of federation on said basis, to be presented to the several supreme judicatories for their consideration." It is proposed that the federal congress shall have three sets of functions: Authoritative, advisory and "inspirational."

Rev. Hubert C. Herring, who has left his work as Secretary of the Congregational Home Missionary Society, to devote his entire time to the secretaryship of the National Council of Congregational Churches.

Young People's Societies to Fight Saloons

Hope for decided results from a temperance movement to be undertaken conjointly by the Epworth League and the Christian Endeavor Society was expressed at the celebration two weeks ago of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the league's founding, held in New York. The celebration was in advance of the real anniversary date, May 17, in honor of the presence in the city of hundreds of Methodist clergymen attending the sessions of the New York conference. Stress was laid by Dr. William F. Sheridan of Chicago, secretary of the league, who presided, on the fact that for the first time since the organization of the league its members and those of the Christian Endeavor Society would combine during the coming year "to fight the demon rum." "The combining of these two great forces will undoubtedly force the saloonkeepers to cover," said Dr. Sheridan.

Catholics and Protestants at Exposition.

At San Francisco, there will be a church exhibit in connection with the exposition. The Roman Catholic Church first conceived the notion, and this church is well advanced in its plans for a beautiful representation of St. Peter's at Rome. Not to be outdone, the Protestants are planning a building which will be representative of the whole of Protestantism, the architect's plans for which call for a great building in the shape of an open Bible. Religious services will be held in each of these buildings, in other parts of which will be extensive exhibits of the work of the churches.

"Boys' Shelter Club" New Move.

The Boys' Shelter Club, of Chicago, will give money to furnish boys of poor parentage and unfavorable early surroundings with the supervision and assistance of the Young Men's Christian Association, as they begin work in the new environment of the city, according to a plan just perfected. The work is a phase of the "big brother" movement, but carried on by a group of well-known Chicago women who compose the Boys' Shelter Club. The youngsters to have the benefit of the scheme will come from the Allandale Boys' Farm, a juvenile colony which has obtained remarkable results in caring for boys who have had home surroundings, as the Shelter Club has done its work in the past through the instrumentality of Allandale and has maintained a separate cottage for its own charges. According to its new plan it will continue its help when its charges reach the age to leave Allandale.

The President and Washington Churches.

President Wilson has established a record in the breaking of precedents not only in official and social matters, but in churchgoing. This does not mean that he is or he is not a regular attendant at Sunday morning services, but that he has declined to attach himself to any one of the many Presbyterian churches of the capital. In the year he has occupied the White House he has visited most of them, although he goes more often to the Central Presbyterian than any one of the others. This "erratic" action on the part of Mr. Wilson is rather disconcerting to the visitors from out of town who expect to include in their sight-seeing the President at church. The chief executive undoubtedly is aware of this propensity on the part of the curiously inclined, a portion of whom can be outwitted by not knowing which church to attend to see the sight of a President at prayer. Because of the possibilities of a visit from the President on Sunday morning all the Presbyterian churches have had a noticeable increase in their congregations.

Presbyterians Getting Together.

The Federal Council of Reformed and Presbyterian Churches in the United States has just held its fourth biennial meeting in Philadelphia. Seven communions belong to this council, and six were represented at this meeting. The council was organized especially with a view to the cultivation of friendship among the sister churches of Presbyterianism. The forces at home and abroad has never been more vigorously expressed in any Presbyterian meeting than at this Philadelphia session. The council resolved to overture the supreme bodies of the seven constituent churches to authorize a special committee empowered to confer with the various denominational boards and arrange joint operations in home and foreign missions, evangelization of the colored people, Sunday-school work, publication and education.

Who Controls Vanderbuilt University?

The Supreme Court of Tennessee has decided that Cornelius Vanderbilt, and not the College of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, is the founder of Vanderbilt University, Nashville; that the bishops' veto of the proffered gift of $1,000,000 to the medical department of the university is void and the gift may be received, and that the control of the university lies with the University Board of Trust. But the election of new members of the board, the Northwestern Christian Advocate notes, is subject to confirmation by the General Conference or the Board of Education of the Church. This decision thus takes the immediate control of the university from the church officials, but leaves the ultimate control with the church through its power to veto the election of members of the University Board of Trust.

Presbyterians Elect Publication Editor.

The Board of Publication and Sunday School Work in Philadelphia, Pa., has elected Dr. John T. Faris as editorial superintendent of Sunday-school literature to succeed Dr. J. R. Miller, recently deceased. Dr. Faris served as the editor's assistant in the last years of his life, and has been in charge of the board's editorial office ever since Doctor Miller's death.

Commercial Club Boosts Churches.

Churching the "Ricksha Men."

A movement has been launched by Christians of Shanghai for churching the long-neglected, ignorant class, under the name of the Shanghai Mission for Ricksha Men, the object of which is not only to preach Christ but also to give instruction of a general character. Over 20,000 men have already been reached and the children have been gathered into a Sunday-school.

John Timothy Stone of Chicago, moderator of the Presbyterian Church, has recently issued a letter to every Presbyterian pastor suggesting the need of calling the attention of young men to the advantages of the Christian ministry.

Religion for Chicago Chinamen.

The new Chinatown now being built in Chicago is to be provided with an institutional Church under the joint direction of the Federated Council of Churches of Christ in America and the Young Men's Christian Association. Los Angeles' Rapid Church Growth.

While the combined increase in Methodist, Baptist, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Disciples of Christ, Episcopal and Congregational fellowships in the United States was 2 per cent in 1913, in Los Angeles, during the same period, the same denominations increased five times as much. The membership of these communions in the city is approximately 50,000, which is about 5,000 more than was reported in 1912.

Church Statistics of China.

According to the latest statistics of the evangelical church in China, there is a total church membership of 470,000. Native ordained pastors number 548, with 5,364 unordained workers. There are 4,712 Chinese Christian school teachers, 1,789 Bible women and 496 native assistants employed in hospitals. Other native workers bring the total up to 15,501. There are 5,452 foreign missionaries from America and Europe on the China field. The Christian congregations number 2,955, which contributed last year $320,000 for work among their own people.

SET THY CHURCHES FREE.

By John Oxenham.

O God, within whose sight
All men have equal right
To worship Thee.
Break every bar that holds
Thy flock in diverse folds!
Thy will from none withholds
Full liberty.

Lord, set Thy churches free
From foolish rivalry!
Lord, set us free!
Let all past bitterness
Now and for ever cease
And all our souls possess
True charity!

Expert Says Men Do Not Read Bible.

Fred S. Goodman, international secretary of the Y. M. C. A., an expert in Bible-study among men, who has been holding a series of conferences for men and older boys in the cities of Kansas, says that he has made a careful investigation for years as to the number of Christian men who read and study the Bible and that it is surprisingly small.

Henry vanDyke Urges Peace Conference.

Dr. Henry van Dyke, Presbyterian churchman, at present minister from the United States at the court of Queen Wilhelmina, has been instructed by Secretary Bryan to suggest to the queen that she should call the third peace of the nations at The Hague conference, for which more powerful and ambitious sovereigns seem to hesitate to take the initiative.

Some Detroit Churches Oppose Sunday.

The invitation to "Billy" Sunday to come to Detroit at the earliest opportunity does not include the Congregationalists, who, under the influence of Dr. Gladden, still decline to vote in the affirmative. Most of the German speaking churches also decline.

Catholics for Social Service.

A conference was recently held in Louisville, Ky., for the purpose of establishing a Catholic Social Service Commission, whose headquarters are to be in Milwaukee. The commission, which is organized on the plan of the Protestant commissions, aims to crystallize Catholic sentiment in favor of social service, limiting its work at present to news and literature.

The ministerial union of Philadelphia, representing eight communions, met March 30 and enjoyed a talk from Dr. Russell H. Conwell on "Fifty Years on the Lecture Platform." He strongly advised ministers to extend their influence by supplementing their preaching with lecturing.

Churches Use Electric Signs.

In New York City more than 150 electric signs are used by the churches. The earliest illuminated church sign was a cross placed over St. Augustine Chapel in lower Manhattan nearly forty years ago. Bowery mission and settlement house workers have often met men and women who have testified that the flaming cross on St. Augustine's was the instrument that turned them from evil lives.

The evangelists are now engaged in a campaign in Glasgow, where they are speaking to large audiences.

Disciples Table Talk

Louis R. Patmont, a Disciple Evangelist, well-known for his work among the Polish people and against Roman Catholicism is reported missing at Westville, Ill., near Danville. Mr. Patmont has for some time been working in this community for the "drys." J. F. Bickel, pastor of First Church, Danville, sent the following telegram to the Christian Standard April 2: "Patmont disappeared Tuesday evening, March 31, from Westville, Ill. Foul play suspected. Are doing all we can to locate him; haven't as yet discovered a clue. Letter will follow." A later message dated April 6 reported "No news from Patmont," and the Chicago Tribune of April 10th reports that absolutely no trace had been found of Mr. Patmont, although a thorough search of ponds and abandoned coal mines had been made. Some of these are filled with water hundreds of feet in depth and it would be impossible to find the body if the missing man had been murdered and thrown into one of them. Mr. Patmont had recently come from South Bend, where he made a very drastic investigation of the Roman Catholic situation there.

C. H. Hamilton to Nanking University.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society recently appointed Clarence H. Hamilton, of Chicago, to the professorship of philosophy and psychology in the University of Nanking, the union school in which Disciples share control and service with Methodists and Presbyterians. Mr. Hamilton expects to take his doctor's degree this spring from the University of Chicago where he is now a student. He came to the University from Davenport, Ia., in 1906 as an undergraduate and has remained steadily at his student tasks save for six months last year when he taught in Bethany College, W. Va. For the past three years he has held a fellowship in the department of philosophy in the University and has conducted classes in psychology and ethics. Mr. Hamilton is a member of Hyde Park Church of Disciples with whose congregation he became affiliated as a Methodist in 1910. He was rebaptized by Doctor Ames in 1912. His relationship to the church has been one of active service—as Sunday-school teacher, leader of the boy scouts and, for a time, organist. He will be a significant addition to the working force on the foreign field and to the fellowship of the missionaries already there.

L. N. D. Wells a Man's Man.

November 1, 1912, when L. N. D. Wells came to Akron, O., and took up the pastorate of First Church, he found a Men's Class of about a hundred members meeting in the Pastime Theater, a moving picture house. He had a vision of something much greater in the way of a Brotherhood class for Akron, and immediately began to plan a campaign to enroll many hundred of Akron men in the uplift of the city. Under his leadership the class began to grow and each week saw the attendance of the preceding Sunday eclipsed. In a few weeks the Pastime Theater, with a seating capacity of 250, was found too small to accommodate the class and larger quarters were sought at the Grotto Theater, with a seating capacity of 700. This house was used for several months, the class increasing weekly until an attendance of 657 was reached on the second Sunday in February. On this particular Sunday John S. Rutledge, of anti-saloon fame, addressed the class and at the close of his masterly speech every man present pledged himself to do all within his power to drive the un-American saloon from county, state and country. The Grotto Theater is owned and controlled by brewing interests and when they heard of the action taken by the class it was ordered to vacate at once. This necessitated moving into the Y. M. C. A. gymnasium, where the class meets at present. Sunday, March 22, the attendance was 613. The enrollment is a little over a thousand and easily takes first rank among Men's Bible classes of the Disciples of Christ. J. A. Jones, song leader of the class, writes that Mr. Wells is a prince among men, and appeals strongly to the masses. His lesson lectures are gems and the closest attention is given to his every word. A special musical feature is given each Sunday. The class has an orchestra, holds social sessions at intervals, and has a sick benefit. A new theater is now under construction and the manager

Mr. C. H. Hamilton, who leaves the University of Chicago, to accept a professorship in Nanking University.

has extended the use of this home to the Men's class. The new home will be occupied early in the fall, when will be begun a campaign for an average attendance of one thousand.

Spokane University's Future Assured.

I. N. McCash, President of Spokane University, sends a telegram stating that at a Business Men's Meeting April 10, the manager of the Inland Empire Railway pledged that company to permanent development of Spokane, Wash. He said the University would be a large element in the future of Spokane Valley and is entitled to support The Chamber of Commerce made a like declaration. The excavation for the new Science Hall of the University is progressing, and 109 students are enrolled.

Lenten Sermons and Studies.

During the Lenten period Dr. E. S. Ames preached a series of sermons in Hyde Park church, Chicago, in interpretation of the moral experience of Jesus, under the following titles: "Loyalty to a Cause," "Development through a Cause," "Comradeship in a Cause," "Idealism in a Cause," "Martyrdom in a Cause," "Survival through a Cause" (Easter). Doctor Ames' Wednesday evening meetings have been taking on unusual interest of late through a study of the question "How to be Religious." For the past five Wednesdays the themes have been "What to Do to Be Religious," "How to Succeed at It," "How to Be Happy in It," "Resilience of Soul," "The Christian Tradition." It is said by those attending these meetings that constructive contributions of great importance have been made to the spiritual life. There have been sixty-one additions to Hyde Park Church since Oct. 1.

Disciples' Plea Surprises Winnipeg People.

J. R. Blunt, who has taken the pastorate at Winnipeg, Man., reports that the plea of the Disciples of Christ is a surprise to most of the church-going people of Winnipeg. The Disciples are usually classed with the Mormons, by the Ministerial Association, as one of the miscellaneous "all other varieties." The hope of the future, Mr. Blunt writes, is to erect a modern plant for the First Church, and to build up a strong Sunday-school; and as speedily as possible, to plant other mission schools in needy places in the city. To bring one of the strong evangelistic teams to the city for a campaign, is also considered a "way" into the heart of the city. Many people of other fellowships are talking Christian union, and there are a number of bands meeting in different parts of the city who are practically with the Disciples in faith and practice. Although the Winnipeg people do not take kindly to evangelistic meetings, Mr. Blunt has just closed a three weeks meeting at St. James, in West Winnipeg, where D. R. Hill, a young Welshman, is pastor. Eleven persons were added to the church's membership by this effort. The spirit of the church is indicated by the fact that less than 100 active members have given over $300 for missions in six months. This speaks well for the future of the church in this "wonder city," "the Chicago of the North."

E. L. Dakin Finds Hoosier Work Ideal.

E. LeRoy Dakin, who two months ago left Memorial Church, Chicago—a Disciple-Baptist union church—reports that he has found his new field, among the Baptists, at Logansport, Ind., almost ideal. However, we still consider him a loyal Disciple. An enthusiastic believer in social service activities, Dr. Dakin finds that the Brotherhood and Sisterhood organizations in the new field are willing to work with zeal through newly-formed recreational, educational, social, civic and evangelistic committees. These two organizations include every member of the church. Each is directed by an Executive Council of fifteen, which embraces officers and committee chairman. Doctor Dakin gives, as the sources of strength of these organizations, these four: 1. Simplicity. 2. Inclusiveness. 3. Co-ordination. 4. Vital fraternity. Fifty-six new members are reported, all having come in the regular services since the beginning of the new administration. Doctor Dakin writes that "fortunately or unfortunately, all the old records of the church, including its constitution, have been lost in the recent process of moving into the new building," and states that he is having "the delightful task" of shaping a new constitution.

Dean Athearn to Teach at Columbia.

Dean W. S. Athearn, Professor of religious education at Drake University, will teach two courses again this year in the summer

APPRECIATION.

The Christian Century cannot forbear to speak a grateful word to the many pastors who have participated in the recognition of "Christian Century Day" by speaking to their Sunday congregations on behalf of the paper and its message and by appointing an agent to represent it in the local church. More such pastors responded this year to this request than ever before. More local agents have accepted appointment to represent The Christian Century than we have had at any time in the history of the paper. Ofttimes these agents are persons of leadership and resource who take up the task as a work of love, because they believe in The Century and the ideals which its presence in the home inculcates. In other instances the agents are persons who, cherishing no less a personal desire to help the cause, are glad to receive the generous commissions offered by our circulation department for new subscribers. To them all and to the pastors and to every reader whose joyous and active services are responsible for a more rapidly increasing subscription list than this paper has ever known, we express our sincere appreciation.

DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

session of Columbia University, one on the principles of religious education and the other on the historical agency and material of religious education. "The Church School" will be used as a text book in the latter course. This book is a new one of Dean Athearn's which will be published by the Pilgrim Press, Boston, and which will be on the market by June 1. The book includes the outline studies on the various departments of the church school prepared by Professor Athearn for the use of the Des Moines Sunday-school Institute, but revised and very greatly enlarged and supplemented. The book is designed as a college text book on the material and method of religious education.

How the Every Member Canvass Works.

Churches that are wondering how to go about the task of making the every member canvass should study the methods of the University Place Church, Champaign, Ill., in their canvass made on March 28. Thoroughness and enthusiasm marked the event. Just seventy men left the church a few minutes after 2 o'clock on Sunday afternoon, going two and two. Each team had been assigned about ten homes in which to call. Most of the teams had covered their territory by 5 o'clock. The total subscribed for missions and benevolences is approximately $1,200, and the current expense fund was increased by 10 per cent, with approximately one-third of the membership of the church either not at home or asking a little more time for consideration, and it is thought when these are heard from as the work is finished by the teams the results will be accordingly greater. The preparatory service in the morning was one long to be remembered and came to its climax when the seventy men stood in solid double line entirely across the front before the audience to receive the solemn charge for what the minister called "The unfinished task of Jesus." Without a single exception the men returned from their afternoon's work happy and with the declaration that they would like to go again. The evening service was entirely in charge of the men, all of whom sat on the platform. A brief talk averaging about fifteen seconds in length was made by every member of the team and the men reported, without exception, that they were received hospitably. The pastor, Stephen E. Fisher, was a "layman" Sunday night and sat in the audience to enjoy the service. E. L. Murduck, chairman of the University Place board, presided. Dr. C. M. Thompson, in a brief address at the close, summarized the concensus of opinion when he declared, "It has been the greatest day University Place has ever known and my judgment is the church will go forward as never before."

D. B. Titus Leaves Caldwell, Ida.

D. B. Titus, who has ministered in South Idaho fields for seven years, being president of the State Board for the last two years, is leaving his present pastorate at Caldwell, to accept the work at Kalispell, Mont. His successor has not been chosen. The Kalispell church is one of the strongest in Montana, and worships in the finest building among the Montana Disciples. A farewell reception was given at Caldwell to Mr. Titus and family. Speeches were given by the ministers of the other churches of the city. One of the speakers referred especially to the pleasant relations that have existed among the ministers of this city, and recalled how great was the gladness when last year the pastors determined on holding union services during the summer months in the Methodist church building. He remarked that the Christian church was one of the children of the Presbyterian church, and came into being through the narfowness and intolerance of the Pittsburgh presbytery that could not tolerate the ideas of Alexander Campbell. Had he been a member of that body, the Caldwell minister said, he would have worked for a different end in that case, but, he suggested, had the end been different Caldwell would have probably not had among its pastors Mr. Titus! There have been 75 additions to the Caldwell church's membership during the two years' pastorate of Mr. Titus.

A Little Visit to Greater Pittsburg

I have just returned from a series of Decision Services of a little more than two weeks with the Bellevue church, Greater Pittsburgh, following up the W. A. Sunday campaign. In 1905 while pastor at Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, I was with the Bellevue church a month in a similar series during the great simultaneous campaign. A that time Alfred W. Place was pastor and the month I spent with the church then and in the home of that interesting man and his equally interesting wife, I shall long remember.

F. A. Bright is the alert pastor there now and it was in his home that I was entertained this time, and partook of the gracious hospitality of Mrs. Bright. I do not know when I have enjoyed two weeks more thoroughly than the two I have just spent with the Bellevue church and as a guest in the home of the Brights. I believe that congregation is the best of its size in our Brotherhood and Pastor Bright is giving them a superb leadership. Indeed we may soon expect to read of the building of a handsome annex to the present edifice in Bellevue.

There were between sixty and seventy accessions to the church since the Sunday campaign, many of them heads of families. The attendance on week nights was splendid, and on the Lord's Day taxed the capacity of the building.

The results of the Sunday revival in Pittsburgh interested me greatly. I am the only minister now located in Bloomington who went through the revival here with Mr. Sunday in 1908. At that time our congregation received practically five hundred new members. The results of Mr. Sunday's Pittsburgh revivals are noteworthy in several respects. For one thing the tremendous fight against the drink evil greatly lessened the consumption of liquors and for another thing the city was extraordinary aroused in a religious way.

Bellevue is ten miles from the tabernacle's location, but the influence of the meetings upon the borough was marked. I should say that Mr. Sunday's work in a great city like Pittsburgh is more fruitful and permanent in its results than in a smaller city and for two reasons. First, in the larger cities the churches taking part continue their Sunday services with the possible exception of one Sunday in the entire campaign and secondly, the converts are distributed among the churches in such a way as to be satisfactorily assimilated. No church of which I have any knowledge is prepared to care adequately for five hundred converts en masse and the abandonment of the regular services both morning and evening, on the part of a congregation for a period of six or seven weeks, is perilous always.

While in Pittsburgh I made a hurried visit to Somerset where I spoke for a men's banquet in the beautiful new edifice that the Disciples there have builded and was most hospitably entertained in the home of Mr. L. C. Colburn. Leaving Pittsburgh Saturday night, March 25, I had a very full and interesting day in Washington, D. C., lunching with "my congressman" and spending two hours in the gallery of the House listening to the beginning of the debate on the tolls question.

On my way back to Bloomington I spent a day at Cincinnati and all in all I had a most pleasant and profitable visit in the east.

Among the Churches of Cleveland

BY W. F. ROTHENBURGER.

Cleveland Disciples find themselves busy enough in the "Sixth City" which has a population of 667,000 people. Of these it is estimated that 5,000 are Roumanians and Griners, 20,000 Italians, 40,000 each of Slovaks, Hungarians, and Jews, 75,000 Bohemians, 100,000 German speaking peoples and a miscellaneous lot of nearly all other nationalities.

The city occupies a stretch of about fifteen miles along the lake front and is rapidly pushing its way still further. The material prosperity of the city is much in evidence. Within the last few years a Federal Building and a Court House have been erected as a part of the "group plan" and the City Hall is now building. In prospect is a high level bridge, and a $17,000,000 depot, and within the last twenty-four hours it has been announced that here is also to be located one of the Federal Reserve Banks which shall have a total resource of about $75,000,000.

Religiously, Cleveland is much like other cosmopolitan cities. It is safe to say that almost fifty per cent are affiliated with the Roman Catholic church. These people have done the most building of any religious body in the city and in their characteristic alertness they have preëmpted the best blocks in the growing suburbs. On these sites great church buildings and parochial schools will soon rise and around these centers their constituency will colonize. St. Ignatius College is also located here.

EARLY CLEVELAND PASTORS.

The Disciples have to their credit seventy-two years of history. Among the men who have labored are J. M. Atwater, Jabez Hall, Doctor Shepherd, J. A. Garfield, Alanson Wilcox, J. Z. Tyler, and others. They now have an approximate membership of 4,500 and a Bible-school constituency of some 6,000 in the ten churches and one mission.

The Annual Banquet of the Disciples Union was held at the Franklin Circle church, March 20. Two hundred members of the official boards and their wives sat down at a fraternal dinner at 6:30. W. H. Cowdry, chairman of the executive committee, presided. This was followed by a mass meeting in the auditorium with former Judge F. A. Henry in the chair. The chief object of this meeting was to bring before the Disciples the opportunity just before them among their foreign neighbors. The speakers were F. D. Butchart of Cleveland, and Dr. Harry C. Hurd, of the College of Missions at Indianapolis. These annual gatherings have created a group consciousness in the city and have stimulated the churches to greater things.

It may be said in general that the work of the Disciples in this cosmopolitan city is in a most vigorous state. Collinwood, in a railroad center with a Bible-school of 550 and a church membership of 470 is a living link in the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Under the leadership of W. A. Harp a tabernacle has been constructed and was dedicated on Easter Sunday afternoon. In this the Fife Brothers are beginning an evangelistic campaign.

William N. Vickers is in his first year at Miles Ave. church. This work was established in May, 1842, and now has a resident membership of 600 with a Bible-school of 400 in a growing part of the south end of the city. A large plant is being talked, and we hope it will be realized.

H. R. COOLEY AS LEADER.

The Crawford Rd. church, where Charles Darsie has ministered for some three years' is the transplanted old Cedar Ave. church so long presided over by Dr. H. R. Cooley. This work with a resident membership of 300 and a school of 350, housed in a splendid new brick plant in one of the best residence centers of the east end, promises to grow to large proportions.

W. K. Asbill, took up the work at Dunham Ave., two years ago with about 125 resident members and a school of 260. With the wisdom of many years of experience and with a grasp on the peculiar needs of the community the progress of the last year is most promising.

Franklin Circle is in her seventy-third year, with a membership of 825 and a Bible-school of 850. They are a living link in the O. C. M. S. and have recently assumed the stations at Nantungchow, China, with sixteen native workers. The present cathedral structure has become inadequate. The Bible-school plant has recently been enlarged and the "annex" has been fitted up for some of the departments. Personal work, constant evangelism, missionary education, symmetrical development, have been emphasized. A daily vacation Bible-school has been conducted and a work among the Slovaks is carried on regularly. Thirteen young men and women have gone from her ranks to the ministry and mission fields in the last fifteen years. William F. Rothenburger is in his sixth year as pastor and Miss Jennie Jenkinson is the assistant.

About three years ago the old Madison Ave. church moved into its new brick plant on West Boulevard and since that time it has made remarkable progress. Frank C. Ford is in his tenth year as minister. In the last few years he has grown it from a mission to a membership of 400 people and a Bible-school of 600. An excellent corner lot facing the boulevard and owned by the church awaits the erection of a large auditorium not many years hence.

In the extreme west end of the city the Highland Ave. mission is located. During the year's pastorate of D. N. Gilette this mission, located near the Christian Orphanage, has outgrown its quarters, fitted up the basement for a Bible-school which enrolls 200 and has grown its church membership to 140. With the westward growth of the city at this point, this vigorous mission will soon become self-supporting.

O. L. Hull is in his fourth year at Glenville. Several excellent meetings have been held during his ministry with 280 additions, making a membership of 435 and a Bible-school of 450. Their emphasis has been placed upon missions and personal work. They are a Living Link in the F. C. M. S. and their present need is larger equipment.

The Lakewood church with a membership of 425 people is located in one of the most beautiful and rapidly growing suburbs of the city. They have had four different buildings and were formerly located on the banks of Rocky River. About six years ago they moved into a new brick Bible-school plant and last year under the generalship of Walter S. Goode, who is now in his fourth year of ministry, they dedicated a complete plant including Bible-school room, gymnasium and auditorium. Their chief emphasis has been on the Bible-school work and they are now experimenting with the combined Bible-school and church services in the morning.

J. H. GOLDNER THIRTEEN YEARS PASTOR.

The Euclid Ave. people celebrated their seventieth anniversary last year, clearing off the final debt of their $114,000 building. Theirs is a most complete and beautiful structure, well situated to the needs of this residence center. J. H. Goldner is in his thirteenth year as minister and is assisted by Howard Spangler. The church is a Living Link in the A. C. M. S., the O. C. M. S., the C. W. B. M. and supports the station at Bolenge. The membership is 800 with a Bible-school of 675. Special emphasis has been placed upon missionary education, personal work among men, and symmetrical development.

PERSONAL AND OTHERWISE.

The committee of attendance for the Atlanta Convention, Colby D. Hall, chairman, announces its intention to carry on a propaganda through our papers looking toward a more equitable representation of the churches than has ever before characterized one of our annual gatherings.

The Ministerial Association of our Greater New York churches will meet Monday, April 13, at the Central Church, Manhattan. An address will be given by E. E. Elliott, National Secretary of the Brotherhood Movement, on "Men and the Machinery of the Church."

Dean Shailer Matthews, of the Federal Council, will deliver two addresses at the Disciples Congress at Indianapolis. A. E. Cory of the Men and Millions Movement will speak on the value of the Men and Millions Movement from an educational point of view.

The church letter "evil" worries many churches very much indeed. O. G. White, state secretary of West Virginia, is the author of a new form of church letter which is worthy of pattern. Copies may be had by addressing him at Bethany, West Va.

The Lake Geneva Conference of the Laymen's Missionary Movement will be held July 29 to August 3, and followed by the Missionary Education Movement's Conference. Post Office address Williams Bay, Wis., care Y. M. C. A. Camp.

You may secure three copies of "Making Good in the Local Church," the new book by our National Brotherhood's Secretary, for one dollar by application to the Brotherhood office, Kansas City, Mo.

A Men's Movement is being organized in the church at Dighton, Kans.

HIRAM COLLEGE NOTES.

The pledges to the Almeda A. Booth Memorial Chair have now reached the $50,000 mark. Contributions are still coming in. To cover the cost of the canvass and make the fund net $50,000 the canvass will be continued till another $1,000 is secured.

Our last "Notes" reported Robert Peden of Youngstown the winner for Hiram of the Ohio Intercollegiate Oratorical Contest. We now have to report a double victory for Hiram's debating teams in inter-collegiate debates with the teams of Baldwin-Wallace University.

We notice that Lawrence Bridge, of Kenton, a present Butler College student, is winner of the Indiana Inter-Collegiate Oratorical contest. Lawrence was a Hiram student three years and represented Hiram in the Ohio contest. Hiram has lent him to Butler for his senior year. And so it will come to pass that two Hiram boys, members of the Hesperian Literary Society will be competitors at the Inter-state contest at Earlham College, Ind., in May.

During the spring vacation week the College Glee Club did themselves and the college honor by a series of entertainments in neighboring towns and cities.

The many-sidedness of our Hiram life is illustrated by the public doings of the past month: a week of special meetings at the church carried on by home forces to deepen the spiritual life of our people; a series of missionary addresses and conference by Miss Sylvia Siegfried, class of '05, now from the Philippines, Frank Garrett from China and Stephen J. Corey from everywhere; a comedy written by Jessie Brown Pounds and presented by members of the Pounds Centennial Bible Class, a delicious piece of humor remarkably well presented; a rare musical treat on the violin by Miss Claudia Page, grand-daughter of President Zollars, and an evening of song by Madame Sylva, late of the Royal Opera of Vienna. Both artists were greeted by large and enthusiastic houses.

Along with experiences that brighten as well as enrich our life we are called to record a note of deep sadness in the passing away of Arthur L. Bancroft, only son of Professor Colman Bancroft. Graduating in 1902, he completed the law course at Ann Arbor, when a fatal malady interrupted his life plans. Reared in a beautiful Christian home, he early drank in of its spirit. The church and the world can ill afford to spare such men from their tasks. B. S. DEAN.

TRANSPORTATION TO THE CONGRESS.

On account of the hotels at Lexington not being able to care for our people April 28-29-30, the place of meeting has been changed to Indianapolis, and the dates remain the same. Announcement of the program will come from the secretary, C. M. Sharpe. I am writing to say that arrangements have been made with the C. C. C. & St. L. Railway (Big 4 Route), for special sleeping cars leaving St. Louis, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit and Toledo, on the night trains April 27, arriving at Indianapolis by early morning of the 28th in time to secure your quarters before the opening of the program. The day trains from these points to Indianapolis arrive too late for the opening, and as you are paying your money to get the program it is essential that you come early. The morning trains from Cincinnati and Louisville will get you to Indianapolis in time for the opening of the program. The rate of fare will be 2 cents per mile in each direction from all points in Central Passenger Association territory. Persons living beyond this territory will save money by purchasing tickets to St. Louis, Cincinnati, Louisville, or Chicago, and rebuying from those points. Do not buy through to Indianapolis as the rate will be higher. Tickets from New York and Pittsburgh will be the same and may be purchased through to Indianapolis.

Reservations may be made by mail or in person to any representative of the Big Four Route at Chicago, St. Louis, Cleveland, Toledo and Detroit. It is highly desirable that accommodations be spoken for early so that sufficient sleeping cars may be provided.

In Charge of Transportation.

NEWS FROM THE FOREIGN SOCIETY.

Dr. Mary T. McGavran, Damoh, India, says: "During the summer when we must work in Damoh, we are going to try the lantern pictures at the school house and a number of places where old friends live, non-Christian. I am getting to two or three villages every week. This aside from our regular school and medical work."

The average receipts for the past four years for professional services and medicines in the Laoag Hospital, P. I., conducted by Dr. C. L. Pickett, amount to $3,619 gold per year. This indicates a wholesome and useful service. The confidence in the medical work is shown by an average increase of 1,500 treatments per year during a period of about ten years.

H. C. Saum and family sailed from Bombay, India, April 3, for America on their regular furlough. His term of service has been a most creditable one, and his friends in America will be delighted to see him.

Word comes that Mrs. M. B. Madden of Osaka, Japan, is not in good health and may be compelled to return to America for a time at least.

Miss Josepha Franklin, writing from India, says that cholera is raging in Damoh. She fears our mission schools in the town will have to be closed. It will be remembered that the orphanage is on the outside of the town, and will not likely be endangered.

C. E. Benlehr has gone on to India from his furlough. Mrs. Benlehr tarried for a while, while the children are in school. She will sail for India, Jan. 5, 1915.

W. R. Hunt of Chuchow, China, is returning to England, his home, on furlough, by way of Russia. The trip can be made much quicker by that route. Mr. Hunt has done an excellent service in the evangelistic field in and about Chuchow.

A. F. Hensey of Bolenge, Africa, reports that six have been baptized there recently. Word comes also that there have been forty-three added to the church at Lotumbe, Africa.

The Baptist Foreign Missionary Society is planning to celebrate the Judson Centennial in Boston, June 24-25. The Foreign Society was asked to send a representative to that celebration. A. E. Cory was selected as our representative.

The University Place Church, Des Moines, Ia., has just completed their first Every-Member-Canvass for Missions. The returns are not all in, but sufficient to indicate that it has been a great success. C. S. Medbury is the pastor of this great church. One hundred and fifty of his men spent Sunday afternoon, April 5, in visiting the membership. They went two by two and approached every member of the church for a missionary contribution on the weekly plan. Brother Medbury thinks this campaign will mark an epoch in the history of his church. THE PRODIGAL SON.

INTERNATIONAL UNIFORM LESSON FOR MAY 3.

Luke 15:11-32. Memory Verses, 17-19.

Golden Text—I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight.—Luke 15:18.

American Standard Bible.

Copyright, 1901, by Thomas Nelson & Sons. (Used by permission.)

(11) And he said, A certain man had two sons: (12) and the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of thy substance that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living. (13) And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together and took his journey into a far country; and there he wasted his substance with riotous living. (14) And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that country; and he began to be in want. (15) And he went and joined himself to one of the citizens of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine. (16) And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him. (17) But when he came to himself he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish here with hunger! (18) I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight: (19) I am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants. (20) And he arose, and came to his father. But while he was yet afar off, his father saw him, and was moved with compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. (21) And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight: I am no more worthy to be called thy son. (22) But the father said to his servants, Bring forth quickly the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet: (23) and bring the fatted calf, and kill it, and let us eat, and make merry: (24) for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry.

At the Heart of the Lesson.

BY REV. A. Z. CONRAD, PH.D.

RESTRAINT AND REBELLION.

"A certain man had two sons and the younger of them said to his father 'Father, give me the portion of thy substance that falleth to me.'" Why this request? He had not been hindered or hampered. Provision and protection were freely afforded. There had been no unnatural rigor manifested in discipline. No curtailing of opportunity. No needless restrictions. To be sure laws prompted by love were firmly insisted upon. If not, then the home was far from ideal. Parental faithfulness insists first, last, and always on obedience. The child that is not taught to obey the law of the home is likely to be very reckless regarding the law of the land. Parental neglect to insist upon obedience negatives all counsel. The younger son's restlessness and his unhappiness under restraint is a commentary on the innate perversity of human nature. We do not take kindly to interference with our desires. The track that turns the train on the curve is heated with friction. The waters of the river lash the bank at the turn. The cliff that halts the tidal wave is smitten in the face by every surging of the foam flecked wave.

RIOTOUS LIVING.

There is a limit. The physical is not measureless. Sensual appetite suicides. Desire does not diminish but gratification declines. Everything combustible is sooner or later exhausted. Riotous living is unrestrained license. Pampered, it forgets the chains of bondage in its own fires. It is not necessarily, however, outrageous, spectacular bestiality. The riotous living of the prodigal seemed to be of this sort, but there are many prodigal sons whose riotous living appears to be very respectable. Not the drunkard or the glutton represent the "far country" fortune seeker alone. Any one who is not living sanely, who makes no account of the divine law and the divine love is such. No returning can do away with the fact that sin is worthy of unsparing condemnation. To forsake unrighteousness and turn to God is always commendable, but the side which needs emphasis is not the willingness of a miserable outcast who has come at last to discover his real condition, to return but the marvelous mercy and compassion which permits such an one to return.

EVIDENCES THAT AWAKEN HOPE.

"He joined himself to a citizen of the country who sent him into the fields to feed swine." The most repellent occupation was not rejected. Here is a glimmer of hope. He was willing to work. There is always a chance to recover a lost fortune so long as toil can make a successful appeal. To be sure it was urgent necessity which led to his consent, but even the stress of circumstances sometime fails to lead prodigals to be willing to take the thing that offers first. Where labor has come to be absolutely despised the case is hopeless. It is not enough to feel that labor is honorable but one should know that anything else is despicable. No man or woman in the world is anything but a parasite who is not investing time and energy for the benefit of humanity. We may expect something even of this "far-country" prodigal because he was willing to accept any occupation that offered support rather than die in indolence. When he ceased dissipation and began even the humblest toil his distorted vision was corrected and he began to see life from a different viewpoint. His reflections became more sane, and his recollections brought rebuke and remorse.

THE PRODIGAL'S DISCOVERY.

"When he came to himself." The greatest discovery made by a human being is himself. To know our actual and our possible selves is the highest sort of knowledge. The individual who indulges deliberately in any sin is abandoning the higher self. The prodigal had abandoned home, conscience, reason and friends. He had left his soul to starve and had not heeded its call for sustenance. He had forsaken and abandoned peace, progress, and had deliberately chosen delights which lead to degradation. To become a Christian is to come to one's self. We speak of one who has taken opiates and lost consciousness as coming to himself when consciousness is regained. Something akin to this is true of repentance which leads to regeneration. The soul which is born again simply comes to its own. Whereas it has been contented with the worst it is now seeking the best. Whereas it has abandoned everything pre-eminently desirable now it chooses the one thing supremely lovely.

THE RENEGADE'S RESOLVE.

"I will arise and go to my father." On two words destiny hinges. "I will." There is here implied a self-determining power which makes for weal or woe and all the responsibilities of final destination rest upon an individual possessed of this wonderful ability. In the power of human volition what glory resides! How many apparently impossible tasks are undertaken and accomplished as an immediate result of "I will." To will long enough and strong enough will break chains that hold in bondage; will melt away the iciest barriers; tunnel through mountains; break yawning chasms; bridge wild torrents; lead through terrifying tempests and ascend forbidding mountains. And yet this wonderful faculty may be so emasculated, so weakened, that any expression of it is only a spasm. A momentary expression of a better self, like a puff of smoke above a dying volcano, tells of exhausted and burned away resources. The prodigal had doubtless willed again and again. He had said, "I will stop drinking." He did not. "I will stop gambling." But he still continued to risk and to lose. "I will break with evil companions," and yet he stood with them. "I will save the little remnant of the patrimony I received and which is mostly wasted." But still he squandered it. But there is a difference now, for he had willed before and failed because he had willed in his own depleted powers. The difference is this, his present relation with his long neglected father, "I will arise and go to my father."

THE HOME TRAIL.

In the "far country" even the points of compass have been confused. How then will the prodigal find the way home? One thing he was wise enough to understand and that was that he could not get ready to go. He must go as he was in his rags and poverty. He had no wealth and no opportunity to accumulate it and if he had possessed it it would not have been the thing which would have led to his acceptance by the father. He had no honor and no friends. He must go alone with the evidences of his degradation upon him, with the marks of his wilderness life all over him. He must turn his face toward the rising sun and with a humble confession of his condition meet his father. The first saving element we found was that he was willing to work. The second is manifested in his humility and confession, "I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight." There is hope for any man who will say in all sincerity, "I have sinned," and there is no hope for any one in all God's world who is so lost to his own condition that he cannot and will not confess his sin against the Eternal Father.

PAMPERED PRODIGALS.

We are not, however, to heap upon him any encomiums because of this conclusion. He was in extreme destitution. Compulsion led him to recognize his condition. We do not hear one word of affection expressed for his father or one word of longing for home until he was degraded to the point of despair. Of course it was much better that he should come then, but it is quite possible to make a hero of the prodigal and give a false conception of the consequences of sowing wild oats. He uttered only the truth when he said, "I am no more worthy to be called thy son." So much of approbation is sometimes heaped upon returning prodigals that oftentimes they are led to boast of the very sins committed in the far country life. It was a wretched piece of business. Leaving God always is. Such an one is very sure sooner or later to be compelled to reckon with the worst kind of destitution. The choice of bad company invariably ends with the swine herd.

THE COMPASSION OF GOD.

In this we find the point of the parable. There is no applause for the prodigal or approbation of his decision, in the last extremity of his need, to come to himself that he might come to his father. The crowning purpose of this portrayal is to reveal the nature of God and to show especially his relation to lost men. The Father is represented as never for one moment having lost interest in his wandering boy. However long the period may have been which elapsed between his departure and return, during that interval the father's love endured every disappointment and every shock. It only makes the perfidy of the son the greater that he should have despised a love which was so persistent. "While he was a great way off his father saw him and was moved with compassion and ran and fell on his neck and kissed him." The scene is full of pathos. The son had confidence that the father would not reject him else he would not have come at all. But he was not prepared for such an outpouring of love from one who had been so grossly wronged. The sinner saved by grace never dreamed of just the kind of reception which is always given when in humble repentance one turns to the great Father above.

THE FULLNESS OF DIVINE FORGIVENESS.

The son having given evidence of his sincere sorrow and a determination henceforth to ally himself permanently with his father, there results complete reconciliation and without argument he is restored into favor in the home. The robe and the feast symbolically lift him to the highest place possible in household honor. All this declares emphatically the willingness of God to do his utmost for even his wayward children. God does not alone save, but puts upon his returned child the robe of righteousness and spreads the broad with the richest heaven can give to the children of men. All this is accomplished because of the atoning work of Jesus Christ upon the cross. The elder son's protest who, when he drew near the house and heard music and dancing expostulated with his father, reveals the disaster resulting from two things, formalism and jealousy. His professed obediance and allegiance were lacking in reality as this attitude shows.

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

TOPIC FOR APRIL 29.

The Reward of the Faithful. Rev. 21:1-8; 22:14.

"Writers of Utopias," says Bonar, "from Plato to More, and from Rousseau to Ruskin, have always adopted one simple plan: they have struck out the salient enormities of their own time and inserted the opposite, as when men imagine heaven they think of their dear native country with its discomforts left out." Henry Ward Beecher wrote: "Heaven is a place of ceaseless activity, the abode of never-tiring thought. David and Isaiah will sweep nobler and loftier strains in eternity, and the minds of the saints, unclogged by cumbersome clay, will forever feast on the banquet of rich and glorious thought." It was the belief of Theodore Parker that "the joys of heaven will begin as soon as we attain the character of heaven and do its duties. Try that and prove its truth. As much goodness and piety, so much heaven."

A NEW SOCIAL ORDER.

The faithful of all ages and countries unite in protesting against political, ecclesiastical, and industrial combinations that give to the few the privilege of robbing the many. They also protest against the rule of the mob, the rule of ignorance and passion. The God to whom they cry for justice will show himself in social arrangements that exhibit justice and kindness to all. The tyranny of creed and custom will disappear and knowledge will govern in the realm of conduct. The arrogance of power will cease to torture weakness. Foolish rivalries of persons, classes, and races will give place to the spirit of co-operation and good will. Golden streets and walls of jasper are symbols of the ideal society. The absence of a temple proclaims the democracy of religion. The gates of the city are always open to receive all who come for refuge from disorder and wrong. Fear will not be a motive to obedience, for the ruler of the city has no private ends to serve.

THE TRIUMPH OF LIFE.

The great reward of a good life is more life. The good man is not seeking as a reward of virtue the accessories of living. He seeks these as a means of living more abundantly. A farmer was discussing the teachers in the university of his state. He seemed to think they did not amount to much because they were not accumulating property. Croesus thought he was a happy man because he was very rich, but Solon connected happiness with virtue. A teacher may have a more abundant life than the farmer who adds farm to farm and increases his flocks and herds. Neither knowledge nor lands insure a life that is worthy of man. Both may be means to the freedom and joy of virtue.

THE CLEAN ROBE.

Each individual has something to do with cleaning his robe. Conditions are not the sole consideration for the student of character. No form of government can make men free who are slaves by nature and choice. Heaven has no joy for the evil-minded. The schools cannot educate those who do not wish to think correctly and to act consistently. The worth of the individual will be respected and honored in heaven. The accidents of success will not be mistaken for success itself. It will not be necessary to employ an advertising manager in order to have the achievements of good men recognized. There will be no danger that institutions will encroach upon the rights of persons. The principle contained in the words, "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath," will be exemplified in its fulness. The liar will not be present to prove that good is bad. The robe of righteousness will vindicate the wearer.

Rev. 7:13-15; Ps. 16:11; 17:15; 24:3-4; Matt. 5:3, 8, 12; 19:21; Col. 3:4; Heb. 11:10, 13:14; Rev. 2:7, 3:21; Lu. 19:30; I Tim. 4:8, 6:12; John 5:20.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

THE recent appointment by President Hill M. was not very popular among the ministers. But do you remember how he had two or three little scrapes with the politicians of his time? It is an interesting story; and in time we will read about it. But he had some friends, Mr. and Mrs. Ahikam, and a kind-hearted old darkey, and several other people were good to him. Do you wish to know about them? I will tell you in a week or two; but if you grow impatient you need not wait, you can find out all about it in the Bible.

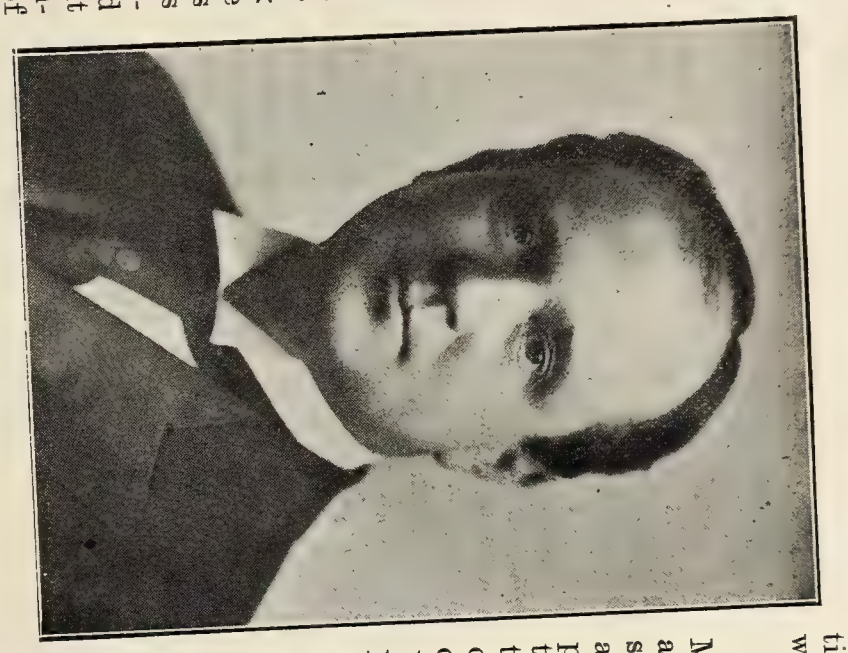
There is no man among the Disciples better fitted to speak of the possibilities of frontier religious work than Mr. Rice. For many years he has served as pastor at El Paso, Tex. His message is especially timely because of the present tense conditions in Mexico. Mr. Rice's paper is sent us by the American Society, looking forward to the Home Mission offering in May.

BY P. J. RICE.

ONLY those who have lived in what are styled frontier regions can appreciate their importance from the standpoint of missions. To such the need of a comprehensive statesman-like religious propaganda becomes imperative. There are not only immediate needs to be met, but there arise before one's vision the larger needs growing out of the rapid development of the country.

Speaking particularly, there is the vast region of the southwest comprising the states of Oklahoma, Texas, New Mexico and Arizona still in the morning of its development. It is impossible to realize what changes are taking place. People are migrating to these regions more rapidly than ever before. The government is spending many millions of dollars in its various reclamation projects which, when completed, will cause the desert in numerous places to blossom as the rose. For example, there is the Roosevelt dam which stores up 1,284,000 acre-feet of water in the Salt river valley and provides water for the irrigation of 240,000 acres of hitherto barren land that becomes at once wonderfully productive. The Elephant Butte dam, now in the process of construction, will back up the waters of the Rio Grande in a lake that will cover 40,000 acres. When this is completed it will irrigate 185,000 acres of as fertile land as can be found anywhere. Only small portions of this land have hitherto been under cultivation, but in view of completion of the dam, within the next year or two, vast tracts of it are being cleared and leveled ready for cultivation. Under these projects the government regulates the acreage which may be held by a single individual. In the Rio Grande valley no one is to be allowed more than forty acres even this small hundreds of instances calling settlers from the states. Because of the not alone in agriculture, and cattle raising, this astir with life. The and push is present cities and towns and the country white people.



P. J. Rice, pastor of First Christian Church, El Paso, Texas.

MEN ARE NEEDED.

In the territory embraced by the New Mexico—West Texas Christian Missionary Society, an area of about 135,000 square miles, larger than Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky combined, there is now a population of more than four hundred thousand souls. Within this territory the Disciples have four self-sustaining churches and twenty-four missions, some of which are very weak and others of which give promise of becoming independent in the near future. We have sixteen men, including pastors of self-sustaining churches, at work, many of whom are undertaking the oversight of an important mission in one of the larger centers, and also of from two to four outlying missions. The crying need is men. There should, for instance, be at least one extra man placed in the Rio Grande Valley as a missionary to open new fields and sustain work already begun. This week a church is being organized at Mesilla Park, the site of the New Mexico State College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts. We have no man to enterprises where artesian water may be found and where shallow water may be pumped upon the soil, all of which are inviting the investment of capital and settlers from the east and central states. Because of the vast possibilities, but in mining whole region is spirit of enterprise everywhere. The are all growing rapidly in many sections are being settled by enterprising

Mr. Holt is a humble, devoted, Christian man. For many years he has been the wise, patient, helpful chairman of the official board at Redlands, Cal. In this capacity, William Bayard Craig, his pastor, who furnished data for this sketch, speaks of him as, "Never dictatorial, always kind, and considerate. He helps generously and willingly in financial matters but insists that everyone able to do so should bear some part in the support of the church."

Walking home one day from a service in which the pastor had presented a very high ideal of prayer, Mr. Holt remarked: "Many of my business friends would not understand it, but I know I could never have got through with the Imperial Valley enterprise without my faith in prayer."

Mrs. Holt deserves a full share of the credit for her husband's success. She was a steady, patient, helpful partner in all the early hardships. Two daughters, charming, sensible, highly cultured girls, complete a family perfectly united in taste and judgment. Somewhat reserved and undemonstrative, without ostentation, they live in a beautiful home in Redlands, in quiet elegance and are loved as the truest, best friends one could have.

Mr. Holt brings the same sagacity and pertinacity to his benevolences that make him one of the prominent business men of California.

Czar Favors Temperance.

In the interest of temperance the Czar has ordered abolished a long-standing custom of army commanders, "raising a cup" to the health of the Czar and the imperial family in front of their troops at the close of parades and maneuvers.

the level of the surface of the river and below the level of the sea. The whole section was a howling desert in 1900. It was a sun-scorched, sand-blown, dreary waste of adobe ridges and hummocks, with scattered bunches of hardy desert vegetation that managed to survive the summer aridity and torridity of the region. It was known to a few daring investigators that water might be brought from the Colorado river to Imperial Valley but the enterprise was so beset with difficulties that it seemed impracticable to interest men with money in the vast undertaking.

EARLY HARDSHIPS.

Mr. Holt came to the Valley in 1900. He had known hardships as a farmer's boy in earlier life; had trying experience in business life; had valuable and successful experience in banking; had made money; was thirty-six years old. Imperial Valley appealed to him. Colorado river water poured on these thirsty acres would bring under the plough the largest body of irrigated land in one district in all America, and the unleached soil and hot sun would make the valley of the Colorado as far famed for fertility as the oft sung valley of the Nile. Mr. Holt saw immense possibilities. He saw the desert changed to a garden. He saw the valley teeming with a large population of prosperous farmers: he saw thriving towns; he saw railways, power houses, electric lights, telephone lines, hotels, ice-plants, churches, banks, stores, and all the modern equipment and luxury of up-to-date civilization. Unlike promoters generally, he did not spend his time and strength trying to coax other men to start these things in Imperial Valley. He started whatever seemed necessary himself and offered investors an opportunity to go in with him in a demonstrated success.

The valley now contains a population of about 35,000 that is increasing by leaps and bounds. The splendid dream other enterprises that largely cover the human needs of all the towns and ranches in this new Eldorado.

Between the dream and the reality there is a story of fortitude as heroic and fascinating as anything in the history of the great West. Few men could have endured the hardships of the pre-railroad days, the sand, the wind, the dust, the drouth, the bad roads, the meagre supplies, etc., but all this was as nothing compared with the mental and nerve racking worry incident to the organization of so many necessary enterprises. He had to raise the needed money, to meet maturing obligations, to fight and overcome unscrupulous opposition, to man his many banks, to find managers for his hotels and newspapers; to welcome and help the newcomers; to put backbone into the faltering; to weather the storm of adverse conditions; to face and solve problems for which there was no precedent to guide, or example to inspire; to meet undaunted the destructive breaking in of the Colorado river when it threatened to make a vast inland lake of the whole valley; to be a

Jeremiah and the "Dead Line"

Light from Ancient History on a Modern Problem.

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

THERE comes a time in the career of a minister when he would put some of his sermons into print. That happened to the Rev. Dr. Jeremiah. It came when he approached the dead line of fifty. He had become so unpopular that his congregation was always disappointed to see him in his own pulpit, and preferred the visit of the secretary of one of the missionary societies. He probably was not in arrears for board, but he had left his boarding house, and was living in the home of a certain Mr. Ahikam, whose friendship he sorely needed and greatly prized. I should like to build a monument to Mr. Ahikam.

A CHECKERED CAREER.

Rev. Mr. Jeremiah had come to what seemed the close of a strenuous and checkered career. He was in the neighborhood of "the dead line of 50," and had been preaching for something like a quarter of a century. For twelve years following Josiah's reformation and ending with his defeat and death in the battle of Megiddo, his work went forward prosperously. Doubtless we have exaggerated in our own mind the scope of the reformation of Josiah. Indeed, a pathetic fact about the two great reformations under Hezekiah and Josiah is that the sermons of Isaiah and Jeremiah reflect so little of the joyful confidence of the historian. To the recorders of the events in the Kings and Chronicles it seemed as though the two reformations had been almost complete. One might have thought they were little harbingers of the millennium, but the sermons of Isaiah in Hezekiah's time, and the sermons of Jeremiah in Josiah's day reflect the cares of faithful ministers who knew too well the hollowness of such seeming good. The great revival under Josiah was pitifully short-lived and brought its sad reaction. In a little time the king was defeated and slain and his religious policy reversed. The historian of the Kings has a harsh stereotyped verdict on the three months' reign of Jehoahaz—"He did evil in the sight of the Lord" (II Kings, 23:30-32). But Jeremiah uttered no word of commendation, merely declaring that the king would never return from his captivity, while Ezekiel mourns for him as for a lost hero (Jeremiah 23: 10-12, and Ezekiel 19:3-4). Jehoahaz went into exile in Egypt at the end of a three months' reign in which his so-called wickedness probably consisted in conniving at some plot to throw off the yoke of Egypt, or some ill-advised attempt to regain a hopeless independence.

JEREMIAH'S POPULARITY DIMINISHES.

Under his brother and successor, Jehoiakim, Jeremiah suffered a constant decline of court favor. Though he still was held in some awe by men in authority, his situation grew exceedingly more uncomfortable. From time to time he appeared and spoke; and on one notable occasion when Jerusalem was full of visitors from all over the country attending upon some feast, he seized the occasion to preach a notable sermon which nearly resulted in his death.

"Now it came to pass, when Jeremiah had made an end of speaking all that the Lord had commanded him to speak unto all the people, that the priests and the prophets and all the people took him, saying, "Thou shalt surely die."

This we are told occurred in the early part of the reign of Jehoiakim. For some time thereafter he appears not to have dared to show himself in public, but to have found protection in the home of a prominent man, Ahikam, the son of Shaphan. The king Jehoiakim did not quite dare to put Jeremiah to death, but he did the contemptible and cowardly thing of hunting down one of his disciples who had prophesied "according to all that Jeremiah had said," following him even to Egypt and bringing him back and killing him. This contemptible and murderous act, this assassin of Jeremiah by proxy, called forth from Jeremiah a mighty denunciation of the king. Only the good offices of Ahikam saved Jeremiah from death.

Jehoiakim had now been reigning four years and they had been years of increasing unhappiness for the prophet. He had been effectually silenced; he was deprived of his pulpit. He had been preaching a quarter of a century, and his work seemed to have no future. He was a lonely man, unmarried and childless, depending for protection and for daily bread upon the courtesy of friends. He had reached that middle period in his ministry which many a minister of the Gospel dreads, when his whole quarter century of preaching seems to have gone for nothing, and he was without a pulpit and with no probable future for his work.

REV. DR. JEREMIAH, PREACHER AND AUTHOR.

Shut away from his congregation he bethought himself of a way to reach the people. His friend and younger prophet, Baruch, visited him frequently in his retirement and to him Jeremiah dictated an epitome of all his preaching, and Baruch wrote it down.

The writing must have occupied ten or twelve months, for the writing began in the fourth year of Jehoiakim and it was the ninth month of the fifth year when it was published. The two prophets sought a favorable time for its publication. Jeremiah apparently intended to read the book to the multitude, but when the time came he could not go. The Authorized Version says, "And Jeremiah commanded Baruch, saying, I am shut up and cannot go into the house of the Lord. Therefore go thou and read in the roll."

The words "shut up" do not seem to imply that he was in prison. Perhaps Ahikam warned him that it would be unsafe for him to go to the Temple. At any rate Baruch went in his stead, but read less publicly than the prophet had intended. He sat "at the entry of the new gate of the Lord's house," but read less to the crowd gathered outside than to a small group of influential men assembled "in the chamber of Gemariah, the son of Shaphan, the scribe in the higher court." Gemariah was apparently a brother of Ahikam and Baruch arranged the reading in a place where he felt safe. Gemariah himself, however, was not present, but his son Michaiah was there and heard the reading, and was much impressed by it. He went to the palace, where he found his father and told him what was happening in his room at the Temple. The word spread to other influential men and they sent one of their number, Jehudi, to procure this message from Jeremiah. There was an eager gathering of the influential men. Then they sent a quiet message to Jeremiah and Baruch to get out of town as quickly as they could while they took the book and read it to the king.

The time was winter, and the king sat by an open brazier warming himself by a fire of charcoal. He listened to the reading of the opening portions of the book with a sense of growing impatience. Then he snatched the roll from the hand of Jehudi, read a sentence here and another there, slashing the manuscript with his pen-knife as he read, and then, notwithstanding the protests of the men who had borrowed the volume, he threw it into the fire and burned it in their presence.

THE SECOND EDITION.

Thus did a wicked, foolish king destroy the first edition of the written prophesy of Jeremiah. But Jeremiah and Baruch, hiding for their lives, set themselves to work again while their indignation was still hot. They straightway wrote another book and much larger than the first. Secretly it passed from hand to hand and copies of it were quietly made. The people of Jerusalem read it with awed foreboding. From time to time the prophet added to it other messages. He never found time to bring the whole book into chronological order, or systematic arrangement, but he wrote his messages and saw to it that they were preserved. The very secrecy with which the circulation was attended made the preservation more sure, and thus it came to pass that the sermons of Jeremiah were written and preserved. Had the prophet been permitted his liberty of utterance he perhaps never would have written his sermons at all. Had the king received the book and treated it with courtesy it might merely have been stored in the palace archives and never have gone any farther. The very means taken to prevent it and destroy it, produced the book in the beginning, enlarged it in its second edition, caused it to receive a whole series of appended prophesies in the years that followed, and finally secured its preservation to posterity.

JEREMIAH "CAME BACK."

The world has often seen examples like to this. Truth is promoted by the very means through which men seek to thwart it. The burning of one book is the occasion for the publication of a larger utterance of God's truth. The crucifixion is a means to the resurrection. Life rises from the dead; the cause upon the altar rises again like the Phœnix from its ashes. Truth is indestructible, right is unconquerable, the cause of God is in the world to last. The opposition of kings and the hostility of time-serving priests tends only to the perpetuity of the good which they oppose.

We have noticed that Doctor Jeremiah was not very popular among the ministers. But do you remember how he had two or three little scrapes with the politicians of his time? It is an interesting story; and in time we will read about it. But he had some friends, Mr. and Mrs. Ahikam, and a kind-hearted old darkey, and several other people were good to him. Do you wish to know about them? I will tell you in a week or two; but if you grow impatient you need not wait, you can find out all about it in the Bible.

The Hymnody of Evangelism

H. A. SMITH, IN THE CHICAGO THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY REGISTER.

It is an interesting fact that the typical evangelistic hymn came not from the Methodist revivals of the middle of the eighteenth century, with the Wesleys as chief singers, but rather from the Church of England under the inspiration of a woman hymn writer and her crowning hymn, "Just As I Am Without One Plea." Many Wesley hymns were objective, stolid and combative, written in an age of tremendous religious upheaval, when hymn singing meant outshouting a rival band or a roistering crowd of tin can serenaders, when "Ye servants of God, your Master proclaim," was used to break new ground, a forerunner of the Word itself, a two-edged sword in church controversy.

The lay evangelism of the last half of the nineteenth century produced the so-called "Gospel Hymns," hymns of repentance and the call of the Christ, songs of surrender and consecration. Look at this list:

Charlotte Elliot—"Just As I Am."

Frances Havergal—"Take My Life and Let It Be."

Cecil Alexander—"Jesus Calls Us O'er the Tumult."

P. P. Bliss—"Let the Lower Lights Be Burning."

Annie Hawks—"I Need Thee Every Hour."

Fanny Crosby—"Jesus, Keep Me Near the Cross."

Elizabeth Clephane—"There Were Ninety and Nine."

ARE GOSPEL SONGS HYMNS?

Someone has raised the question: Is the Gospel Song a true hymn? A hymn, according to St. Augustine and all church men since his day, is a poem in praise or prayer to God, to be sung in public assembly, by all the people. God himself is the ultimate objective point, not some hearer, some sinner, as in "Why Do You Tarry, My Brother?" And this brings us to the seeming weakness of our present day hymn singing. It is morbid, introspective, spineless. There is too much stock taking of sins, too much turning of the eyes inward. Let us rather look up to God in hymns of praise and look out to man in hymns of fellowship. The old responsive readings were too largely of the penitential sort, meditations of an intimate nature, not outstanding festal Psalms and selected doxologies and votive songs. Let the note of praise, of trust, of ultimate triumph ring strong and true in all public worship, in the hymn singing, in the Bible readings, in the prayers.

Gospel hymns have come to stay; they have a distinct mission in winning lives to Christ. Some are strong and reasonable, both as to words and music, and there is the ubiquitous "refrain" that will swing them into popularity everywhere. However, as a class they are unsuited to a growing church, for they deal with one phase only of Christian experience, namely, conversion, or they whisk one away to heaven. There is no intermediate ground, no growth in the graces of the spirit, no unfolding life.

Are you, my reader, using a book in your church service, left by some good evangelist after his series of meetings, using it for the nurturing of your young converts, when they ought to be getting better food? And shame on the irreverent spirit of the "hippity hop" hymn tune. On a recent Sabbath in one of our prominent Bible schools the boys and girls were stepping off the "tango" to the rhythm of the last hymn. Beware of the gusto with which children sing certain catchy tunes, or the enthusiasm that pervades great audiences in the singing of certain revival hymns. Little of it is spiritual rapture, it is mere physical exhilaration. It is often said that the mission of congregational singing is to have everybody sing and sing heartily, and yet hundreds of "enraptured souls" sing popular hymns without the slightest thought of worship.

Both hymns and hymn tunes are too full of cheap sentiment these days. They are sugary; they are disgustingly familiar. They treat sacred subjects with callous intimacy. I have heard great audiences sing "I Love Him, I Love Him," to the tune of "Old Black Joe," until I could stand it no longer, and I marched my choir children out of hearing of such languishing, con amore singing. Go slow on the hymns you announce as your evangel. Read carefully through every hymn you propose using in Sunday-school or church. See that it does not overstate the case. And if there are fragile hymns of intensive make-up that are favorites, take them to the quiet of your own chamber as meditation and prayers, do not parade them in public assembly. "O Jesus, Thou Art Standing," belongs anywhere else than at the beginning of an evening service, when late comers are tramping in, when there is confusion, and when the atmosphere of worship is still in the forming. Some hymns are good square timbers, made to "rough it" and "fill in" until the "babble of life's angry voices dies in hushed stillness," and one stands in the presence of God himself.

THE GREATNESS OF THE INDWELLING CHRIST.

From British Weekly.

Surely much of the weakness of the church today comes of Christ being unhoused within it. In the midst of search for "origins" and the clash of discussions about "documents," he has to remain outside the door, knocking. Perhaps when a slight lull in the debate comes, we shall hear his pleading and open the door. Would it not be wiser and more helpful to let him in first? May it not be even yet that the Guest is the best Interpreter of himself? If the church makes sure of him, it can go on doing its work, allowing endless questions to answer one another. The only Christ of value to me, as one of the early fathers expressed it, is "my Christ."

"Plenteous grace with thee is found, Grace to cover all my sin;"

—so far, we may sing the hymn, as though we were adoring a Saviour from without; but when we proceed to pray,

"Let the healing streams abound,
Make and keep me pure within,"

we are speaking personally to the Saviour within. And here the church of today is to find its renewal, and overcoming strength. Let her make more room for him, and she will at the same time make room for the children, and for the weary thousands, for the legion in many Christian lands that are lost. When he is living in the church, she can not help repeating his universal word—Come!

Many souls are concerned and perplexed about the second advent of Christ; others ignore it altogether. But may not all faithful hearts meet here? That Christ is working in his church today? Then let him come again as he will and when he will. Were he to appear visibly tomorrow in the sky, if he be not in my heart, he would be nothing to me—but my doom! But if he be in my heart, I have all I need. Whatever else he may some day bring with him, well and good; but

"Thou, O Christ, art all I want."

This is the sense of Christ which can make the church, whenever she vitally possesses it, "greater than he that is in the world." John does not simply say "stronger," but "greater." It is the greatness of Christ that makes the victory of the church and of each surrendered soul. Were he less great, how could he make his dwelling-place in such a lowly home as a sinner's heart! But because he is great, he makes every soul he inhabits great also. "When he shall appear, we shall be like him." That satisfied John, and it satisfies us.

INDUSTRIAL HYGIENE.

Poultry raisers have found that overcrowding chickens in a coop decreases the production of eggs. Best returns require chicken houses built to provide ample sunlight and good ventilation. Cleanliness is an important factor in good business management. Modern poultry yards are models of good sanitary manufacturing plants. Successful dairymen insure the lives and productiveness of their dairy animals by careful and intelligent attention to heat, food, ventilation, and adequate sunlig

Efficiency engineers, studying factory management, have reached similar conclusions on the productiveness of human workmen, says the Living Church. Wise managers know that the physical surroundings and conditions of work tell in the product. They look upon the construction of modern sanitary shops as a necessity of "good business." There are still too many of the other type of managers who look upon business success or failure as a matter of luck. Their factories are overcrowded. The owners, in turn, help to over-crowd the bankruptcy courts.

Good home management demands as much attention to principles of hygiene as must be given in care of poultry and cattle. Anyone whose own eyes have been opened can answer whether or not it is being given. School houses are the work shops of a considerable proportion of the population of this country. These young workmen have rights. It's bad business to handicap their efforts.

Stuffy interiors lead to headache, to drowsiness, and to nervousness. Is it to be expected that good work will be done against these handicaps? Competition is such nowadays that to secure success every bit of energy needs to be properly directed. Nobody with a sore thumb is going to strike as hard a blow as though his hands were strong. Clerks, factory employees, and children in school simply won't buck aching heads against knotty problems. You don't, and I don't. Isn't it foolish to think that those who work for us will?

The heart leaps up in these renewals of the spring. Then all growth toward perfection seems possible to man. So God reminds us of his renewing power that waits to help us toward success in every high aspiration of our growing souls.—

DANIEL S. FORD'S FAVORITE POEM.

It is said that the following poem was found in the desk of Mr. Daniel S. Ford, the proprietor of The Youth's Companion, after his death. The sentiment of the poem was illustrated in Mr. Ford's life. His name is a synonym for generosity and far-sighted wisdom.

Here is the poem:

"The bread that giveth strength I want to give;
The water pure that bids the thirsty live;
I want to help the fainting day by day;
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give the oil of joy for tears,
The faith to conquer cruel doubts and fears,
Beauty for ashes may I give alway:
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give good measure running o'er,
And into angry hearts I want to pour
The answer soft that turneth wrath away:
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give to others hope and faith;
I want to do all that the Master saith;
I want to live aright from day to day:
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way."

IF YOU HAD A MILLION DOLLARS.

From American Magazine.

"Most people know just what they would do with a million dollars and I am no exception. So if you really want to know what I would do with so much money, I can tell you just as easy:

"I'd do as I pleased!

"I am just a little woman of forty who has spent all her life pleasing other people. As far back as I can remember, I have always had to stand between somebody and something disagreeable, or between two somebodies, or maybe it has been three or four somebodies I've had to distribute myself among. For somebody's sake, I have lived in towns I hated. I have let myself be squeezed into tight places, for other people. And then again, I've been called upon to puff out my small body, figurately speaking, to fill situations quite too big. I have not complained nor appeared unhappy. People always say it is my 'nature' to be unselfish, but is just isn't! So there! Way down in my heart or far in the back of my brain I've rebelled!"

A TOILERS' PRAYER.

Here is a beautiful little prayer which comes from Grace Church, New York:

"A PRAYER FOR PEOPLE WHO TOIL.

"Almighty God, who in thy love ever toilest for me in making this world my home, and who didst send thy Son to labor with his hands among the children of men; Grant that I may know the dignity of honest work. When I am weary, comfort me with the remembrance that I have not shirked. When I am ill rewarded, keep far from me selfishness and bitterness, and give to me sympathy with all who suffer wrong, that for their sakes I may plead in thy Name for justice and love among all classes of men. And when night cometh, if I have done my duty, let me not be anxious for the morrow, because thou art my Father and wilt keep me and those whom I love in perfect peace; through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen."

MORE WOMEN LAWYERS.

The number of women lawyers in New York City is steadily increasing. The Women Lawyers' Club has now changed its name to the Women Lawyers' Association, to signify its growing national and international scope. As is often the case with men lawyers women are drawn into other work in which they have become interested through law. Miss Elinor Burns is an example of this; she is now the press chairman of the National Womans' Suffrage Association. Almost all women lawyers in New York, say the Evening Post, are also suffragists. The law seems a natural profession for women and one which needs the insight, the mercifulness and the love of truth of women to keep it sane and normal. Another branch of this profession has just, for the first time, been entered by a woman, with the appointment of Miss Henrietta Hoegh, a Norwegian, twenty-seven years old, who is to be the first secretary at the Norwegian legation in Mexico. This position is an outgrowth of her study of political economy and international law, in which she passed examinations two years ago. She is the first women to take diplomacy as a career.

Our Readers Opinions

OWNERSHIP OR TRUSTEESHIP?

For some years I have heard speakers in the interest of missions, philanthropies, education, and other causes, appeal to the conscience of men on the ground of "stewardship." I have also seen the same expression in our religious papers, in books, and tracts upon the subjects of giving. The Christian is said to be a "steward."

I have been wondering just what speakers and writers really mean by this term "stewardship." What content is put in the word as it is popularly used to quicken the conscience of the people who have means at their command?

The context and setting in which we find this word often fail to throw very much light upon its meaning. Yet, now and then, we find the plea is substantiated by such quotations from the scripture as the following: "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof," or, "the cattle upon a thousand hills are the Lord's," "every good and perfect gift cometh from above," etc.

The word "stewardship" was coined in those days when men of wealth owned and controlled great estates, but did not manage them. They placed one over the estate to take charge, direct the herding and the agriculture, and to collect the rents. He was called a "steward." If we were to choose a word that would act as an equivalent in the light of our modern life, we would call him a "trustee."

If this is the sense in which the Christian is a steward we have in it a more radical plea for funds than most of us are aware; for a trustee does not own, he merely manages, just like the trustees of our church buildings. They have no right to put a mortgage upon the church property. They can only do this when the congregation has taken action provided by law; for the property belongs to the congregation, and is only held in trust by the trustees.

Is this what is meant by our modern users of the term "steward?" Do they mean that men of wealth do not own their property, that it belongs to God, and that they but hold it in trust for the use of all? If this is so, the doctrine of stewardship is getting very close to Old Testament teaching and custom. It ought to draw larger gifts than it does. It ought not to require many days to extract the six million dollars for God's work from the tremendous wealth held in trust by our people, but belonging to God.

Is the earth and the fullness thereof still the Lord's? Are the cattle upon a thousand hills his? Are we just holding them in trust for his people? If so, six million dollars for his divine service should stagger no one.

Massillon, O. H. Erwin Stafford.

WARNING!

"A cigarette in the mouth of every man woman, and child in China" is the watchword of one of the big Anglo-American tobacco companies. When the Christians held their first service at the Altar of Heaven in Peking, agents of the tobacco companies were selling cigarettes at the same place.

LIFE.

Paint thy canvass, sing thy own soul's song,
Build thy house, or right some bitter wrong.
Make a poem—as thy heart shall lead—
But work as unto God, then great thy deed!

Anna Robinson Watson.

The New Eden

By Thomas Curtis Clark.

WHEN every child shall through his native gift
Be truthward led, along the ways of joy;
When every man shall at his labor lift
Hand, head and heart to God, who gave employ;

When everyone an artist-soul shall be,
At forge or easel, at the desk or loom,
Then through his task shall every man be free
And none shall toil as captive to his doom.

Cities shall then become the shrines of art;
Towns, gardens all, shall blossom as the May;
Laughter shall thrive, of every life a part;
And rest await each man at close of day.

Then shall be born the kingdom of the blest;
Then in all hearts shall love exalted be;
Then God once more shall see his garden drest
With flower and fruit, and every pleasant tree.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

EDITORIAL

THE COMMISSION'S DUTY.

THE most serious departure from the faith once for all delivered to the saints yet reported." These are the words of The Christian Evangelist in comment upon the radical abandonment of Disciples' principles by the Phillips Bible Institute at Canton, O. The article is entitled "Forsaking the Old Paths," and is in every way deserving of praise for its firm and vigorous treatment of a flagrant outrage upon our people's conscience. The sentence succeeding the one quoted above says: "The Campbell Institute men never dreamed of going so far as this." While The Christian Century is unable to see any possible parallel between this case anl anything the Campbell Institute men ever have done, yet, since they have been charged with so much mischief-making, we assume that the reference is to be interpreted as an indication of the editor's extreme judgment upon the Canton institution.

This judgment of Mr. R. A. Long's paper, The Christian Evangelist, is doubtless Mr. Long's personal judgment also. This being so, the brotherhood will earnestly wish to know whether he desires any portion of his great gift of one million dollars to the Men and Millions Movement to be appropriated to an institution whose constitution so radically violates Disciples' ideals.

His brethren also are asking whether it is his determination and that of the Commission of Business Men of which he is a member and the leading spirit, to continue the arrangement by which a fraction of every gift made to the general fund of the Men and Millions Movement is given to the Phillips Bible Institute. Whatever status in the Movement is allowed an institution that has departed from the "faith," it certainly ought not to be one which puts the brotherhood as a whole in a position where it is compelled to give money to it.

The Commission should take prompt action on this matter unless positive assurances have been given that the trustees of the Institute intend to thoroughly alter its constitution.

AN ADVOCATE INDEED.

A NEW paper of frank and unmistakable purpose has made its appearance among the churches of the Pacific Coast. It is named The Christian Union Advocate. Rev. H. J. Loken, pastor of Berkeley, Cal., Church of Disciples, is its editor. Associated with him are Rev. F. E. Boren, Rev. W. C. Crider and Rev. H. V. White. The Advocate has eight full pages and appears monthly. Back of it is the Christian Union League, an organization of more than 200 laymen, representing the churches of northern California, who believe it is the Disciples' duty to practice Christian unity as well as to talk about it. The bulk of the fund for the support of the paper is provided by this League, the small subscription rate of 50 cents a year not being sufficient, of course, to finance it.

We have just finished reading the third number of this paper. It grips. One might say that it bites. Its editors speak as if they felt firm ground beneath their feet. In temper the editorials possess what might be called a Campbellian tang.

On the problem of Christian union as defined by the fundamental principles of the Disciples the editors' thinking is as clear as daylight. They see plainly that to plead for Christian unity and to maintain a sectarian membership, a membership limited to those who happen to have been immersed at their baptism, is not only logically inconsistent but borders upon the immoral.

It is this insight that accounts for the passion and fervor with which these men write. They seem to have thought their problem through and they speak with the prophet's urgency.

If a word of counsel would not be unacceptable from an older and thoroughly sympathetic comrade, The Christian Century would suggest that the editors of the Advocate try to guard their utterances against the taint of acrimony and a slightly harsh use of personalities. It is important for those of us who are pleading for the more generous fellowship to remind ourselves continually that while our first campaign puts us in a position of opposition to some of our own Disciple comrades, yet in the greater campaign against the sectarian order itself—the whole denominational scheme of things—we confidently expect these now conservative and halting Disciples to be our comrades and, many of them, our leaders.

The historic mission of the Disciples is to be carried out not by "liberal" Disciples but by the whole body of the Disciples.

There must be no division in that body, unless it is a mere sloughing off of reactionaries and stragglers here and there who know not what manner of spirit animates this movement.

Let the discussion proceed, with no alteration of the policy of frankness and independence, without turning ever so slightly the sharp edge of our argument and plea, but with such consideration of the dignity and sincerity of those who differ from us that when the day is won they and we will feel comfortable side by side as comrades in the greater war.

This advice may seem gratuitous when offered to one who, as in the case of Mr. Loken, has demonstrated in his Berkeley church a high quality of leadership, carrying it through crises of the most precarious sort to success both spiritual and practical. Only our jealousy for the common ideal which we share with him and his co-workers, and for the development of a new order of journalism among us which shall be both brave and kind, prompts us to give expression to a caution which, after all, may be quite superfluous.

DOCTOR CLARK IN ITALY.

DR. FRANCIS E. CLARK, president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, is now in Italy on work connected with the Christian Endeavor propaganda. He reports that his health is very much improved, which will bring satisfaction to his friends everywhere. A little later he expects to go to Spain, France and the British National convention in London, returning to the United States in June. The reports regarding Christian Endeavor Week and Decision Day indicate that they were most successful, and that Christian Endeavor has a better outlook for success than at any previous time. The Fifth World's Convention, which is also the Twenty-second International Convention, will be held in Chicago in July of next year. The large number of people who will be coming from other lands for the Panama Exposition will make it a convention of great importance.

VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY.

A VERY important decision has just been rendered by the Supreme Court of the State of Tennessee. The case was brought against Chancellor Kirkland and the Trustees of Vanderbilt University at Nashville, by the Board of Bishops of the Southern Methodist Church, who claimed possession of the institution on the ground that it was founded by the Methodist denomination, and that its trustees were to be appointed by the General Conference. The President and the University authorities denied this claim, affirming that the institution was founded by Cornelius Vanderbilt, and that its Board of Trustees, or Regents, is a self-perpetuating board, a certain number of whose members are to be bishops of the Southern Methodist Church.

The case has run along for a number of years, most of the lower courts having rendered decisions in favor of the Board of Bishops. The highest court to which the case can be carried has now settled the matter in a manner highly satisfactory to the friends of higher education in the South. There is no disposition on the part of the Vanderbilt authorities to minimize the Christian and even Methodist character of the institution. What they deprecated and contested was the danger of allowing the university to fall into the management of a group of men actuated solely by denominational considerations.

The decision may result in diverting some of the Methodist patronage from Vanderbilt University, but this would be far less serious than its control by the bishops. These leaders of the denomination, relying upon previous court decisions, had already decided upon a policy of reaction, declined a million dollars offered by Mr. Carnegie to the medical school of the university, and were prepared to go still greater lengths in enforcing a sectarian policy. The decision of the Supreme Court of Tennessee is of far-reaching value to the cause of education.

WHERE SILENCE WAS GOLDEN.

REV. LESLIE W. MORGAN, editor of The Christian Monthly, the organ of the Disciples of Christ of England, reports an intimate conference between Dr. Peter Ainslie and a group of Disciple leaders on the occasion of his recent visit to that country in the interest of Christian union. Some inquiry was put forward as to the reason of Doctor Ainslie's consistent reticence, in his speeches, with respect to the existence of Disciples churches in Great Britain. It has been felt that his presence on the deputation from America would call interested attention to the modest congregations of his brethren already formed in England and bearing their testimony for the same ideal which he had come across the sea to proclaim.

Doctor Ainslie's explanation of his course of silence makes solemn reading for British Disciples, as it should also for their brethren on this side the water. We reprint a portion of the Monthly's editorial:

> One point came out in the course of our conversation that should cause serious thought. Dr. Ainslie mentioned that he had thought it wise not to make any reference to the fact that we had churches in this country! Without any thought of criticising this action, it reveals a serious state of things. It was not because our churches are few that Doctor Ainslie thought best not to mention them—he would be the last to be ashamed of small things—but it was because of his fear that the fact might come out that our forces were divided. He was here in the interests of Christian union, and while he was not here representing the Disciples of Christ or holding up our position as the basis of union, yet it would seem quite legitimate to suggest that if there were divisions amongst his own brethren his first work, and theirs, ought to be to endeavor to get together. Doctor Ainslie met both in Glasgow and in London representative men of the older English Churches of Disciples and did what he could to pave the way for the appointment of a joint commission between them and ourselves in connection with the World Conference on Faith and Order.

The saddest irony in the past hundred years is the historic fact that a great, broad, catholic movement for Christian unity, intended to embrace all Christians without discrimination, fell into a denominational pitfall, and practicing denominationalism suffered the fate of division to which every denomination is inherently liable.

Doctor Ainslie was wise in finding the materials of his address in the historic ideals of the Disciples rather than in the indifferent and more or less sorry attempts of his brethren to practice these ideals.

DOCTOR GULICK'S MISSION.

THE conferences that have been held by Rev. Sidney L. Gulick of Japan under the auspices of the Federal Council of Churches have proved of exceptional interest and value. As has been previously emphasized, Doctor Gulick comes on a peace errand to promote good relations between the United States and his adopted country of Japan. It is his desire to interpret the Japanese point of view, especially in those matters which have occasioned irritation and threatened international complications. The fact that Doctor Gulick has perhaps the foremost place among American missionaries in Japan gives his message special weight.

At a time when there have been serious differences of opinion between certain groups representing the two nations, and an apparently deliberate effort made to generate hard feelings between the two peoples and to involve them in war if possible, the work of a peace commissioner like Doctor Gulick cannot be overvalued.

The vast majority, both of Japanese and Americans, have only the best of feelings for each other, and wish in all respects to promote cordial social and trade relations.

On the other hand, a very small per cent of our people, particularly on the Pacific Coast, regard the Japanese with extreme disfavor for reasons which seem to them sufficient. And in Japan there is an equally small but none the less active group of narrow nationalists who are particularly fond of expressing their hatred of all foreigners and particularly Americans. Further, it must be remembered that there is always a strong force at work in favor of war among all the nations, at any time and on any pretext. Such sentiments are due to the military and adventurous spirit of which the army and navy are naturally the center, to the purely commercial interest of men and corporations engaged in the manufacture and sale of war equipment, and to the self-interest of money lending groups without whose assistance no war cloud could go on for a week.

The influences that stimulate warlike moods are far more active than those which promote peace. There is always the danger that the small but interested group of insular, aggressive and jingoistic agitators may produce an impression far beyond its merits. For this reason it is always well to have men of the type of President Eliot and Doctors Henderson and Willett visit the Orient and Doctor Gulick and his missionary colleagues visit America to interpret to each of these ends of the earth the real sentiment of the other.

WHAT THE "POOR HEATHEN" THINK.

SPEAKING of the absurdity and the sin of transplanting our western denominational systems to the foreign mission field, President Bowen, of the University of Nankin, says that the Southern Presbyterians have a church on the north side of Nanking and the Northern Presbyterians have located one on the south side of the same city. The "poor heathen," he declares, think these Christians are very ignorant folks not to know the points of the compass.

TO EVERY MAN HIS WORK.

THE division of labor is one of the essential elements in civilization. No race can advance far above a condition of savagery so long as every man must provide for all his own wants. Diversified activity, with specialization, is the fundamental condition upon which all skill depends. No man can be skilful in many kinds of work.

The organization of the church recognizes this inevitable condition of progress. Repeatedly the New Testament sets forth the necessity for diversified and interrelated work. A well-organized church requires a trained minister, who is a specialist in his department; trained singers and players on instruments of music; trained Sunday-school teachers; and other people of varied and diversified skill.

But there is a danger in specialization and in professional lines. It is, on the one hand, that the professionally-trained leaders will assume a monopoly of initiative, and on the other hand that all the other people will assume that there is nothing for them to do.

Better would it be that there should be no trained leaders than that their leadership should dispossess the entire church from its rightful and necessary work.

What is needed in every church is that every member shall find a sphere in which he can serve, and in that sphere labor with all his heart.

We have known people who have been members of the church for years who suddenly awoke to the opportunity presented by a specific task which they were able to perform, and who, taking up that task discovered a wholly new joy in their Christian life.

A College Revival Upon Us?

It looks that way, from a study of the results of student volunteer conferences and evangelistic visitations in various schools. John R. Mott and Sherwood Eddy's remarkable campaign among New York students has already been mentioned in this department. Sherwood Eddy is now visiting the universities on the Pacific Coast. with the result that seventy men decided for Christ at Leland Stanford, 140 at the University of California. The University of Washington and Oregon Agricultural College are reported to have seen 150 of their men accept Christ. The visit of "Billy" Sunday to the University of Pennsylvania is reported as "the nine days' wonder of the town." The most striking features of all these campaigns have been the crowds of students that have thronged these meetings, and the genuine interest manifested by the students in the question of their spiritual welfare.

Atlanta Church Throws Bomb.

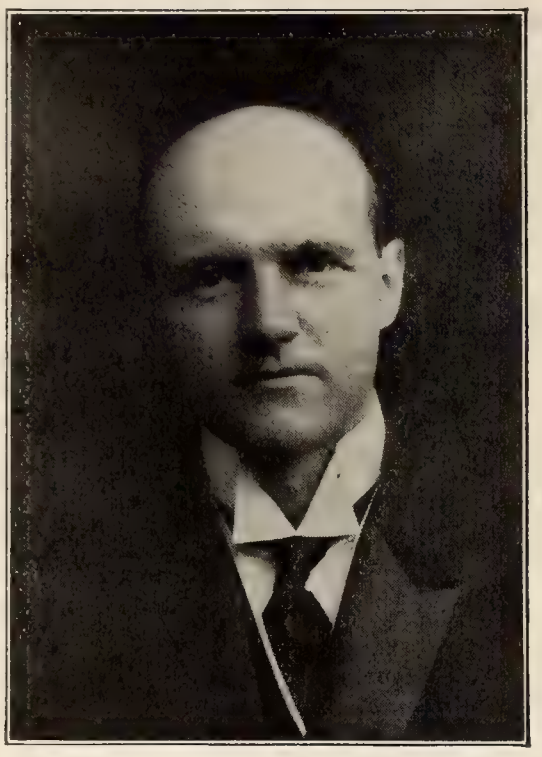
The Watchman-Examiner (Baptist) reports that a bombshell has been exploded by the First Baptist church, Atlanta, Georgia. Resolutions have been passed declaring it to be the sense of the church that church members should not be identified with social clubs which derive revenue for their maintenance from the sale of alcoholic beverages. The action of the church is arousing great interest, not only in Atlanta, but throughout the South. It is generally conceded, the Watchman asserts, that social and commercial clubs would have great difficulty in maintaining themselves were it not for the income from the buffets, and declares that without the sale of liquor at the clubs, the membership dues would be double what they are at present. The membership dues of a club are now $100 per year. If it were not for the sale of liquor in the club they would be $200 per year. Many of the church men of Atlanta, it is reported, are members of social and commercial clubs.

More About the Scottish Revivals.

Dr. W. H. Roberts, clerk of the Presbyterian General Assembly, reports with enthusiasm the results of the work of J. Wilbur Chapman and Charles Alexander in Scotland. For six months these evangelists have been conducting their campaign in this country, and with large results. At Glasgow was held the first meeting in October last, and there the campaign continued for eight weeks. The second series was held at Edinburgh from January 16 until the beginning of March. Then came three weeks more at Glasgow. Dr. Roberts says of the meetings in Edinburgh and Glasgow: "The general evangelistic meetings have been attended, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, with the largest success. The mission in Glasgow resulted in the professed conversion of more than 8,000 persons, and this number was largely increased by the second mission. In Edinburgh the meetings resulted in more than 10,000 conversions, and the limit of the results has not yet been reached."

Presbyterians' Plan for Pastoral Supply.

The general vacancy and supply committee of the Presbyterian Church has sent out to the presbyteries of the United States a "definite plan" which it is hoped will solve the twin problems of vacant pulpits and unemployed pastors. The Continent gives as "the nub of the committee's proposition" a complete transfer of the initiative in the pastor hunt from the pastorless congregation to a committee of three in the presbytery. This committee would look up possibilities and nominate a man to the pastorless church. There would be no constraint on the church's voice; it could refuse to call the man named if it didn't fancy him. Then the presbyterial committee would put forward another name. And of course all the while the congregation would have full liberty to consult with the presbyterial committeemen and represent its preferences. But, the Continent remarks, "it wouldn't be able to get by with any pastor that the presbyterian vacancy and supply committee hadn't approved." This paper says that this is a genuine Presbyterian plan; giving the presbyteries substance of power, not the mere name of it Many churches will object to the plan, it is predicted, but it is argued, these "Presbyterian principles at least deserve to be tried in their out-and-out reality before they are rejected."



Mr. Charles M. Alexander who, with Doctor Chapman, has been stirring Scotland.

Workingmen and the Church.

Charles Stelzle, labor leader, reproduces in the Outlook a summary of some facts recently brought out concerning the relation of workingmen to the church. This summary is the result of a study made by a Columbia University student. A thousand workingmen were included in the canvass made preparatory to this report. Some of the facts gleaned from the study are: That men with the longer workday attend church most regularly; married men attend more frequently than single men; the interest of the workingman increases as he grows older.

"Pastor" Russell Uses Movies.

"Pastor" Russell, now well-known for his fraudulent religious—so-called—teachings, may be a fraud, but one thing is sure, he is "strictly up to date." He now bobs up at the Auditorium, in Chicago, with moving pictures. By means of these he explains "scientifically" the creation of the world. The show is held under the auspices of the "International Bible Students' Association," which sounds good, at any rate, even if it is the creation of the clever "Pastor," who preaches as one of his leading doctrines that the year 1914 is the beginning of the "Millennial Dawn." We guarantee the fact that the venerable "Doctor" will postpone the "Dawn" until later if the box office receipts of this latest venture of his do not prove weighty enough.

What Does "Ardent" Mean Here?

The following is Cardinal Gibbons' statement of his stand—if it can be called a "stand"—on temperance: "While I am an ardent advocate of temperance, I am intuitively persuaded that prohibition cannot be enforced in this country. It is calculated to make hypocrites and lead to the manufacture of illicit whisky, replacing the good material with the bad and at the same time robbing the government of the legitimate tax."

Congregational Advance in China.

Some time ago an extraordinary offer was made by certain officials of the Province of Shansi promising coöperation with the Congregational Board in the conduct of public schools. The Prudential Committee of the American Board sent out an appeal for ten thousand dollars as a minimum sum which would warrant them in joining hands with the Chinese provincial government in this enterprise. The sum was to be used in the building of houses for the missionary families and other expenses connected with the beginnings of the work. The purpose is to place the government high school at Fenchow in the hands of the mission. This school serves a large population in that region. In addition the missionaries are to superintend the grade school work in that district. The government undertakes to furnish the buildings and make a grant of four thousand taels. There is to be entire freedom to teach the Bible and Christianity. It is reported that the ten thousand dollars has been more than subscribed by interested Congregationalists and the work is to begin at once.

Why Is the Church?

John Wanamaker, merchant prince and Sunday-school expert, made an address to the Pennsylvania Sunday-school Association the other day in which he commended the methods of Billy Sunday, and then offered this advice: "The church or Sunday-school that expects to meet success must deliver the goods the people want." The Chicago Evening Post, in an editorial reporting Mr. Wanamaker's statement, makes a remark and asks a question, as follows: "That, we admit, is wisdom from the standpoint of a shop or a theater box office, but what is to happen to the belief that the church is the repository of a divine revelation, of an authoritative message to men, if it is to adopt the policy of 'delivering the goods the people want?'"

Plans for Sunday-school Convention.

A parade of 50,000 men is being arranged for the International Sunday-school convention, in Chicago, June 23 to 30. A Sunday-school historical pageant, tracing the work from its beginnings, will be another feature. Five thousand delegates, representing every state and every province in Canada, will be present. The meetings are to be held in Medinah Temple. The announcem nts of the plans for the convention have just been made public by the Committee of One Hundred. The parade stand is to be erected at Grant Park and the parade is to be reviewed by Gov. Dunne, Mayor Harrison, and other notables. The committee has engaged the services of five national bands, and other bands will assist.

Little Interest in Presbyterian Union?

The United Presbyterian reports that there is apparently not much interest being taken in the proposed union between the United Presbyterians and the Southern Presbyterians—that is, if one may judge from the correspondence that has reached the office of that paper concerning the plan. "There has been surprisingly little discussion of the pending basis of union with the Southern Presbyterian Church up to the present time," states the editor. "Within a few recent days probably as many manuscripts have reached the editor's desk as came during all of the preceding part of the year. The fact may be interpreted in two ways—as indicating a growing distaste for controversial writing or as showing a lack of interest in the proposed union. There has been, so far as has been observed, the same kind of unresponsiveness and the like absence of championship of union in the papers of the Southern Church."

The "Essence" of the Baptist Spirit.

In an article printed in the Word and Way, Dr. W. C. Bitting, of Second Baptist Church, St. Louis, says: "These three things I think constitute the very essence of the Baptist spirit: the emphasis upon spiritual realities, the exaltation of personality and the dedication to service. Without them denominationalism is a sham and an obstacle to the Kingdom of God. With them brought to the front, emphasized and constantly lived, no body of Christians can contribute so powerfully to the coming of God's Kingdom as our Baptist brotherhood." The Central Christian Advocate (Methodist) remarks that "the key word is left out —Loyalty."

Chicago Church to Remain Downtown.

A few weeks ago announcement was made through an editorial in The Christian Century that Trinity Episcopal Church, a central downtown church was making an appeal to the city of Chicago to save this useful institution to the service of the city's spiritual life. The newspapers devoted columns to the exploitation of this good cause, and results, it seems, have followed, but not enough to insure the permanent existence of old Trinity. Rev. John McGann, rector of the church, announced on Easter day that the public responded to the appeal made with $30,400, which will keep the doors open for three years. Subscriptions, ranging from $1 to $3,000, given by working girls and persons of wealth from all over the city, went to maks up this sum, which is $400 more than the rector asked for. A meeting will be held May 11 to consider plans for raising an endowment fund sufficient to insure the church's permanent existence.

Christian Endeavor Day in India.

On Christian Endeavor Day four parties went out from Coimbatore, India, to conduct evangelistic meetings in surrounding towns and villages. In the evening they held four simultaneous street meetings in the city. In a day and a half these Endeavorers reached 1,635 adults and 270 children, delivering forty-eight addresses in fifteen places.

Ex-Choir Boy Endows Choir School.

Frederick G. Bourne, a wealthy manufacturer and capitalist, once a choir boy in Trinity Episcopal Church, New York City, has given $500,000 to the Cathedral of St. John the Divine for the endowment of the choir school. The gift was announced at the Easter service. Mr. Bourne's only condition was that he be elected a member of the cathedral choir. He was elected unanimously.

Dallas's "Go-to-Church" Sunday.

The next Sunday after Dallas, Tex., was put on the financial map of the nation by the placing of a National Reserve Bank in that city, Dallas churches made a record surpassing probably any previous record in this state. The Sunday following the announcement of that good news was "Go-to-Church" Sunday in Dallas, and it was estimated that 60,000 in Dallas went to church. From nearly every church in the city, people were turned away at the morning service.

Taught Sunday-school Eighty-one Years.

Mrs. Anna M. Bruen, said to be the oldest Sunday-school teacher in the country, held a reception March 24 at the home of her son, Rev. J. D. Bruen, pastor of First Presbyterian Church, Belvidere, N. J., in honor of her ninety-third birthday. She has taught Bible classes ever since she was 12 years old.

Literary Journal Adds Theology Feature.

The Atheneum, a literary journal, has just added to its contents a "theological supplement." We make several quotations from an introductory article on "The Task of Twentieth Century Theology:" "Revived interest in religion is a fact, and the number of notable books that are appearing indicate that more scholarly research than ever is taking place in the fields of theology and cognate subjects." "Every modern theologian ought to have a first-hand acquaintance with the popular novels and dramas of the day." "If theology becomes quickened with a genuine religious and social 'enthusiasm,' and shakes off the 'academic incubus,' it may have great and unexpected triumphs in the near future."

Y. M. C. A. Says "Go to Church."

Association Men, the Young Men's Christian Association's official magazine, devotes its April number to the discussion of church membership for association men. Notable articles appear from John R. Mott, Governor B. W. Hooper, Ralph Connor and William J. Bryan urging all association men to be church men.

For "Go-to-Church Sunday" Critics.

The best thing that has been said for the benefit of critics of the "Go-to-Church Sunday" campaigns was said by Ellis Parker Butler, author of "Pigs is Pigs." This usually hilarious personage remarks that even a man who detests the church ought to go to church once a year in order to make sure that the church hasn't mended the faults he has been complaining of!

Churches to Aid "Rest Day" Advocates.

The barbers of California want to rest on Sunday. The State Federation of Barbers has prepared a bill asking for a Sunday rest law, and, together with other branches of organized labor, is appealing to the churches to assist in the campaign. An effort is being made to obtain 31,000 signatures to the initiative petition in order that the question may be put on the ballot in November.

Brotherhood as "Big Brothers."

The ninth birthday of the first chapter of the Presbyterian Brotherhood, at Norwood, Cincinnati, will be celebrated in June. At the recent annual "April Feast," the most significant feature was the fact that over forty "youngsters" were in attendance as guests of their "big brothers." Each boy had a man next to him at dinner. Here is a suggestion for the Disciples Brotherhood.

Tacoma Holds Inter-Church Banquet.

The First Congregational Church Brotherhood of Tacoma, Wash., recently invited the pastors of the other churches of the city, with five laymen from each congregation, to a banquet. Representatives from the various churches gave addresses.

W. E. Biederwolf at Ironton, Ohio.

What is reported to be "the greatest demonstration the city of Ironton has ever seen, and the greatest in the history of Evangelist W. E. Biederwolf's career," took place at Ironton, Ohio, April 4. This was a monster parade of the Sunday-schools of the churches participating in the union meeting now being conducted in the Ohio city. Following the parade, a meeting was held, at which 265 youths accepted Christ.

Religious Persecution Still With Us.

A Baptist minister who was to deliver an address in Denver upon the Roman Catholic priesthood was captured by a mob of adherents of that church, spirited miles away, beaten and cast by the roadside, where he was afterward found and removed to a hospital more dead than alive.

Of Human Interest

Elihu Root as a Boy.

A recent writer gives a glimpse of Elihu Root's boyhood that is worth knowing. When he was a boy in the grammer-school at Clinton, New York, he made up his mind that anything that he had to study he would keep at until he mastered it. Sometimes the other boys called him a "plodder," but Elihu would only smile pleasantly, for he knew what he was about. On winter evenings, while the other boys were out skating, Elihu frequently remained in his room with his algebra or arithmetic. Mr. Root recently said that if his close application to problems in his boyhood did nothing else for him, it made him careful about jumping at conclusions. To every problem there was only one answer, and patience was the price to be paid for it.

Carrying the principle of "doing everything to a finish" into the law, he became one of the most noted members of the New York bar, entrusted with vast interests, and then a member of the President's cabinet.

George Westinghouse, Inventor.

The death of George Westinghouse removes one of the great inventors of the world. He was a man who had no love for the spectacular, and, while his inventions, by reason of their wide use and great benefit to the world, were known to almost every person in the land, less was said about them than concerning many inventions of less worth to mankind. His air brake almost revolutionized railroading by permitting faster trains, and safeguarding passengers. Appliances of his Union Switch and Signal Company, though less known, contributed largely to railroad safety. He was one of the leaders in the development of the turbine steam engine. His most extensive enterprises were in connection with the use of electricity. He first made practical use of the alternating current, which Edison said was impossible.

Mr. Westinghouse was an original inventor. Some men have been successful by taking and developing ideas and inventions which other men have worked out, and have succeeded in attaching their own names to them. Mr. Westinghouse seldom followed old lines.

The Selfish Optimist.

Dr. Chauncey M. Depew, at a dinner to the Earl of Kintore in New York, was declaring gravely that the bill which grants free canal tolls to American coastwise shipping must be repealed under pain perhaps of war, when a coastwise shipper shouted jocularly:

"Oh, be an optimist, doctor."

"Be an optimist, eh?" said Dr. Depew. "Well, there's too much optimism already—too much optimism of a certain kind.

"'What is an optimist, sir?' a little boy once asked me.

"'An optimist, sonny,' I replied, 'is a man who doesn't care what happens, so long as it doesn't happen to him.'"

John Burroughs' Recipe for Longevity.

John Burroughs, the naturalist, while in Atlanta recently, enroute to West Park, N. Y., from Fort Meyers, Fla., announced his intention to visit Egypt and perhaps some of the European countries. Incidentally he said he would soon be seventy-seven years old. Asked as to how he proposed to celebrate the event, he said:

"Well, I think I'll eat three square meals and walk five miles. It's because I've been doing that all my life that I'm able to celebrate my seventy-seventh birthday."

Thomas A. Edison, the inventor, has been with the naturalist at Fort Meyers for some time, and the two have made several trips together in southern Georgia and Florida.

A Saying of Lincoln.

The "Wall Street Journal," a week or two ago, quoted a saying of Lincoln well worth remembering, especially in such a time as this. Lincoln said:

"Let reverence for the law be breathed by every American mother to the babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools and colleges; let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in legislative halls, and enforced in courts of justice. And, in short, let it become the political religion of the nation, and let the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the grave and the gay, of all sexes and tongues and colors and conditions, sacrifice unceasingly upon its altars."

Ford's Philanthrophy Boosts Marriages.

"It was a great little boost for the marriage business in Detroit—that profit sharing scheme of Henry Ford's," said Marriage License Clerk Stewart of Detroit recently, when he totaled up his records for the past two weeks and found more than seventy-five Ford employes had applied for licenses in that period. "Twenty Ford workers came in here for the permits in one day," he said. Henry Ford said he expected it. "We rather figured things would break that way," he said. "It is a natural result. These men are now assured of a living wage, not only for themselves, but for the wife and children. Why shouldn't they marry?"

A Story from Ollie James.

Senator Ollie James told of a young man in Louisville who not long since hung up his shingle as attorney-at-law.

One afternoon a friend, upon entering the office, observed upon the desk of the new legal light a dollar alarm clock.

"That's a good idea," said the friend. "One is very apt to oversleep these fine spring mornings."

The youthful attorney smiled sadly. "This alarm clock was not bought for the reason you mention," said he. "I merely keep it here to wake me when it is time to go home."

The World is Growing Better

"Drys" Record Victories.

The returns on Illinois' recent and significant wet and dry election showed that 974 saloons in that progressive state were voted out of business. J. Scott McBride, a leader of the drys, predicted that a county option law will be enacted and that a five-year campaign will make the state dry. A resume of the results based on returns from all the Illinois counties where the existence of saloons was at stake indicates the following:

Total of new dry townships.	115
New dry cities and villages.	159
Dry townships remaining dry	47
Dry townships where wets won.	1
Wet townships staying wet.	72
Saloons voted out.	974
New dry counties.	22
Total dry counties in state.	52
Total townships voting.	235
Of these, total voting dry.	162
Total voting wet.	73

In Chicago's notorious First Ward, where "Bathhouse John" Coughlin was opposed by Miss Marion Drake, Coughlin won, but by about one-half the majority polled at the last election. The women's vote throughout the city determined the election of five aldermen of good character.

Add Men Will Aid Chicago Babies.

Beginning April 19 "Baby Welfare Week" is being observed in Chicago under the auspices of the Infant Welfare Society of Chicago.. The babies of Chicago will inform the city by canvassers, by electric sky signs, by placards, billboards, newspaper space, posters, street car signs, folders, lantern slides, films—with permission of the board of censors—in the picture theaters, signs on wagons and booklets distributed with all milk deliveries, that they exist and have claims on the attention of their elders. Thoroughgoing publicity is to characterize the campaign. The expenses of all this are to be paid by advertisers, advertising agents and the sellers of advertising space, who have all "chipped in."

Chicago's Mayor Bars Evil Plays.

Immoral plays, even if they are labeled "Art," won't do for Chicago. Mayor Harrison decided this question when he told representatives of the Shubert interests and the Princess Theater of Chicago, that five playlets given by Holbrook Blinn and company of players must be withdrawn from this city or the license of the theater would be revoked. After the mayor had stated his position toward a report from a police censor that the playlets were based on immorality, the theater men promised to substitute something else for the offending playlets. They agreed to do this. Representatives of the theater and of the Shuberts tried to show the mayor that the playlets were "art," and that persons who found fault with them were not mentally able to appreciate "real art," but the mayor couldn't get their point of view.

Chicago Fair Fund Goes to Babies.

The interest on the world's fair fund of approximately $100,000 which has been in the keeping of Mrs. Potter Palmer since the exposition, will be used for the benefit of Chicago's poor babies. While the final disposition of the entire fund is being settled—probably a matter of years—the interest on it, about $5,000 annually, will be used to further the work of the Infant Welfare Society of Chicago. Three new stations will be established, equipped and maintained with the money. The society already conducts thirteen stations in the congested districts of the city, at each of which about 300 babies are cared for annually, and where the mothers and eldest sisters are taught the proper care of the infants.

What Child Labor Costs

"A procession of all the child workers in this country passing before you one a minute day and night, would last five years." So said Lewis W. Hine, at the Tenth National Conference on Child Labor, which closed its sessions recently at New Orleans. He was showing the pictures of some few of the children in that procession, and demonstrating the high cost of child labor to the child, to industry and to society.

"And when do you play?" Pauline Newman told how she had asked a child of twelve in a Connecticut mill town this question. "He looked at me with his lusterless eyes, and said with surprise: 'Play? I never play.' And I remembered the day when I first went to work in a factory in New York. I was not quite fourteen. The factory overlooked the park, and I could hear the voices of children out there. I went to the window to watch them. There were some younger than I, some older, and, oh, how I wanted to go out and play with them! But I had not been at the window more than half a minute when a hand was laid on my shoulder. 'Child, the factory is not the place to dream.' That moment taught me what child labor means. And when you rob a child of his childhood, you have deprived him of something he can never, as long as he may live, never have again."

"We must cut child labor out of the vicious circle—poverty, child labor, intemperance, disease, crime, etc. Child labor is the only link in the chain which it is possible for the American people to break tomorrow, if they wish to do so. I do not claim that the abolition of child labor will destroy the vicious circle, but it will reduce it; it will give us a people better able to break the other links in the chain. If all these things are true, as we believe they are, and if we are an intelligent people, why does child labor continue?"

As if in answer to this question of Owen R. Lovejoy, secretary of the National Child Labor Committee, some stories had been told by Mrs. Florence Kelley, stories from her own experience. "In Maine, where I spend my summers, I have a neighbor who lives in a boat five miles from shore. He dares not come to land, because he knows that the agents of the Federal government would send him to prison. Several years ago he stole 1,560 scallops, a grievous offense, for which a fine of $1,560 was imposed. He can never pay the fine, so he is a man without a country. But in the same village there is a fish cannery where young children work every day undisturbed, although the state of Maine has said that no child under fourteen years may be employed. But the factory inspector is far away in Augusta; the nearest justice of the peace is thirty miles away, and roads are bad; and the people, who care very much if their scallops are stolen, do not mind if their children are ruined.

"Twenty years ago, when I was a factory inspector in Illinois, I went to a packing-house one prostrating hot day, and saw one of the boys who opened and shut the doors of the cooling-room. One minute he was outside in the direct rays of the sun; the next he was inside where the icicles never melt. I was told that the company had three times as many boys on their pay-rolls as they needed for this job, because two out of three of them were always sick. At the same plant I saw the agents of the United States inspecting, with a microscope, the meat that was to be sent to Germany, and I learned that the Federal government was paying more for the inspection of meat in that single plant than the state of Illinois had appropriated for the inspection of all the places where children were employed throughout the state.

"We care more for our food than we do for our children. We pass state laws, but we do not respect them as having real authority, and we do not provide the means to enforce them."

THE NEW W. C. T. U. LEADER.

By the death of Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, for many years president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the leadership of the union passed automatically to Miss Anna Adams Gordon, who for twenty-one years was the constant companion of Miss Willard, being her secretary, and for the last sixteen years was vice-president of the union. Although Miss Gordon spent much of her time with Mrs. Stevens in her Portland home, her real home was Evanston, Ill. Thus the work of this great organization continues in the hands of women who had had lifelong training in the battle for temperance.

INDIANA FOR BIBLE STUDY.

Following the plan in use in North Dakota, the State Board of Education of Indiana has made provision to give credit for Bible study. The Bible itself, in any version, is to be the text-book. The course of study is indicated by the state. The authorities of each local high school are to decide as to whether the study is to be offered to its students. The study is not to be carried on in the high school building, but the work of instruction is to be entrusted to Sunday-school teachers, ministers, parents, and other interested friends of the girls and boys. At stated times the high school authorities will set examinations on the work, mark the papers, and award the credits.

In Vienna there is a law against women teaching school.

Mrs. Humphry Ward strongly opposes woman suffrage.

Kansas City is to have a municipal farm for women prisoners.

There are 45,000 women earning their own living in Minnesota.

The Eleanor Association of Chicago opened its sixth club for working girls last month. Accommodations have been provided for 150 girls, making a total of six hundred whom the Eleanor Association mothers.

Large numbers of women's mass meetings in favor of woman suffrage were held throughout Austria during March. Resolutions were adopted declaring that it was the general demand of Austrian women for the vote in parliamentary and local elections.

Mrs. Ballington Booth of the Volunteers of America spoke to 1,200 convicts in the open prison yard at Folsom (Cal.) penitentiary last month. Mrs. Booth is the only woman ever accorded the privilege of talking to the convicts and one of the few ever permitted within the prison walls.

The other day when the eldest daughter of President Wilson lectured to an audience of blind women in the Congressional Library at Washington, several society women in their anxiety to be present feigned blindness that they might gain admission.

SHEPHERD OF SOULS.

A MISSIONARY HYMN.

Shepherd of souls, thy voice we hear
  Through all life's tumults, gently speak,
"Beloved, if ye hold me dear Go feed the flock I died to seek."

Lead Thou the way, Thy voice we know,
  To pastures green or deserts dread.
Content in any path we go
  If in Thy steps our feet may tread.

Inspire our hearts to love like Thine;
  Give grace to win and strength to bear;
Still through thy Word in wisdom shine
  And teach our souls to find Thee there.

Shepherd of souls! Thou Son of Man,
  Open our eyes Thy face to see.
Unfold to us redemption's plan,
  That we may point the world to Thee.

EMILY HUNTINGTON MILLER.

A CRADLE SONG.

Sing it, mother, sing it low;
  Deem it not an idle lay;
In the heart 'twill ebb and flow
  All the lifelong way.

Sing it, mother, softly sing,
  While he slumbers on thy knee;
All that after years may bring
  Shall flow back to thee.

Sing it, mother! Love is strong!
  When the tears of manhood fall,
Echoes of thy cradle song
  Shall its peace recall.

Sing it, mother! When his ear
  Catches first the voice divine,
Dying he may smile to hear
  What he deemeth thine.

JOHN B. TABB.

Nothing from L. R. Patmont.

To date nothing has been learned of the fate of Louis R. Patmont, dry worker and anti-Catholic agitator, who disappeared from Westville, Ill., March 31, where he had been conducting an anti-saloon campaign preparatory to the elections. Three detective bureaus are at work on the case. C. L. Miton, of Milwaukee, Mr. Patmont's home, is responsible for the following bit of information: The sheriff and deputy sheriff from Danville came to Milwaukee, hearing that the bitterest feeling at Westville toward Mr. Patmont was on the part of the Roman Catholics. Here are their statements: "Soon after Mr. Patmont came to Westville the report was circulated that he was an ex-Catholic priest, and that he is now connected with The Menace, and was there to break up the Catholic Church; that two persons shadowed Mr. Patmont all the time, and went into every house where he had been, and made the above statements; that one priest took a broomstick and ordered him out of the house, and that an Irish Catholic priest, on being asked if Mr. Patmont had been to see him, said, 'No four walls are strong enough to hold him and me.'"

Mr. Patmont's home is in Milwaukee, as is that of his parents and sister, Mrs. Plitt. He has a wife and two children, a girl and a boy. The only hopeful bit of news so far seen is a report in one of the Chicago dailies that a brother of Mr. Patmont, who is in Phillips Institute, Canton, O., states that he believes L. R. Patmont will yet show up; that he has before this dropped from notice, in his zealous work among foreigners.

Doctor Jenkins.

From time to time for more than ten years our newspapers have announced that Rev. Burris A. Jenkins, D. D., pastor of Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, was incapacitated by the recurrence of an old trouble with his knee. He has endured great suffering on account of the affection of this member. Increasing frequency in the return of the trouble induced him to submit to an operation a few weeks ago which promised to cure the ailment by sacrificing the knee joint and thus permanently stiffening the limb. The operation was performed in Roosevelt Hospital, New York City, by Doctor Gibony and is reported as thoroughly successful. The knee-cap was removed and about one-half inch of the lower bone and one-eighth inch of the upper bone. The patient is promised by the doctors that he can be at home by the middle of May, ready for work. Doctor Jenkins represents the finest type of religious leader among the Disciples of Christ and has built up a great congregation—in many respects the strongest church of Disciples in Kansas City—whose members come about as near worshiping him as it is lawful for Christian people to do. During his absence Geo. W. Muckley, secretary of the Church Extension Board, is supplying Linwood Boulevard pulpit.

Doctor Ainslie Conducts Unique Campaign.

"The most important preparation for the meeting consisted of four weeks of Bible study and prayer" is what Peter Ainslie says of the preparation made by the Christian Temple at Baltimore for the one week's meeting held at the Temple April 5 to 12. The series resulted in bringing fifty new families into the church—108 persons. The largest audiences in the history of the church are reported. Mr. Ainslie preached and home forces led the singing. Speaking more in detail of the weeks of preparation, Mr. Ainslie writes that about thirty study and prayer circles were conducted in the homes of the people. The "Handbook of Christian Instruction," which is based on J. W. McGarvey's method of instruction, was used as a text, and proved a most effective help. Mr. Ainslie believes that many other persons will be enlisted as a result of the campaign, for the meeting closed with intense interest, fifteen confessions being made at the last service.

E. E. Snoddy Succeeds S. M. Jefferson.

The chair of Philosophy in Transylvania University and The College of the Bible made vacant by the death of Prof. S. M. Jefferson, February 20, is to be filled by Prof. E. E. Snoddy, of Hiram College, Hiram, Ohio. Professor Snoddy received his baccalaureate degree in Hiram and the Master's degree in Yale. He has pursued graduate study in the University of Michigan and the University of Chicago. He has been a teacher, first of Greek and later of Philosophy, in Hiram College, for the past eighteen years. He is thoroughly interested in all educational enterprises of the Disciples. His series of lectures given at Bethany Assembly during the last two years attracted wide attention. In addition to the duties of his chair he has found time for lecturing on educational and religious subjects. R. H. Crossfield, President of Transylvania, writes that the school is greatly pleased to have Professor Snoddy join its faculty family. Professor Snoddy will remove to Lexington after the Hiram Commencement in June.

Ground Broken for Fresno Church.

Ground was broken for the new First Church at Fresno, Cal., April 6. Charter members of the church, which was organized in 1884, lifted the first shovelfuls of dirt into the wagon which was to bear it away, and they were followed by the oldest and youngest members of the congregation, the pastors and others present. The service was very simple. W. H. Martin, former pastor, offered the invocation, and H. O. Breeden, pastor, and Shirley R. Shaw, associate pastor, had charge of the exercises. The new church will cost in the neighborhood of $50,000 for the building alone. The pipe organ and furnishings to be installed will represent an investment of about $10,000 and the church property is valued at $15,000, making the entire investment about $75,000. Special attention is to be paid the Sunday-school work in the new building, thirty-two Sunday-school rooms being provided by the plans.

Transylvania Supports Living Link.

Great interest on the part of Transylvania University students was manifested in the Living Link campaign which resulted in raising an amount in excess of the six hundred dollars required for the support of Miss Kate Galt Miller's school at Wuhu, China. Five years ago, students determined to make the college a Living Link institution and since that time the missionary spirit has been growing from year to year. The fact that Miss Miller is a former Transylvania student has given to all Transylvanians a peculiar interest in this particular field.

To Manage "Christian News."

During J. T. Nichols' last year with the "Christian Union," Charles Blanchard served as office editor. Mr. Nichols, editor of the present Christian News, published at Des Moines, announces that Mr. Blanchard now becomes managing editor of this paper. Mr. and Mrs. Blanchard will have entire charge of all detail work, bookkeeping, proof reading, makeup and the entire managing of the paper. Mr. Blanchard was at one time associated with F. M. Kirkham, on the Christian Oracle.

Des Moines Paper Praises Willett Lectures.

The Christian News, published at Des Moines, and edited by J. T. Nichols, speaks as follows of the course of lectures recently given by Dr. H. L. Willett, at Central Church, Des Moines: "The entire series of lectures was on the general subject of 'The Changing Orient,' and dealt with the new order of things in the east, politically, educationally, socially and religiously. The picture of the rapid transitions that have taken place and are now taking place in Japan and China and in Mohammedan countries was one to move the most indifferent and stolid. One of the political miracles of modern times is the changing order in Japan within the past sixty years, since Commodore Perry opened up the way for commercial relations and the introduction of western ideas and ideals. The same thing is being repeated in China in even a more wonderful way. The movement by the 'Young Turks' for constitutional government is another significant change that has come in recent years. The influences that have led to these remarkable transformations are many, among which the missionary of the cross and the teacher and the medical missionary must be accorded a large place. His whole series of lectures was an emphasis of the supreme importance of Christian missions. He exalted the Christ, not only as the pre-eminent teacher of ethics and religion, but as the One declared to be the Son of God by the resurrection from the dead. The need of the 'Changing Orient' is the everlasting gospel. The forces at work are the principles of the kingdom of heaven. God has revealed Himself to men—is revealing Himself to men today, as witnessed by the marvelous workings of the gospel and of His providence in oriental lands. Now is the supreme moment in Christian missions. The call of the Christ is insistent, imperative, impelling. Dr. Willett has heard the Master's call and is setting himself to his task. There was not one note of doubt or of fear or faltering in his message."

Books on Disciple History.

Charles B. Newnan was one of the earnest and successful interpreters of Christianity, through a most serviceable career as preacher and pastor. A year ago he passed away in Detroit, Michigan, in the city where the best years of his ministry were spent, and among the people who loved him. During his life he had gathered an extensive collection of books, especially of volumes relating to the history and literature of the Disciples. Mrs. Newnan would gladly keep these books, but finds it necessary to dispose of them. If there are those who are interested in gathering books of this important character, they may well correspond with her. The collection includes a complete set of the "Millenial Harbinger" and other journalistic works of importance to our history. Because of the value of these volumes and the advisability of incorporating them in some larger collection of Disciple literature, we are glad to give place to this notice. Mrs. Newnan resides at 200 Boston Boulevard East, Detroit, Michigan. And while she wishes to realize as much as she can for the books, it is probable that the modest price which she would ask would be far less than the cost of assembling them in any other way.

J. J. Hill to Aid Eugene School.

James J. Hill, railway magnate of St. Paul, Minnesota, has donated $50,000 to the endowment fund of Eugene Bible University, Eugene, Ore., on certain conditions. This gift from Mr. Hill is the result of negotiations that have been carried on with Mr. Hill by President E. C. Sanderson for several months. During the latter part of March President Sanderson made a trip to St. Paul and interviewed Mr. Hill. This resulted in a letter from Mr. Hill, written on March 31, which contained the good news as above stated. Further statements as to this will be made later.

Evanston, Ill., Church Grows.

The Evanston, Ill., church had a short meeting with its pastor preaching during Easter week, with seven confessions and five other additions. This church has received 21 new members since January 1. The Easter morning attendance was the best in the history of the church and the Sunday-school raised that day $70 on its pledge to the building fund. A reception to the new members was given on Wednesday, April 15.

George Quiggan in Toronto Pulpit.

The pulpit of the Cecil Street Church, Toronto, which was made vacant by the resignation of C. O. Reynard, to become Hiram's Field Secretary, will be filled for the next month by George Quiggan, who has just left the C. W. B. M. work at San Antonio, Tex. Mr. Quiggan came to America from England last year, having served as pastor at Birkenhead for several years. His wife is the daughter of Joe Coop, of Southport, England.

E. P. Wise Loses Mother.

Mrs. Catherine P. Wise, mother of E. P. Wise, pastor at East Liverpool, O., passed away April 6, at the age of ninety years. For fifty-seven years Mrs. Wise lived the life of a devoted Christian. Mr. Wise says of her: "Her life in its simplicity, gentleness and unselfishness was a full exemplification of her Christian profession. She bore heavy burdens with utmost patience and her spirit was chastened by much sorrow. Only the abundant grace of God could give the perfect mastery and quiet joy possessed by this saintly soul. The last ten years of her beautiful life were spent without a murmur in the bosom of my own family to the great joy of our hearts. She leaves us a sweet memory."

Another Clevelaand Church.

The story of the fine work of the Aetna Road Church was in some way lost from Mr. Rothenburger's review of the Cleveland churches in last week's issue of the Century. We present the story herewith. F. D. Butchart is in his ninth year with this church, and in his second pastorate. This church was organized in 1891 and has received into its membership 850 persons. Being near the center of the Bohemian district the American constituency migrated to other parts of the city. Last year through the combined efforts of the Cleveland Disciples Union, the O. C. M. S. and the A. C. M. S., a new structure was planned for on Engle Ave. near the heart of the Bohemian district. On April 19, F. M. Rains dedicated this new plant which is a combination of auditorium, Bible-school plant, gymnasium, and the two hundred resident members with a Bible-school of 450 will take up their new work in this interesting part of the city.

Norwood, Cincinnati, Dedicates.

A spectacular feature of the dedication exercises held on Easter day at Norwood, Cincinnati, Christian Church, was the marching of 1,000 men, women and children from the old building to the new one, three blocks away. C. R. Stauffer is pastor of this church. F. M. Rains preached the dedicatory sermon, and raised $17,500, over $2.500 more than needed. Mayor H. E. Englehart delivered an address in the afternoon, discussing some current local questions. The new building cost $35.000. The Norwood Sunday-school has been making some remarkable records in attendance recently.

$1000 Reward for Finding Patmont

"The committee in charge will pay the above sum for any information leading to the discovery and delivery alive of Rev. Louis R. Patmont, the "Dry" worker, who disappeared from Westville, Ill., on the evening of March 31st, will be paid for the discovery and delivery of the dead body of the above mentioned Louis R. Patmont."

OR $500.00 REWARD

The above notices have been authorized by the Committee in charge of the search for Brother Patmont.

The particulars of the disappearance are as follows:

On Wednesday, March 18th, Brother Patmont began work under the auspices of the "Dry" Committee of Georgetown Township in the interest of the campaign they were waging against the saloons.

He was chosen for this task because of his proficiency in the various languages spoken in the township, especially in Westville, a town in the above mentioned township. As most readers of our papers are aware, Brother Patmont was able to converse in twelve languages.

He was not on the field many days before the "Wets" began to realize that they had a formidable foe to deal with in Brother Patmont, and began in their usual dishonest way to meet the emergency.

One of their number hit upon the expediency of sending to Aurora, Missouri, for 500 copies of the "Menace," a well-known anti-Catholic journal, and distributing them among the Catholics of the city.

Next they hired men to dog his footsteps and report to the Romanists among whom he was at work that he was the distributer of the "Menace" and that he was one of the contributors to the same paper.

Next, they published false statements to the effect that he claimed to be an ex-priest of the Catholic church and that he was in Westville for the purpose of establishing an anti-Catholic church.

All of these proving of little avail in crippling his influence with the foreign people, they resorted to threats against his person thinking to intimidate him, thus causing him to leave town.

He was repeatedly threatened by the saloon-keepers and those detailed to follow him, but in the face of all this, he kept on with his work and was making inroads on their territory till more desperate means were thought necessary. The worst came on the evening of March 31st, when he walked out to the edge of the town to see a man with the purpose of enlisting him as a challenger on election day.

At or near a saloon near the railroad tracks at the edge of town he disappeared and has not been seen nor heard from since. This is the boldest and most daring crime of modern days and it has been done in almost broad day light and in the populated edge of an Illinois town.

Our people are doing all that they can. The Georgetown Committee in whose employ he was have suspended all other business and have done little else than search for clues.

The Ministerial Association of Danville have taken up the matter and appointed a Committee to meet with the Georgetown Township Committee and from this joint committee a new committee has been formed as follows:

J. F. Bickel, Pastor, First Church of Christ, Danville, Chairman; Wm. Henderson, lawyer and member of Georgetown Committee, Secretary; George Rearick, lawyer and member of the "Dry" Committee of Danville, Treasurer; Preston Wood, pastor of the Kimber M. E. Church; W. H. Morris, Chairman of Georgetown Committee.

These are the men offering the reward at the head of this article and doing the work untiringly of financing the search and prosecuting it to the utmost.

It is on behalf of these men that I appeal to our brethren everywhere for help. Some one has suggested that we should have $10,000 for a search fund.

Brother Patmont is one whom we can ill afford to lose as he was without doubt the most gifted linguist among us for work among the foreign-born peoples on American soil. Many have asked to be permitted to help. The time has come for radical action. We call on all for help.

J. F. Bickel.

The Fact Remains

No amount of misrepresentation by the peddlers of alum baking powders, no juggling with chemicals, or pretended analysis, or cooked-up certificates, or falsehoods of any kind, can change the fact that has been found by the official examinations to be of the highest leavening efficiency, free from alum, and of absolute purity and wholesomeness.

Royal Baking Powder is indispensable for making finest and most economical food.

PERSONAL AND OTHERWISE.

Mrs. M. Y. Rusk, of Brookfield, Mo., reports that the first three months' ministry of the new Brookfield pastor, A. M. Levack, has resulted in good. Some "innovations" are mentioned: A kindergarten, directed by Mrs. Levack, with an enrollment of fifty has been added to the Sunday-school and the general Sunday-school attendance has increased almost one hundred per cent. Ten interesting lectures on Egypt have been given by the pastor and his wife. These drew such crowds that the seating capacity of the auditorium was greatly taxed. Nineteen have been added to the church membership.

Announcement was made recently that the large and valuable library belonging to Professor S. M. Jefferson has been secured for Transylvania and The College of the Bible. Through the good offices of Professor DeWeese, Col. James Jefferson of Springfield, Illinois, purchased the library of the widow of Professor Jefferson and presented it to the college. It abounds in most valuable works on philosophical and metaphysical subjects.

Jos. A. Serena, Secretary of the Association of Colleges, writes that the meeting of the Association will be held in Indianapolis, Ind., instead of Lexington, Ky., on May 1, and that President Howe of Butler and Prof. Lumley of the College of Missions cordially invite the Association to meet in their institutions in Irvington.

Professor W. C. Morro, dean of the ministerial department of Butler College, gave a series of lectures on "The Unchanging Gospel in a Changing Age" for the Kansas Christian Ministers' Institute, which met at Arkansas City, Kan., April 6-8. Hugh Lomax, of Abilene, is president of the Institute.

As a result of the every-member canvass conducted by the church at Atchison, Kan., it was decided to have a visiting Sunday about once each six weeks, when members of the church will visit the others in the congregation. About fifty took part in the recent canvass and about 400 homes were visited.

I. J. Cahill, Ohio State Secretary, filled the pulpits at Lindenwald, Coke Otto, and Santa Clara Ave., Dayton, April 5. The latter congregation became an organized church April 3. The organization service was led by John P. Sala, pastor of the Central Church.

Landon A. Thomas, of Augusta, Ga., has recently given $5,000 for medical work in mission lands; $2,500 of the amount will go to build Doctor Frymier's new hospital at Lotumbe, Africa, and $2,500 to help erect Doctor Shelton's hospital at Batang, Tibet.

S. R. McClure, who has served the Nebraska Disciples as state evangelist for about three years, has been compelled to abandon this work, on account of the health of his wife. He will take the pastorate at Deming, N. M.

Chalmers McPherson, of Fort Worth, Tex., has been delivering a series of addreses on "Foundation Stones," at First Church, San Angelo, Tex. Two of his subjects were "From Dust to Glory" and "The American Home."

J. H. O. Smith, of First Church, Ark., recently conducted the weekly shop meeting for men at the Iron Mountain Planing Mill at Argenta. His subject was "Judge Not of Sodom."

J. D. Armistead, of Cynthiana, Ky., served as chairman of the general "Go-to-church" movement of that county, for April 5. Both Protestant and Catholics took part in the campaign.

Homer F. Cole, pastor at Brazil, Ind., reports Sunday-school records broken April 5, since Easter, 1913. An attendance of 1,000 was expected Easter day, 1914.

Missouri's State Convention is slated for June 15-18, 1914, at Moberly, Mo., where B. L. Smith ministers. Program features will be published later.

J. W. Williams, father of Mark Wayne Williams, Milwaukee pastor, held a series of special Easter services for the Milwaukee Church.

The First and Central churches of Chandler, Okla., have again reunited, it is reported. J. W. Umphress is pastor of the church.

NEWS FROM THE FOREIGN SOCIETY.

The First Church at Omaha, Neb., one of the Living-links, will in the future support Mrs. Merle Thomas Rice at Damoh, India. Mrs. Rice is a Nebraska woman. It is fitting that this splendid church shall support her. Before she leaves in September she is to visit the congregation, and they are to give her an enthusiastic reception.

Miss Frances Irene Banta has reached her mission field, Nankin, China. She is delighted with her new station. She is at work hard on the language, and she is especially well pleased with Miss Emma Lyon, with whom she is to be associated in school work.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon expected to move into the new hospital in Manila, April 10. This is an important development. He says "In buying our lot (hospital) we gained 244 square meters of land, which makes a good increase in size of same, and comes as a Christmas gift."

The legislature of the Philippine Islands have made a very generous grant to our new hospital in Manila. It amounts to $4,500. The legislature also makes an allowance of $3,000 to the Laoag Hospital. This is most cheerful news to our medical missionaries especially. The missionaries in the Philippines have worked and prayed for this for many months. This brings an assistance of $7,500 to our work in that land.

H. C. Hobgood, Lotumbe, Africa, says: "The last quarter's work was good. There were forty-three baptisms here. The evangelists in the Income, Iyete and Bongalo districts have gone out for six months this time. These districts are so far distant that it takes a month for the evangelists to come down and to return, so we decided that they better stay six months. In the last few months six of our evangelists have learned to read and write in our evangelistic school. Doctor Frymire is taking care of a rather large medical work. We hope that the hospital will go up soon."

James C. Ogden, who is on his way to Tibet with his family, in a recent letter says: "We are now nearing Hankow. We are all as well as usual. We stopped twelve days in Shanghai. We spent three days in Nankin. A telegram from Doctor Shelton says: 'Everything quiet, and party well.' They have not yet reached Tachienlu. Doctor Shelton's medical helper, 'Johnny,' leaves a good position to take a smaller salary, and goes West with us. His Christian wife goes along. Johnny is a good and trustworthy man, as he proved to be years ago. If everything goes well with us we expect to reach Tachienlu some time in June."

F. M. Rains, Secretary.

INDIANA'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

The time draws nigh for our "Diamond' Jubilee Convention at Terre Haute, May 11-14. Let us now earnestly endeavor to carry out the following aims:

1. 600 contributing churches.
2. $20,000 for Home Missions.
3. 800 convention attendance out-side of Terre Haute.
4. Every preacher present and each church represented in our "Diamond" Jubilee.
5. An organized church in each county seat of the state in the next five years.
6. A doubling of our State Mission funds in that period.
7. 50,000 souls won for Christ within next five years.
8. All present departments of our state work enlarged and liberally supported.

Plan now to go to Terre Haute.

L. C. Howe,
President Indiana Christian Missionary Association.

BUTLER COLLEGE NOTES.

Butler Alumni in Chicago recently held a delightful dinner and organized a Chicago chapter of the association. President and Mrs. Howe and Miss Graydon attended.

Clarence Reidenbach, Butler 1912, captained the Yale debate team which this year defeated Harvard. Mr. Reidenbach and Mr. Andrew Leitch, Butler 1911, both secured Fogg scholarship standing in the Yale Divinity School.

Butler College again lost in debate to Albion College. This is the third consecutive year. The Butler men are good losers when they lose, and enthusiastic winners when they win. The Butler team acquitted themselves well. C. E. UNDERWOOD.

"A SAD EXPERIENCE."

C. W. Cauble, Indiana Secretary, writes "I have just had a sad experience. I counted the Indiana churches listed in the Year Book for 1914. The type was so small and the names of the churches were so close together that I had difficulty in making the count. The fatigue left my eyes, however, and I had no difficulty when I turned to the column marked American Missions. Of the 724 churches listed, 273 gave to Home and State Missions last year. Brethren, this is a shame. Every church should have the inspiration that comes only in giving to others. Let's put some more figures in the first column of our next annual report. Take down your Year Book and turn to page 135. If the church in which you work is one of the 451 marked with little dots under American Missions, will you not resolve before closing the book that you will see to it that figures take the place of these meaningless dots in this year's report?"

SERVICE VARIETY OF THE AMERICAN SOCIETY.

The type of work done by the American Christian Missionary Society varies widely according to the community. Our Home Missionaries are preaching the gospel in the open country, in villages, in county seat towns and in large cities. Every section of this great continent presents its peculiar problem to the Home Mission Boards.

There is the frontier with its strategic centers rapidly forming; there are isolated and sparsely settled valleys, mining towns and lumber camps with problems of co-operation and federation in order to maintain any religious work; there are large agricultural regions with prosperous populations holding aloof from churches, empty because of methods stereotyped by a generation long since dead; there are in growing cities superb suburban opportunities that, like horses champing at the bit, will not long wait for riders; there are in great metropolises old time "First" or "Central" churches, the proud mothers of a prosperous brood of children in resident districts, facing in downtown districts the best opportunity ever presented to them for helpful service to strangers, young people and mixed multitudes; there are whole colonies of foreign folk extending for blocks and blocks, many of them in crowded tenement houses, and all eager to learn the American language, history, habits, methods, ideas and ideals; there are the ordinary American congregations awaiting the wand of the specialist in Sunday-school and church work to give vision, impart inspiration and introduce better methods that whole communities may receive the impact of Christ's blessed gospel—such are some of the complex situations that call for grace, common sense, consecration and business acumen as well as "green backs" from our Home Missionary societies.

To outline a program for action in the face of such complex and changing conditions, to enlist hearty co-operation of so many men of many minds and to secure the large sums of money necessary to successfully promote the church in an age of vast undertakings and in a land where the maximum costs, both in life and money obtain, is the stupendous task faced by the American Christian Missionary Society. As it enters upon its annual spring campaign looking toward the May offering, it solicits the prayers, the sympathy and the outspoken confidence of all the brethren.

GRANT K. LEWIS, Secretary.

TO SUNDAY-SCHOOL WORKERS.

The printed minutes of the fourth annual meeting of the Sunday-school Council of Evangelical Denominations in the United States and Canada are now available. This meeting was held in Chicago, January 27-29. The 1914 proceedings of the Council are valuable because they contain, besides the complete reports of the various committees and officers, many important findings, suggestions and recommendations in regard to lesson-making and Sunday-school standards.

Of greatest importance, perhaps, is the action taken concerning the uniform lesson cycle and departmentally graded lessons, in which matters the Council is to co-operate with the International Sunday-school Association in a joint conference soon. Other subjects of genuine interest to Sunday-school workers that are treated in the minutes are courses of study for celleges and universities, for parents, and for foreign-speaking peoples; also concerning summer schools, exhibits and co-operation between the churches and the public schools in the matter of Bible instruction.

The minutes in addition contain valuable statistical data, showing that in twenty of the twenty-seven denominations affiliated, a total increase in Sunday-school enrollment of more than nine per cent is reported. The membership roll, after revision, shows 156 members, comprising editors, publishers and executive officers of Sunday-school boards. The 1914 minutes are a well-bound book of ninety-six pages, larger than any yet published by the Council.

Pastors and Sunday-school workers of evangelical churches can obtain it by sending their applications accompanied by twelve cents in stamps to the Secretary of the Council. Henry H. Meyer, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York.

DISCIPLES CONVENTION, INDIA MISSION.

The convention of 1914 was marked by a beautiful spirit of fellowship and an intense earnestness on the part of the missionaries assembled. It also sounded a note of advance along several lines. Mr. Madsen of Pendra Road gave the key note of the convention, "Humility" in his opening address The Bible studies each morning by O. J. Grainger of Mungeli were very helpful. The addresses of the various missionaries on the attitude of the missionary to his fellow missionary, his native co-workers and to the Indian Christian Church showed thoughtful consideration of the problems before the mission.

The enthusiasm enkindled for greater efforts in evangelistic work was one of the features of the convention. The evangelistic reports from the various stations showing a great increase in the number of baptisms gave the hope of a greater harvest in the coming year. It has been in the thoughts of the missionaries during the last year that not enough time and effort has been put forth by the mission for definite evangelistic work. This was due to the fact that schools and other institutions demanded the time of most of the workers. The missionaries have been much in prayer over this situation. May their prayers for more laborers be speedily answered!

Another advance has been made in the unification of the work of the two societies. the F. C. M. S. and C. W. B. M. into one mission. This has been in progress for several years, but has in this convention been put on an efficient working basis. During the coming year the mission has planned for a central treasurer, through whom all the funds of the two societies shall pass. This will do awav with a great deal of office work of the individual missionary and will give him more time for the work he was sent out to do. Dr. G. W. Brown of Jubbulpore has been elected treasurer, but the clerical work will be done by an Indian. The new organization will mean much to the efficiency of the mission.

The reports of the various mission stations showed one discouraging feature. The mission must have more workers to do the work in the stations which we now have. The work cannot stop, it must go on. There are new fields which ought to be entered. Young men and women of our colleges, India needs you now. The fields are already white unto the harvest.

THE UNJUST STEWARD.

INTERNATIONAL UNIFORM LESSON FOR MAY 10, 1914.

Luke 16:1-13. Memory Verses, 8, 9.

Golden Text.—He that is faithful in a very little is faithful also in much: and he that is unrighteous in a very little is unrighteous also in much.—Luke 16:10.

American Standard Bible.
Copyright, 1901, by Thomas Nelson & Sons.
(Used by permission.)

(1) And he said also unto the disciples, There was a certain rich man, who had a steward; and the same was accused unto him that he was wasting his goods. (2) And he called him, and said unto him, What is this that I hear of thee? render the account of thy stewardship; for thou canst be no longer steward. (3) And the steward said within himself, What shall I do, seeing that my lord taketh away the stewardship from me? I have not strength to dig; to beg I am ashamed. (4) I am resolved what to do, that, when I am put out of the stewardship, they may receive me into their houses. (5) And calling to him each one of his Lord's debtors, he said to the first, How much owest thou unto my lord? (6) And he said, A hundred measures of oil. And he said unto him, Take thy bond, and sit down quickly and write fifty. (7) Then said he to another. And how much owest thou? And he said, A hundred measures of wheat. He saith unto him, Take thy bond, and write fourscore. (8) And his lord commended the unrighteous steward because he had done wisely: for the sons of this world are for their own generation wiser than the sons of the light. (9) And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when it shall fail, they may receive you into the eternal tabernacles. (10) He that is faithful in a very little is faithful also in much: and he that is unrighteous in a very little is unrighteous also in much. (11) If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches? (12) And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another's, who will give you that which is your own? (13) No servant can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.

Verse By Verse.

BY C. C. BUCKNER

v. 1. And he said also: This parable was probably spoken during the conversation of the preceding chapter. Rich man, who had a steward. The steward was the rich man's agent. He probably had complete charge of his business.

v. 2. Render the account: This was required by the rich man that he might know just how much had been absconded by the steward.

v. 3. What shall I do? He was not repentant of his sin, but was merely sorry he had been discovered in his treachery.

v. 4. I am resolved what to do: How resourceful are those whose hearts are pernicious! Surely this is the wisdom of serpents.

v. 5. Calling to him each one of his lord's debtors: The debtors were the tenants and paid their rent to the steward.

v. 6. A hundred measures of oil: This was a Greek "bath," and amounted to one gallon. Write fifty. Thus he made his thefts appear to be less to his lord and secured the good will of his debtors.

v. 8. And his lord commended the unrighteous steward: He did not commend his dishonesty.

v. 9. Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness. By the unselfish use of our money we can win friends.

v. 10. He that is faithful, etc.: Little things constitute almost the whole of life. It is the ordinary and small transaction which needs our most careful attention.

v. 12. Which is your own: Eternal life.

v. 13. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. There is no spiritual neutrality.

At the Heart of the Lesson.

BY REV. A. Z. CONRAD, PH.D.

Christ or Diana? The question is age-long. It never changes save in form. The alternative is ever present to the individual. There is one compulsion from which no man can escape, that is the compulsion of choice between courses of conduct. This choice resolves itself into a choice of rulers. Who shall have authority over the empire of the soul? The human heart is imperial in the extensiveness of its domain, the mightiness of its destiny, the glory of its possibility, and the absoluteness of its accepted ruler. In the last analysis human choice is a selection of masters. Free-will comes to be a power of self-determination through the acknowledgement of a sceptre. We elect our own emperor. While in office he dominates. How we live is determined by who rules. "Mammon" as employed by Jesus symbolizes any and all forms of power that are not God. Wealth, self, pleasure, position, all are summed up in the word, "Mammon." The parable of the unjust steward must be read backward. The point of the parable is to be found in the sequel. "No man can serve two masters. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." Begin here and you can interpret the parable.

THE WICKEDNESS OF WASTEFULNESS

V. 1. "There was a certain rich man who had a steward and the same was accused unto him that he was wasting his goods." The position was a responsible one. Stewardship is always important. It involves responsibility and accountability. The entire management of the estate was in the hands of the steward in question. He selected and dismissed those who occupied the relation of tenants. The rentals passed through his hands. He was supposed to manage the business economically, in the interests of the owner. He was supposed to give his entire time to the direction of its affairs so that the returns would be as large as possible. He is neither accused of greed or graft, but that through indifference and neglect, and possibly extravagance, he was failing to give the returns which might properly be expected. He is faithless to his trust. Such at least is the accusation.

SENTENCE WITHOUT TRIAL

The proprietor said to the steward, "What is this that I hear of thee? Render the account of thy stewardship for thou canst be no longer steward." The dealing was most unjust. So far as the narrative goes there was no trial but dismissal was on the basis of hearsay evidence. The incident has its counterpart every day. We accept at its face value any reflections cast upon our fellowmen, but we are far more chary of accepting encomiums sounded in their honor. It is one of the fundamental principles of justice that no man shall be judged without being heard. In a world where jealousy and envy play so large a part it is never safe to take the mere statement of any one without reasons accompanying the accusation.

THE INDUSTRIAL DILEMMA.

V. 3. "And the steward said within himself, 'What shall I do? My occupation is gone. I have no position and I have been trained to no other business and I would not disgrace myself by begging.'" He thought the matter over and hit upon a very ingenious plan whereby he would put the debtors of his lord under obligation to himself. Before collections could be made by any one else and before his own authority could be entirely taken away he reduced every man's obligation and gave him a receipt in full. The readiness of the debtors to co-operate with him is noteworthy. They were not making so much by their dishonesty as they supposed, as they would soon have the dismissed steward on ther hands and his support would probably cost them more than the original debt. Dishonesty is not the best policy though it often temporarily seems to succeed. The dilemma of the steward is not unique. In these days of specialization the loss of a position is peculiarly hazardous. So much time and attention is necessary to become expert in any particular department that opportunities are narrowed down to one occupation. Many a man or woman dependent wholly upon his or her own exertion for the ordinary comforts of life is face to face with this terrible dilemma of what to do when through any cause a position is lost.

POLICY OR PRINCIPLE?

When a principle is at stake nothing is more perilous than to consult with expediency. The one course honorably open to this dismissed steward does not seem to have occurred to him, namely, a confession of unworthiness and a humble trust in providence to open an honorable way for a future career. As between trust and trickery he does not seem to have thought of trust, but resorts directly to trickery. Nothing is more reprehensible than the abuse of authority. He took advantage of the situation. Technically he was still steward although the sentence of dismissal had been passed. The man who steals saying, "I have to live" makes a mistake at two points. He does not have to live. He had better not live than to live dishonestly and dishonorably. Secondly, up to the point where life is necessary there is a way to live without dishonesty. He was willing to lose his honor to save his hide. The method he adopted was deliberate theft. The way of taking it has nothing to do with the actuality of stealing. The appropriation of what is not our own on any pretext, even if protected by law is a violation of the eighth commandment.

NOT MAGNITUDE BUT MOTIVE.

Life is not determined by bulk but by direction and endurance. A bit of radium the size of a pin head is worth more than a mountain of limestone and sandstone. "He that is faithful in a very little is faithful also in much." Not how much you violate a commandment determines your sin, but the purpose to violate it at all. It is not a question of how many pieces you break a vase into but its uselessness when broken at all. The size of a hole in the hold of a vessel makes little difference if it is big enough to make the craft unseaworthy. Big and little as related to principle are hardly applicable terms. A lie is a lie no matter what its size. Truth is truth and error is error irrespective of magnitude. Jesus is announcing a great principle. To be honest a man must be honest through and through and in all of his dealings. To trust at all one must trust with entirety of surrender.

WITHHELD WEALTH

"If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon who will commit to your trust the true riches." The secret of withheld power is plainly revealed. We have little because the little we have has not been diligently, sagaciously employed. The larger wealth is entrusted only to those willing to employ the smaller wealth conscientiously. Unless we have invested the natural talent to glorify God how can we expect the gift of great spiritual power for emergencies? Right here we find the proper place for the appeal, "Make for yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness." So employ ability, accumulations, influence, everything that is ours to invest, that God shall be glorified and the soul enlarged and enriched by such investments. Money invested for art is transmuted into beauty. Money invested for betterment is transmuted into human happiness. Money expended for the progress of the advancing Kingdom of Jesus is transmuted into spirituality. We are expected to look ahead and recognize our relations to the next world as well as to this.

WHICH SCEPTRE?

"No servant can serve two masters." "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." Things mutually exclusive will not amalgamate. You cannot look both ways at the same time. You cannot remain on shore and at the same time embark on a transatlantic liner for Europe. You cannot be honest and partly dishonest. If you yield one point to the prince of darkness you come under his entire domination. You cannot keep spiritual treasure safe and give the key of the storehouse to the devil. Irrational as is the proceeding this double life is precisely what multitudes are trying to live. Life is either wasted or invested. We become the slaves of Satan or the friends of Christ. Death becomes either a palace gate or a prison door. The compulsions of choice are inexorable. Not to choose to embark upon the ship putting out to sea is to choose to remain.

"Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." Determine your own eternity, by electing whose sceptre you will acknowledge.

TOPIC FOR MAY 6.

The Spirit That Makes for Unity. Gal. 5:22-26.

In the Christian Union Quarterly Stephen J. Corey quotes a missionary as saying that a "universal Christ will hardly ever be fully understood by one nation, let alone one denomination." Secretary Brown of the Presbyterian Board, said, "What right have we Westerners to take an Asiatic religion, such as Christianity, with all its Oriental imagery and statement, reshape it in statements of our own Occidental prejudice and dogma, and then force it back upon the Asiatic again? Let us give him Christ in the simplest possible terms, and if he must have a creed, he will make it himself."

FAITH IN MAN.

The statements quoted above call for faith in man. We usually have sufficient confidence in our own views. We are ready to let the world know what they are. We trust those who hold like opinions with ourselves. If we are ever to have unity, we must trust those who claim the privilege of making their own creeds. The missionary goes out to proclaim Christ. Those who accept his message have a right to trust their own experience in following Christ. They would be foolish not to accept advice from the missionary. They need to move with caution. They, like other men, may misunderstand Christ and substitute for allegiance to him adherance to rather crudely constructed creeds. But a disciple of Christ honors the Christ whom he knows. This means that our first duty in teaching others the gospel is to help them to be independent, to respect their own thoughts and feelings.

THE LIMITS OF FREEDOM.

It was the belief of a certain wise old Greek that if men would only examine themselves and knew what is deepest in their lives, they would get rid of their most troublesome disagreements. He held that differences were largely on the surface. There is much to be said for his belief. If we walk after the flesh, we shall have contentions and jealousies. The life of the flesh is the shallow life. It is incomplete. Those who follow it know nothing as they ought to know. They have to substitute for rational control of the social order some form of force. Our charge against despositism of all sorts is really a charge against those that submit to them as well as against the despots. The slave may be willing to be a slave even after external restraint is removed. The doubts of those who have volunteered to do the thinking of mankind have had some justification.

SURRENDER.

"His servants ye are whom ye obey." Whom is the church obeying? To what is it trying to conform its life? We may believe that all who call themselves Christians are endeavoring to surrender their lives to Christ. The surrender is often incomplete. We exalt private opinions that create discord. Writing in the Christian Union Quarterly, Mr. Robert H. Gardiner says: "It is our opinions which keep us apart. We prefer our own opinions to the Common Life of the one Body of the one Lord. We substitute those opinions for the acceptance of His Life. And our disputes about these opinions, our eagerness to overcome our brethren in arguments about matters as to which neither we nor they are fully competent to reason, obscure from us and from the world in which we live the Person of the Lord. We proclaim that we are the Church, and men have no means of knowing that we are not, but that the Church is the Life of Christ indwelling in men, and so they do not see Him on His Cross, lifted up that He may draw all men to Him."

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

The Bethany Graded System Is the Only Body of Literature Published by the Disciples That Follows the International Course Throughout

OTHER systems depart from this course, either in part or throughout all departments. There are at least three reasons why the thorough-going International outlines should be followed by Disciples' schools: (1) Co-operation with other communions, for which we as a people stand, is thereby assured. Many and loud are the complaints coming from towns where the "half-way" graded literature is being used, and where graded unions are being organized. (2) The spirit of co-operation with the International Sunday School Association is shown only by following its guidance in the matter of selected lines of study. (3) The best system of study is assured. For the International Committee, with its specialists of world-wide reputation, is able to outline a better course than any single denomination can devise.

The New Spirit in Sunday School Work is Embodied in the Bethany System of Sunday School Literature

THE recent appointment by President Hill M. Bell of a Religious Education Commission for the Disciples is indicative of an unrest with the conditions that have obtained in the Sunday Schools of the past. It is a source of satisfaction to the Disciples Publication Society that the Bethany System of Literature has been prepared on the basis of the highest ideals of religious education.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR HERBERT L. WILLETT, CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

The Growing Revelation

It is a great advantage that we have before us the whole story of the life and ministry of Jesus; yet it would be a help to us in many ways if we could approach the narrative just as the disciples did, and study the life of Jesus as they studied it in a growing revelation. What impression should we have gotten of Jesus if we had gotten it as the Disciples did, in a series of experiences like those which came to them.

First: There was the impression which they obtained through the testimony of John. To only two of his disciples did John confess his faith in Jesus as "the lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." The general impression which they had of Him must have been simply that of a teacher who had begun as one of John's followers, but of whom John had said He was mightier than himself. John's own confession of the superiority of Jesus was the first definite impression which the disciples had concerning Him.

Second: When Jesus called the disciples to Him by the sea and said to them, "Follow Me," they knew something of Him more than they had known at the beginning, enough to give them confidence in Him, yet no very definite impression of Himself and His message. They interpreted their faith in Him in terms of their Messianic hope, but whether Jesus was the Messiah or one of a series of teachers bringing nearer the Messiah's kingdom they did not at first attempt to define.

Third: There came another period when Jesus was living at Capernaum among the disciples. They were still employed about their daily work, He sometimes sailing with them when they went forth upon the lake, at other times teaching them when they had come in after their day's catch. It is recorded that He went into Capernaum and the people were astonished at His teachings for "He taught as one having authority." There also they saw some of His mighty works. They knew of the healing of Simon's mother-in-law, in whose house He was a boarder; of the healing of a leper and most notable of all, the healing of a paralytic in connection with whose cure Jesus announced His own authority to forgive sins.

Fourth: Another and deepening impression must have followed the call of Matthew, and the new group of associates which Jesus formed through him, whereby He became known as the friend of publicans and sinners, and His own declaration that He "came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance."

Fifth: By this time it had become very plain that there was a sharp difference between Jesus' method and that of John. Jesus himself defined it in terms which, while considerate of John, made plain a marked advance in His own system and teaching.

Sixth: That there then developed another and still more marked collision—this between Jesus and the teachers of the Jewish law, appearing to be indeed a collision between Him and that law itself, and He not only healed upon the Sabbath but declared the claims of humanity, as represented in himself and the need of suffering men and women, to be superior to the traditional authority of the Sabbath.

Seventh: Finally, toward the end of His ministry He made real to them that all this represented upon His part an ideal of self-sacrifice, which was also to manifest itself in the spirit of their teaching and living. They no less than himself were to minister rather than to be ministered unto, and to find their life in losing it.

We study this growing self-revelation of Jesus, this enlargement of the appreciation on the part of the disciples, but we must not stop without reminding ourselves that this represented to them a series of grievous disappointments. Jesus was indeed a prophet, but not the kind of a prophet for whom they had been hoping. Jesus had come to bring in the kingdom of God, but to bring it very differently from the manner of their desires. Jesus had come, perhaps, even as the Messiah, but if so as a very different Messiah from the Messiah of their hopes.

So all this assent of faith in Him was in order to make a new re-adjustment in which they were to discover that nearly all that they had believed was the mere scaffolding for a faith more personal and definitely spiritual than they had yet conceived. It was no small thing that under these conditions they confessed Him to be the Christ. It was a great thing that with this word upon their lips they set themselves steadfastly to discover what was His meaning of the thought which lay behind the word that Jesus was the Messiah.

He who now accepts the Christian name ought to do it with a larger and truer meaning than any men who have lived before.

Entertaining a City

An Experiment in Municipal Provision for Pleasant Sunday Afternoons.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

HOUSTON, Texas, is one of the most modern and progressive cities of the big southwestern commonwealth. It is close enough to the sea to be connected with Galveston by a convenient electric line, which carries crowds of people down to stroll along the sea wall on pleasant days. Its railroad contact with Dallas and Fort Worth is easy. Austin and San Antonio lie conveniently out to the west, and even the cities of the Mexican border like Brownsville, Laredo, Eagle Pass, and El Paso do not seem so far away when one is once in this busy city. To be sure, all distances have to be readjusted in Texas. One journeys a long time to reach the state from the north, and then even longer to find the city he wants. A St. Louis jurist of some note recently attended a legal convention in Houston, and complained of the length of time it had taken him to come. A gentleman who sat beside him at the banquet remarked:

"I have come farther than you have, Judge. I live in El Paso."

A UNIQUE ENTERPRISE.

Houston is an aggressive, handsome, business-like place. It is rapidly growing to be one of the most important cities of the southwest. A deep-water way is under construction which will bring ocean traffic to within three miles of the City Hall, and around its basin terminal great shipping docks, of which they have a moving model in one of the city windows, will be built. Houston is fortunate in having had a benefactor who believed in doing large things for his town. The Rice estate, whose wealth was built up out of lumber and other southern products, has given to the city its Rice Institute, a promising young educational foundation, and its Rice Hotel, a most comfortable and imposing hostelry.

But one of the features of Houston's public life which is attracting much attention is its municipal entertainment, a thoroughly unique public enterprise. Three years ago under the direction of Mayor Rice the city erected a handsome Municipal hall or opera house. It is a big pavilion, capable of seating more than five thousand people, and has a large stage for musical or dramatic purposes. Aside from the main auditorium there is a banquet hall with a seating capacity of four or five hundred. The structure is admirably built and handsomely decorated, constituting a pleasing architectural feature of the city. It was intended for conventions and other public uses, and cost the city a quarter of a million dollars.

A BEGINNING MADE.

Not long afterward some of the Christian leaders of the city made a survey of the various places of amusement in Houston. It was discovered that the average attendance on the different theaters and picture shows on Sunday afternoons was about twenty thousand out of a population five times as great. Some of these amusements were of a very questionable character. Rev. W. S. Lockhart, pastor of the Central Christian Church in Houston, was chairman of this committee. In a report presented to Major Rice he urged him to censor and suppress some of these shows. The mayor threw up his hands in alarm at any such suggestion.

"But," said Mr. Lockhart, "I propose a substitute."

"What do you mean?" said the mayor.

"Why not provide for the people a free entertainment which would be attractive and wholesome, would keep them off the streets, and away from questionable amusements?" was the reply.

"Where could you have it?" asked the executive.

"The people," said Mr. Lockhart, "under your administration have just completed a Municipal hall, comfortable and commodious. Why not let the people use it in this way?"

The suggestion seemed reasonable to the mayor, and he asked for specifications as to the cost and character of the entertainments. The result was that on the first Sunday in May, 1912, the enterprise was started. Only a beginning was made that year, but for the five numbers that were run it was estimated that the average attendance was five thousand. This proved that the people liked it, and that it could be run successfully. Since that time the value of the enterprise has not been a subject of debate in Houston. The city administration has changed, but the Municipal Entertainment has gone on under Mr. Lockhart's direction. A budget of four or five thousand dollars is placed at his disposal. With this money he secures the best lecture and concert talent he can bring to Houston. The entertainments run from the end of September to the first of June. His reports are turned in to the city treasury, and his vouchers are honored like those of any other municipal department.

CITY APPROVES PLAN.

The success of the plan has been proved in a variety of ways. The people have given it their heartiest endorsement. Men, women and children of every class crowd into the Auditorium at three-thirty on Sunday afternoons. There is first a band concert by the municipal band, an admirable organization supported by the city. Its programs cover a wide range and include the best classical and sacred numbers, as well as more popular selections. After this Mr. Lockhart makes his announcements regarding future entertainments, and introduces the speaker, or other attraction of the afternoon. Among those he has brought to Houston have been Jacob Riis, Miss Florence Kelly, Charles Zeublin, Frank Dixon, Ralph Parlette, Brooks Fletcher, Montaville Flowers, Edward P. Elliott, Jerome H. Raymond, Strickland Gillilan, The Boston Musical Company, the Chicago Glee Club, the Schumann Quintette, and many others.

On "Anniversary Day," May 4, 1913, the first year's work was reviewed by citizens representing the Chamber of Central Christian Church Building, Houston, Texas.

Commerce, the Houston Real Estate Exchange, the Press Club, the Houston Labor Council, the Social Service Federation, Public Education, the religious and professional forces of the city, and the city government. The representatives of these various interests spoke in strong commendation of the plan.

OPPOSITION FROM MINISTERS

One of the interesting features of this entertainment has been the attitude of the ministers of Houston toward it. While the church membership, the women's clubs, the philanthropic organizations, and other groups indicative of the ethical and religious life of the place, have been in heartiest accord with the plan, the clergy of Houston, with a few notable exceptions, have leagued themselves in opposition to it. At first it was their plea that it would secularize the Lord's Day. But this has been disproved by the fact that much of the material offered at the Auditorium, both in the way of music and addresses, has been of a distinctly religious character. Furthermore, as a side light upon the real sentiments of these ministers, an offer was made by the ministerial association at the close of the first year's entertainments to take over the enterprise into their own hands and conduct them upon lines differing but slightly from those already approved by experience! The city government preferred to leave the entertainments in Mr. Lockhart's hands without further experimentation. It has been unfortunate that the formal attitude of the ministry has been hostile, but this has reflected only upon the ministers themselves and not seriously even upon the churches, for the religious community in Houston is thoroughly in sympathy with the work at the Auditorium.

A Sunday Afternoon Audience at the Municipal Entertainment, Houston, Texas.

This spring Mr. Lockhart has tried another experiment which promises to become a permanent feature of his municipal work. It is an institute devoted to popular instruction on themes closely related to ethical and religious life. Prof. C. R. Henderson of the Universtiy of Chicago and the writer were brought to Houston for a week. Each delivered one of the Sunday afternoon addresses, and then through the intervening week, morning and evening sessions were held in the banquet room of the Auditorium, and half hour addresses were given by each of the lecturers twice a day. Prof. Henderson took for his theme, "The New Social Spirit," discussing on successive occasions "Child Welfare," "The Treatment of Delinquent and Defective Classes," "The New Social Outlook for Women," "Municipal Employment," "Prison Reform," and similar themes. The Bible lectures dealt with the history and significance of prophecy, and featured the modern message of the ancient prophets. The attendance at these lectures was encouraging and the number of ministers and teachers in the audiences showed that some of the religious and most of the educational leaders of the South are interested in public arousal on such matters of moment.

A PROSPEROUS CHURCH.

It must not be supposed that Mr. Lockhart draws a munificent salary for his public work of this character. In fact, he has declined all remuneration of every sort and is supported only by the loyal coöperation of the First Christian Church of which he is pastor. His church work is prospering. He has a fine edifice and a loyal congregation. Mission work is springing up in the city under his direction and that of a committee on city evangelization. There is room for still another church of the Disciples in the heart of the residence district of Houston, but at present Mr. Lockhart hesitates to lead in the new enterprise for fear it would weaken the mother church. His ministry is, however, much wider than his own church, and he and Mrs. Lockhart are welcome figures in the social and philanthropic life of Houston.

I cannot but feel that Mr. Lockhart has gotten hold of an idea in this Municipal Entertainment which ought to be much more widely utilized. There are scores of cities throughout the country which ought to be providing for their people just such free entertainments as Houston is now enjoying. The actual economy of such a plan ought to appeal to every municipality which is compelled to face the question of corrupt amusements, lawlessness and vice connected with Sunday leisure. As a mere police economy it is well worth while, and its larger aspects of intellectual, artistic, ethical and religious value ought to win for it acceptance throughout the land.

Prayer of a Man Who is Making Money :: From "Men at Work."

Almighty God, who hath made everything that is made and who giveth us richly all things to enjoy, take our humble thanks for every blessing. We rejoice in the gifts and powers of mind and hand that Thou hast bestowed upon us. We are happy in the toil and striving that fill the hours with care. We are glad of the conquest we have been permitted to make over the difficulties that have beset us in the way and thwarted so many of our plans.

We thank Thee that we have known the bitterness of defeat and disappointment as well as the sweet joys of overcoming. Forgive us if in our zeal for winning the point we have forgotten the rule of loving kindness and pressed an advantage too far. Keep me from anything unchristly in my business while moving wholly within the law. May I be saved from the taint of greed and the seared conscience of a money-hungry man. Having been permitted to gather, teach me how to distribute to the point of self-sacrifice. May no selfishness ever enter in to shut my heart to the call of others in need, nor any kind of ambition for more dull my sense of duty to Thee and my brethren. May I learn to give remembering the Lord Jesus, who, though He were rich, yet for our sakes became poor that we through His poverty might be rich. May I see the needy world waiting for the open hand of consecrated givers and may the vision lead me to the doing of my share.

May the things I have always keep their proper place in my esteem and never rise to undue importance. May I know the joys of spiritual possessions and strive to lay up treasures in heaven. Raise up a Christian generation that will be able to measure its debt to Thee and to the world—and may it interpret sin and sorrow in terms of the cross of Christ. May no amount of worldly wealth ever rob me of courage needed for personal sacrifice and help me so to set my affections on things above that I may not be distracted or over-anxious about earthly affairs to my spiritual hurt.

Blessed Master of men who lived all Thy life without the aid of money and who always served men by giving to them Thine own person, teach me how insincere and how spiritually untruthful is my giving of my means if there go not with it my heart's life and prayer. Help me then first to give myself in an unreserved offering of personal service and thus prove the reality of the love that goes with all I give. When at last I see Thee as Thou art and know more of the unsearchable depths of Thine heart, may I lay my crown at Thy feet and give Thee the praise for all that is worth while in my life on earth and hereafter. Amen.

For the Conservation of Babies

A City Engaged in Infant Welfare Work

LITERALLY, a whole city of babies, nearly 6,000 of them died unnecessarily in the great metropolis of Chicago last year. In the same period more than a quarter of a million babies died in the United Staes, but of this number, with proper knowledge and care on the part of parents, more than 75 per cent could have been saved. We are shocked at the news of an Iroquois holocaust with its toll of 600 lives, our blood chills at the message of a Titanic disaster with its grim harvest of 1,500 men and women, and we stand appalled at the devastation of Pelee, burying whole villages and snuffing out of existence more than 40,000 inhabitants in a single night, but what shall we say of ourselves, who unmoved, witness the folly of a nation which wastes its savable childhood, at the rate of over 200,000 a year?

Is there no way of putting a stop to so stupendous a neglect? Have we no public conscience capable of being aroused to the enormity of our loss? Shall we, notwithstanding the enlightenment of this twentieth century, say that no remedy can be found or that the price thereof is too hard to pay? Will we fail, after having found a way of conserving our forests, our mines, our water-power, our national scenery and even the cattle upon a thousand hills, will we fail to find a way of conserving the childhood of the nation?

The city of Chicago is in the midst of the greatest welfare campaign for babies that has thus far been launched in this country. It proposes to answer some of the above questions. Under the auspices of its Infant Welfare Society an intense program of education and moral and financial support of the work is being carried on. In spite of the difficulties of the problems to be faced, the society is optimistic; and it has every reason to be. It expects to save 2,000 babies under one year of age in Chicago this year, and it bases this hope upon more than ten years of experience in which its workers have become familiar with the problem; upon the fact that London, in the seven years from 1906 to 1912 saved 185,000 babies, while New York in the same period registered a saving of 41,000 babies, thereby reducing infant mortality from 40.9 to 23.6 per 1,000, while by prenatal instruction to mothers the still-born rate underwent the marvelous reduction from 48.6 to 19.6 per 1,000.

"PROVIDENCE" AND INFANT MORTALITY.

Time was when we dragged our theology into the high death-rate of infants and said: "It is the dispensation of Providence." Now we know we were all wrong about it. It wasn't Providence at all. It was bad housing, dirty alleys, vicious industrial conditions, irresponsible fathers, ignorant mothers, a dearth of knowledge about baby hygiene, imperfect supervision of the milk supply, lax laws regarding sanitation and the non-enforcement of such laws as had accidentally found their way onto the statute books. All in all, it was a bad situation.

AN ELABORATE CAMPAIGN.

It is upon such facts as the foregoing that the Chicago workers base their hopes. But what makes the outlook for Chicago especially bright is the large visioned way in which the leaders have organized and planned the entire movement. A brief syllabus of their campaign activities, not to mention the work of their thirteen stations conducted in the congested district for the instruction of mothers, the care and examination of infants, and the distribution of modified milk, includes the following items: 780 bill-boards, seven by ten feet each, for the display of full-sized posters advertising last week as "Baby Week;" illuminated signs; display items and human interest stories running in all newspapers, local, suburban, and foreign; every dairy company during last week delivered a baby booklet with every bottle of milk, requiring 200,000 copies of the pamphlet; personal house-to-house canvassers covered the entire city within the week, their work being both educational and collecting, and they used $300,000 copies of the booklet; all the State Street stores, hotels, public windows, and thousands of vehicles carry display cards or tags advertising the campaign; the street cars will carry 4,000 advertising cards; the elevated railroads are carrying for one month 2,000 cards in their cars and posters on the station platforms; every theater program contains a subscription coupon, every moving-picture house in the city will run a 1,000-foot film of infant welfare work; every express office in the city is a depository for money or goods donated to the Infant Welfare Society; hundreds of pastors preached on infant welfare work on April 19; hotels accepted receptacles for receiving subscriptions from transients; medical societies are coöperating by furnishing data and statistics; a lecture bureau has been established to provide speakers for local organizations wishing to use their services; baby welfare societies in other cities loaned lantern slides and exhibit material; newspaper men have been called upon for service in furnishing copy for stories and advertising; leading Chicago business men in the several lines indicated are serving upon the committee on paper, printing, engraving, advertising, etc.; and the canvassing committee has secured the volunteer services of 2,000 canvassers for the residential sections of the city, while the canvass of the commercial district will be carried through by an army of 1,000 business men.

Mother and Child, modeled by Lorado Taft for the Chicago Welfare Society.

THE BABY IS KING.

"Baby Week" goes down in history as the greatest advertising week in the annals of the city. It will mean a square deal for the babies. All the immense amount of work and expense involved in the above campaign is gratuitous. Paper, printing, advertising, bill-boards, car space, express service—all is being donated so that 100 per cent of all subscriptions can be applied directly to saving the babies. In honor of "Baby Week," Lorado Taft has designed a beautiful model of mother and child, an imprint of which is used on all the campaign literature, theater programs, tags, letters, advertisements and posters. Across State and Madison Sts., hangs a huge electric lighted sign, with a copy of this striking picture, and at the bottom are figures showing the amount collected each day for the welfare work. Through such activity of infant welfare societies we are entering a new era of social construction; we are establishing a new kingdom —the kingdom of childhood—and in that kingdom, to which strong men and women are devoting their time and strength, the Baby is King!

"The Potter and the Clay"

Jeremiah Learns a Lesson on the Purpose of Life While Watching a Potter at His Wheel.

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

THERE was a time in the life of Jeremiah when he did not get much outdoor exercise. He was boarding at the home of Mr. Ahikim, and whenever he got outside the garden gate there was danger that some one would throw a brick at him. But there were intervals in which he found it safe to venture abroad between Sundays, and now and then he picked up themes for his sermons in a rather interesting way.

He paid a visit to the pottery which was located near at hand. He had a general notion how earthen vessels were made, but had had no occasion to notice it particularly; but whether Mrs. Ahikim wanted him to go down and buy her a bowl, or whether he was out for a walk and stopped in as he went by, he felt that God had guided him there.

THE CRAFTSMAN AT HIS WORK.

He stood and watched the potter at his work, and he viewed it with that interest which every earnest craftsman feels in seeing another man do his job and do it well. I like to see a farmer, a sailor, a blacksmith, a photographer, a printer, at his task, doing it not merely well, but with that skill and dexterity which betoken entire mastery of the art. The more I try some of these tasks the more confident I feel that I was called to preach. However, I have once or twice dipped my fingers in the wet clay, and have turned the potter's wheel, and oftener I have stood, as Jeremiah did, and watched a real potter do it well. A few years ago I was at Oberammergau, and I slept in the home of Anton Lang, who plays the part of the Christ. He is a potter, and I watched him at his work, as Jeremiah watched the potter in Jerusalem.

The potter's wheel is one of the oldest pieces of machinery ever invented by man. Very nearly all ancient nations employed it. It was simple; a mere wooden wheel, fixed on a pivot and turned by one hand. With the other hand one shaped the lump of clay into some kind of a dish or water-pot. The size of the vessel depended upon the size of the lump of clay, but beyond this, everything depended upon the skill and will of the potter; whether it was a flat basin or a flaring vase or a tapering jar depended upon his desire and craftmanship who with his thumb on the inside and his first finger on the outside, gauged the thickness of the clay between and gradually shaped the lines of the vessel which he planned to make.

CLAY BENEATH THE POTTER'S HAND.

The potter's wheel now turns by machinery, but the principle is the same. Barring a few improvements, which mostly count for speed rather than for any inherent change in the operation, the potter's wheel today is the same that it was in Jeremiah's day, and it is fascinating to stand as the prophet stood and watch the lump of clay beneath the potter's hand take on lines that fit the vessel for its intended use.

Yet Jeremiah noticed that the potter did not invariably succeed in his first lump. Sometimes his own skill failed to keep pace with his ambition. Sometimes there was something wrong in the temper of the clay. The vessel would be shaped as if to make of it a beautiful vase, and right at the top some fault would be apparent that spoiled it for its purpose. The prophet was interested in watching to see what the potter would do. He did not throw the vessel away. He made something out of it. He cut it off below the defect, and shaped it for utility instead of for beauty. It was no longer fit for the parlor, but there was a place for it in the kitchen. The labor which he had spent upon it was not wholly wasted. "He made it another vessel."

THE UNSEEN POWER.

The emphasis is on the "it." We might have expected the text to say, "He made another vessel." He might have thrown the whole lump back, wet it, and placed it again on the wheel, to make a vessel completely new. But the marred vessel he counted worth saving.

There is an element of hopelessness in a text like this. Round and round goes the potter's wheel and men are but clay upon it, whirled and forced into shapes they dimly understand while the wheel of life is turned by an Unseen Power. It is the perpetual cry of those who rebel against life that we are but clay, and do not know our Potter; that we are made or marred by grim fate and circumstance. What is life but a machine? What are we but material for some purpose which we do not know? Is not birth a misfortune? Is not life a tragedy? What is the meaning and purpose of it all? It seems to us abritrary and relentless.

But this is not the whole lesson of the parable nor of life. The clay itself had value in the sight of the Potter, and the badly formed vase was still good for something. It is not quite so arbitrary as it seems. The Potter has an eye for everything of use and beauty that can be made out of each particular life.

Our lives are marred, all of them. They are marred by our sorrows and pains. They are marred by infirmities which we inherit. They are marred by what we count misfortunes which we undergo, or physical weaknesses, on intellectual handicaps.

REMADE LIVES.

Our lives are marred by our fellowmen; by the betrayal of our trust; by the harsh, fierce, wicked injuries, inflicted upon us by others.

Our lives are marred by our own selfish, wilful limitations. What small, unworthy vessels we make of ourselves! How we ruin our own interests, reducing our own capacity for holding large purposes, and cherishing fine ideals!

Now the interesting thing of it is, that notwithstanding all this marring of our lives, we are precious in the sight of God. He still finds ways of doing something with us. If he cannot do with us all that his perfect goodness would seek to do, he will do the best he can with our human weakness. "He knoweth our frame. He remembereth that we are dust."

How many are the lives re-made! How many of those who fail begin again and finally succeed! Let us not complain against the wheel, but seek to provide better clay! Let us not cry out against fate, but trust a kind Providence that will shape our lives for good! Let us not resent it that the vessel of our hope is so small! Let us fill it to the brim with the best ambitions of which we are capable!

BETTERED BY MARRING.

The text might seem to imply that the secondary use of our lives was less important than the original one. This is not true. Sometimes the uses after marring are greater than before. Jacob, after his denial, was made a better man Sometimes our very faults teach us lessons, and the very wrath of man is caused to praise God.

THE BIBLE IN THE SOUTH.

Devotion to the Bible has made the "Old Dominion" (Virginia) a cradle of liberty and the "home of more illustrious men than any like body of land in the New World," Secretary Daniels declared in addressing the Centennial of the Virginia Bible Society. "In cottage and in colonial home," the secretary said, "the Bible was the book and gives an insight as to how character was made in old Virginia, and this was the source and inspiration of the staying and sturdy qualities that have enabled Virginia to give so many useful lives to the country." Mr. Daniels said the world has held an incorrect impression of the spirit of the South prior to the Civil War, and that there "persists the fiction that Puritan New England was more God-fearing and more scrupulous in the old-fashioned observance of the Sabbath than the people of Virginia and North Carolina." The current slogan, "back to the farm," said the secretary, should have its counterpart in "back to the Bible" in present day religious life.

BIBLE DISTRIBUTION IN CHINA.

The American Bible Society has recently issued a circular giving facts as to the work it is doing in China. It has been distributing Bibles in China for one hundred years. Its work began with the printing of Morrison's translation of the New Testament in 1814. Since that time the society has distributed 35,000 volumes of Scripture. The first translations were in classical Chinese, which is understood by the educated only. The New Testament was translated into Mandarin, which is the court language and is understood by three-fourths of the people, in 1872, and the Old Testament into the same language in 1874. In 1912 a new edition of the whole Bible was formed by combining the Mandarin Old Testament and New Testament, but a committee is at work on a new Mandarin translation which will be completed in three years.

DR. GRENFELL HONORED.

In the new Grenfell Fishermen's Institute in St. Johns, Newfoundland, a tablet has been recently unveiled, inscribed as follows: "This house was built for the welfare of seaman by the built for the welfare of seamen by the united by the Christian work of Wilfred T. Grenfell, missionary on the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador." Dr. Grenfell has been twenty-two years in Labrador, and among the results of his work are included five hospitals, beside mission schools and orphanages.

A Hymn-Book of a New Sort

PUBLISHERS BRING OUT A COLLECTION OF HYMNS THAT ALL MAY SING—JEW, GENTILE, PROTESTANT, CATHOLIC—SOCIAL SERVICE IDEALS EMPHASIZED.

A leading publishing house is to bring out a new hymnal. The book is to contain the hundred hymns which were assembled by The Survey in its New Year's issue. This collection, says the Survey, is "an attempt to set hearts beating, toes topping, organs pealing and whole congregations of men and women singing out the social faith that is in them." It was intended to bring together hymns that the Jew, Gentile, Protestant and Catholic could sing together with equal fervor. Twelve jurors were chosen: three organists, three writers, the editor of one of the recent hymnals, five college professors, the head of a musical settlement, settlement workers, and a college president.

There are thirty-five "Hymns of Aspiration and Faith." The opening selection is one written only last year by W. Russel Bowing, beginning:

Splendor of the thoughts of God
For the life of men,
Visions of the saints and seers
Burn for us again!
From the night of ancient wrongs
Wake our eyes to see
Dawning in the skies the day
God shall bring to be.

In this first division are the names of Addison, Richard Watson Gilder, Charles Kingsley, Whittier, Washington Gladden and Wentworth Higginson. Dr. North's classic is in this division:

Where cross the crowded ways of life,
Where sound the cries of race and clan,
Above the noise of selfish strife,
We hear Thy voice, O, Son of Man.
In haunts of wretchedness and need,
On shadow'd thresholds dark with fears,
From paths where hide the lures of green,
We catch the vision of Thy tears.

The following is the closing stanza of a hymn by Frederick L. Hosmer sung to the tune of the Battle Hymn of the Republic:

Lead on, O cross of martyr faith, with thee is victory;
Shine forth, O stars and reddening dawn,
the full day yet shall be;
On earth His kingdom cometh, and with joy our eyes shall see;
Our God is marching on.

There are fifteen "Hymns of Liberty and Justice" in which are the names of Milton, Lowell, Tennyson and a number of the newer singers. The third division has six "Hymns to Peace." Of "Labor and Conflict" there are seventeen. Here come the names of Henry Van Dyke, Gladden, Whittier, Longfellow, Maltbie Babcock and Kingsley. One of the hymns, by George E. Day, written this year, begins:

O Master of the callous hand,
The workshop and the bench and plane,
We know that Thou canst understand
Our hopes, our labors and our pain!
We see the drops of honest toil
With which Thy hardy face was wet
And in Thy beauty loving eye
The craftsman's kindling pleasure glow
To see the finished work put by,
The joy that patient workmen know;
We answer gladly to Thy call,
O, Master Workman of us all.

There are seventeen "Hymns of Brotherhood," taken from Swinburne, Faber, Markham, but mostly from the minor singers who are bursting into song to herald the new age. We take a stanza from Markham:

Come, clear the way, then clear the way!
Blind creeds and kings have had their day.
Break the dead branches from the path:
Our hope is in the aftermath—
Our hope is in heroic men,
Star-led to build the world again.
To this event the ages ran:
Make way for brotherhood—make way for man.

TEARS.

When I consider life and its few years—
A wisp of fog betwixt us and the sun;
A call to battle, and the battle done
Ere the last echo dies within our ears;
A rose choked in the grass; an hour of fears;
The gusts that past a darkening shore do beat;
The burst of music down an unlistening street,
I wonder at the idleness of tears.
Ye old, old dead, and ye of yesternight,
Chieftains, and bards, and keepers of the sheep,
By every cup of sorrow that you had,
Loose me from tears, and make me see aright
How each hath back what once he stayed to weep;
Homer his sight; David his little lad!

Lizette Woodworth Reese.

UPHILL.

Does the road wind uphill all the way?
Yes, to the very end.
Will the day's journey take the whole long day?
From morn to night, my friend.
But is there for the night a resting place?
A roof for when the slow, dark hours begin.
May not the darkness hide it from my face?
You cannot miss that inn.

Shall I meet other wayfarers at night?
Those who have gone before.
Then must I knock, or call when just in sight?
They will not keep you waiting at the door.

Shall I find comfort, travel-sore and weak?
Of labor you shall find the sum.
Will there be beds for me and all who seek?
Yea, beds for all who come.

—Christina Georgina Rossetti.

AT THE ROAD'S END.

"Though the day be ever so long,
It ringeth at length to evensong,
And the weary worker goes to his rest,
With words of peace and pardon blest.
Though the path be never so steep,
And rough to walk on and hard to keep,
It will lead, when the weary road is trod,
To the Gates of Pearl—the City of God."

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

I am enclosing $1.50 to renew my subscription to the Christian Century, we would not want to try to get along without the Century. My wife and I, both, read it through every week.

We have not found many Disciples in this part of the Canadian West. I came here a year ago to do evangelistic work, but the plans which I had at the time did not mature. Besides I found the country about here shepherdless. I was besought by people of all denominations to remain with them. There were organizations of Presbyterians and Methodists, but neither was able to support a regular minister. I was asked by the Presbyterians of Spring Lake and Fiske to preach for them. Working with them I found a family or two of Disciples, some Baptists, Church of England (Episcopalian) and others. I realized that under the present conditions it would be folly to try to organize a church of our own. Our people were too few, and besides we are almost unknown to the great mass of Canadians. They are not sure of us yet. They imagine that we are something to be taken warily. When we tell them we are the standard bearers of Christian Union, they are ready to give us a chance. The Canadians are experimenting in church union and the term is fast coming to be the pet in religious circles of the West.

The call of the Canadian West has been ringing in my heart for some years. I felt that I belonged to Canada, and that my own Canadian West needed me more than any where else. That scene enacted between that heroic woman of Alberta, Mrs. Bogges and our beloved Princess Long, at the Topeka convention, I have never been able to wipe out.

I came to Fiske where I had some friends. I felt that I was needed here and I have never sought any other field.

I took charge of these two fields that I have mentioned. Both organizations are now really union organizations. During the first six months the Methodists of both places held aloof from the union. Last April the Methodists of Fiske suggested that a union meeting of all church members be called. At this meeting it was decided to unite forces and ask me to become their pastor. The experiment was to continue for six months. At the end of that time I was again asked to continue as pastor, and the union arrangment to continue. The Methodists at Spring Lake are likely to unite with the others in the springtime. During the summer a Presbyterian student supplied that place. A few weeks ago they again asked me to take up the work, which I did. It makes it a very long drive from my home. It is sixteen miles away. Fiske is ten miles and Spring Lake, six miles farther. The two fields together hardly pay a living salary. In order to make it possible I took up a homestead. That does not help much yet, but in three years we can prove up and have that back of us. So we are fighting it through, for that is what it really means.

I noticed in the last Year Book, which was published shortly after my coming to Canada, that I was listed among those "not in the regular ministry." But I landed in the country Sunday morning and preached Sunday night. I preached the two following Sundays and with the exception of two Sundays since, I believe, I have not failed to preach either once or twice each Sunday. During the winter I drove six miles and back and missed only one Sunday when I had the grip. Time and again I drove to my appointment when the thermometer registered anywhere from 30 to 45 degrees below zero. All summer I had a twenty mile tramp, ten miles each way, each Sunday unless I was fortunate enough to secure a neighbor's horse. This winter, with the two appointments, I will have a drive of thirty-two miles each week.

Am I in the regular ministry of the Disciples, do you think, or must I call out the few Disciples from the others and organize and preach to them in order to be a regular? So far I have not been able to dig up any conscientious scruples in regard to my attitude. In fact we all seem to be enjoying ourselves too well to question our orthodoxy. Well, not all. One good lady says she hopes to see union and prays daily for it, but hopes when it does come we will all be Methodists. She is living her life apart.

Fiske, Sask. H. H. REED.

All the year books in the world could not rob this man of his right to be called a minister in the Disciples of Christ. He is doing precisely what Thomas Campbell organized the Christian Association in western Pennsylvania to do, and what the Brush Run Church was organized to do. Let us hope that the denominationalizing influence that entered so early into the Elder Campbell's movement may not enter into this happy fellowship on the Canadian frontier.—THE EDITOR.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

What Women are Doing

Nearly four hundred women applied for patents in England during the last year.

A bill providing for women judges in the children's court has been introduced in the New York Legislature.

Mlle. Helen Caragioni, a Roumanian girl, declares that she will fly across the Atlantic Ocean during the present year.

Mrs. Lydia C. Barnes voted "dry" at the election held in Lockport, Ill., April 7. But she had to live to be one hundred years old to do it.

Governor Major of Missouri appoints Mrs. John C. Boyd, of Salem, Mo., treasurer of Dent County, to succeed her husband, who recently died.

A Moslem woman has been appointed by the Turkish minister of public instruction to be head instructor of gymnastics in a "Sultanian" school.

Miss Helen Cudahy, youngest daughter of Patrick Cudahy, the wealthy packer, has entered a Boston hospital as a student in the school for trained nurses.

Queen Eleanor, of Bulgaria, while in the United States will study hospitals, a subject to which the war gave a dreadful importance in her country. She maintains three private hospitals.

Four thousand members of Chicago women's clubs are preparing for the twelfth biennial convention of the General Federation of Woman's Clubs to be held in Chicago next June. There will be 3,471 delegates to the convention.

Miss Mary E. Miller, forty-eight, lawyer and active suffragist, died in Chicago recently. Miss Miller had just received a fee of $35,000 in a case before the supreme court, said to be the largest ever paid to a woman lawyer. She was born in Michigan.

Queen Liliuokalani, ex-ruler of Hawaii, recently re-entered her old-time palace, now the capital of the territory, for the first time since her dethronement. The Queen is said to have remarked, with tears in her eyes, that she rejoiced in the present prosperity of her former kingdom.

The first woman's church in England, the Church of the New Ideal, was opened at Wallasey, London, recently. A large congregation attended at each service, one of which was confined to women. The church is officered entirely by women. Rev. Hetty Baker, of Plymouth, preached at each service.

Canada's first woman judge is Mrs. R. R. Jamison of Calgary, who has lately been appointed to deal with cases in the juvenile court. Calgary has three women on its city planning commission, two on the night school board (for technical education) and a woman school trustee, who ran ahead of all the other candidates. A police woman is to be appointed as soon as a suitable person is found.

Women thronged the city hall in Kenosha, Wis., April 14, when Mrs. Beatrice Ives Welles, the first Kenosha woman ever named to an elective office in the city, was inaugurated as school commissioner. She was elected by the largest majority ever given any candidate on the school ticket. Mrs. Welles came to Kenosha from Chicago ten years ago. She is a member of the Kenosha Equal Suffrage League and has been active in the suffrage fight in the state.

A large appropriation—$165,000 instead of only $25,000—for the children's bureau has been voted by Congress. The increased amount will enable the bureau, under the direction of its chief, Miss Julia C. Lathrop, to carry on a greatly enlarged work. Among the undertakings will be an investigation into questions relating to the prevention of infant mortality and dangerous occupations of children. Part of the government money given to the children's bureau will be saved by the wiping out of the mileage allowance, or graft, as it is sometimes called. Senators and representatives have been allowed 20 cents a mile to and from Washington, at an estimated cost to the people of $200,000 a year, but the house committee on appropriations recommended that only actual traveling expenses for each member and dependents be allowed, which would mean the saving of half the sum last named.

NEW DECALOGUE FOR PARENTS.

Mary M. Bartelme, judge of the girls' court of Chicago, declares the three "parental disgraces" as being indifference, overindulgence and overseverity. Therefore, for parents in general, and particularly for parents who exemplify one or all of these "disgraces" in the rearing of their children, she has set forth a new decalogue. Its provisions have been thus briefly summarized:

1. Make the children wash the dishes, clean windows, sweep, scrub, make beds and do ordinary housework. Hard work will make them strong.
2. Open your homes to young men or boy friends of your daughters, and to the girl friends of your sons.
3. Coax your children's confidences. The girl who confides in her parents is scarcely liable to go wrong. Neither is the boy. No girl goes wrong unless some boy goes with her.
4. Take an interest in your children. Don't be the indifferent parent who doesn't know what the children are doing.
5. Don't be a greedy parent. The child who goes to work on a falsified age certificate very frequently turns out to be a thief. He starts his business life on a very foundation of dishonesty.
6. Don't let your girls go unescorted to summer parks, to skating rinks or to theaters.
7. Keep your girls pleasantly employed in the home. Lack of useful occupation often drives a girl to harmful pastimes.
8. Don't let your home be, as are so many modern homes, mere places for the children to room, get their meals and turn in orders for new dresses, new suits and luxuries.
9. Help to get more police women. Aid in teaching the men who trap young girls to be afraid of the star on a woman's breast.
10. Help spread the English language among foreigners, and so protect the foreign girls in our midst. Urge the formation of legal employment bureaus, so that girls can be placed in good places with decent wages and their environment inspected.

CEYLON CHRISTIANS CONSECRATED.

An exchange reports that, while visiting a college in Ceylon a few months ago, Dr. John R. Mott found a band of students so poor that sixteen of them occupied one room. Near the building was a banana plantation to the cultivation of which these youths devoted all their spare time.

"What do you boys do with the money that you earn from this fruit enterprise?" inquired Dr. Mott.

For answer, they took him to the beach and pointed to an island far out at sea.

"Two years ago," they explained, "we sent one of our graduates there. He started a school, which has since developed into a church. We are going to send him to another island this year."

They also said that they required the cook to lay aside every tenth handful of rice, which they sell in order to have Christ preached a little more widely.

EVA BOOTH'S POLICEMAN.

"You are under arrest! You are disturbing the peace!" snarled a policeman, breaking off her first public prayer in the streets of London. She was still in her early 'teens, a slight slip of a girl with no means of resistance, and as the bullying officer tightened his grip on her arm, she was dragged shrinkingly with him.

But the action aroused the sympathies of the rough crowd as a lighted match fires a key to gunpowder. In an instant the policeman and his prisoner were surrounded, and before the officer could raise his voice he was beaten to the pavement under a shower of fists.

It was the girl prisoner who, forgetting his rough grip and the cell to which he would have dragged her, appealed to the throng in his defense. When the crowd finally retreated, the policeman was groaning with two broken legs and a mass of bruises from head to foot.

For weeks the little girl in the big Army bonnet paid faithful visits to the helpless man in the hospital, and when he was released a warmer friend Eva Booth and her cause could not have found in all England. To this day she receives letters in a rough, sprawling hand, signed simply, "Your policeman."—Hugh C. Weir, in The World Today.

BARNACLES.

My soul is sailing through the sea,
But the Past is heavy and hindereth me.
The Past hath crusted and cumbrous shells
That hold the flesh of cold sea smell about my soul.

The huge waves wash, the high waves roll.
Each barnacle clingeth and worketh dole
And hindereth me from sailing!

Old Past, let go and drop i' the sea
Till fathomless waters cover thee!
For I am living and thou art dead;

Thou drawest back, I strive ahead the day to find.
Thy shells unbind! Night comes behind
I needs must hurry with the wind
And trim me best for sailing.

THE PRESIDENT AND MEXICO.

MR. BRYAN and the President have the sympathy and support of every devotee of the Peace ideal in their determination to exhaust the last resource for peaceable adjustment of our trouble with Mexico before asking Congress to declare war. War—technical, acknowledged, irrevocable war—may come, may indeed be upon us when these words are read. But the President's policy of discriminating between the people of Mexico and the Huerta government puts the United States in the position of doing international police duty in Mexico, a duty that would probably be performed by a concert of the Powers were it not for the Monroe Doctrine.

The President is unwilling to declare war against Mexico. But he is not unwilling to use the armed forces of the United States to run down a murderer and bandit who has gotten hold of the reins of power and has heaped indignities upon the United States.

The Peace ideal is not being set back by the doing of this international police duty. All our dreams of disarmament have left a place for an international police force to patrol the coasts of all nations and deal with rogues and usurpers as President Wilson is now dealing with Huerta and his followers.

Even if, through distrust of the benevolent purposes of the United States, the hostile Mexican factions unite against us, and the necessity is thrust upon us of invading and investing and finally subduing the whole country, history will approve the President's course in initiating his campaign on the principle of reprisal rather than war.

Meantime every patriot hopes that the President's action from this time forward will be prompt and vigorous and decisive. If we must fight, let it be fast and hard.

And may God soon bring us to peace again!

THE CHURCH AND THE BIBLE.

A DEVOUT and reverent Christian man brought a conversation on religion to a shocking conclusion the other day by declaring impatiently, but of course facetiously, that the best thing that could happen to religion would be to suppress the Bible! There is so much confusion about the Bible, so many sects are built upon this and upon that interpretation of the Bible, so many silly doctrines alleged to be taught by the Bible engross the people's minds that it is no wonder one sometimes falls into a mood when it seems that the error of which the book of God is the occasion bulks larger than the truth it reveals.

It is important to call attention again and again to the fact that neither Christianity nor true Christian unity are "based upon" the Bible, but that they underlie the Bible. A writer in the Christian Union Quarterly, an Episcopalian, states this so clearly that his words deserve to be pondered. He says:

> Most people think of the Church as founded on the Bible. As a matter of fact, the Church which our Lord established was actively at work for more than twenty years before one line of the New Testament was written. Before the New Testament was finished she had been at work for fifty years, and had gathered a great flock of the faithful out of the world. Three hundred years had passed before the Church decided, out of many writings, claiming to be inspired, what books should make up the New Testament. . . . . The sad delusion and historical error of supposing that the Church is built on the Scriptures is the root and cause of all the divisions and sects that have sprung up and wrecked the faith of multitudes, and divided the Christian world into many denominations. All the recent denominations, the oldest of which is not more than three hundred and fifty years old, have been founded on the modern notion that any one can set up a Church, based on some text or some view of the Bible. We churchmen rejoice that our Church, the Church of the apostles, the Church of history, does not rest upon the Bible, but that the Bible rests upon the Church. The Church is a divine institution, born on the day of Pentecost, long before a line of the New Testament was written. The New Testament is the work of the apostolic Church. The Church is the depository of the faith once for all delivered to the saints, and enshrined in the word of God. The Bible proves the doctrines of the Church, and bears witness to the practice of the Church.

Those engaged in the restoration of primitive Christianity would do well to remind ourselves of the indisputable fact here set forth and take its obvious lesson seriously to heart. The pastors who frankly make clear to their people the truth concerning the origin and true place of the Bible suffer little loss to those many modern cults and sects which base their claims upon the alleged teaching of some text of Scripture.

PLAY BALL!

THE base ball season is open. We are glad of it. It is a great game, and one worthy of a great nation. It is a clean, wholesome game. There is a minimum of gambling connected with it, and the men in it must be temperate and clean. Every now and then some man who has been a good ball player becomes a minister, and finds it not at all to his disadvantage to have cultivated hand and eye and muscles of leg and arm in that good sport. It is a game that takes the whole population out of doors. It is a game that encourages the American citizen to take off his coat, sit on the bleachers in the open air, drink a bottle of non-alcoholic pop, and shout himself hoarse. It is a game that utilizes vacant lots for small boys' benefit. It encourages them to cultivate many of the manly virtues, and some that are distinctly heroic. May no other game ever usurp the foremost place which base ball has won in the American heart. Play ball!

A MATTER OF PROPORTION.

IN A RECENT one-volume encyclopedia two pages are given to "London" and four lines to the topic "hell." On what basis this proportion was adjusted we may not be quite sure. It was a matter of frequent comment in the older systems of theology that the chapters on "heaven" were short and the chapters on "eternal life" were very long. The proportion would almost certainly be the reverse in any modern treatise. The question of proportion is one of constant difficulty and affects not only editors of books of reference but editors of every other kind, and other people as well. Only a very few of our life questions deal with definite choices between something unqualifiedly right and something else unqualifiedly wrong. The rest are in good part questions of proportion.

THE REAL ISSUE.

IF THERE is any contest between science and religion, it is not the question whether the plagues of Egypt admit of a natural explanation, nor whether Jonah was swallowed by the whale, nor whether Joshua's prayer could have stopped the revolution of the earth without uprooting the trees and engulfing the earth in a tidal wave of oceans rushing forward at a rate of a thousand miles an hour. Those questions are reminiscent of a past long gone. The real question between science and religion is how the race can be improved so long as we build so many hospitals and asylums. Science says the struggle for existence must go on that there may be an elimination of the unfit. Religion says that the strong must bear the burden of the weak. Here is the burden of the tax-payer, and the burden of the sociologist. England finds it hard to secure men tall enough and vigorous enough for her army, and sees with apprehension the decrease of native-born seamen in her merchant marine. Must we kill our criminals, and smother our insane, to keep the taint from corrupting the blood of the next generations? Or is there a way to substitute for the harsh but beneficent processes of the struggle for existence the law of Christian kindness? This is the real issue.

SUNDAY EVENING CLUBS.

FOR several years in this city there has been an organization known as "The Sunday Evening Club," holding regular meetings in Orchestra Hall. For the most part it has coöperated with the University in securing notable speakers for its platform. The University preachers have usually appeared at night in Orchestra Hall. During the past winter, however, several organizations of a similar sort have taken form in the city. The "West Side Sunday Night Club" has been running successfully for two months at the Third Presbyterian Church, with a neighborhood constituency. The "North Shore Sunday Evening Club" has just been organized at the North Shore Congregational Church.

On the South Side something of a similar character has been under way at the South Park Avenue Methodist Church, and it is understood that the churches in Evanston are to begin a like enterprise, either in May or in the early autumn. This is a significant movement. There is no reason why a group of churches should not unite in such a neighborhood plan. There is manifold value in the scheme. It is economical from almost every point of view. It brings the people together in a manner that must prophesy closer unity. It proves to the non-church-going people a far more attractive and convincing place of worship than any of the churches can offer singlehanded.

Why should not such a plan be tried in smaller cities, where the church-going people could assemble in a single place of worship under far more inspiring conditions than they are accustomed to find in an evening service, and with results more helpful to the entire community?

THE GREAT DAY OF THE LORD.

THE great day of the Lord is at hand for the saloon. The time is in sight when nearly all our nation will be under prohibition law. The gains are constant and continuous. The men whose business depends on the sale of liquor are disconsolate. Righteousness is gaining. Temperance is extending the area of its influence. And judgment to come is at hand for those who traffic in the bodies and souls of their fellow-men. The fight will require many years of continuous effort. Not yet can we lay our armor down. But the great day of the Lord is at hand so far as the saloon is concerned.

UNSCRAMBLING BAPTIST EXEGESIS.

IF DISCIPLES of the present generation are sometimes inclined to criticize the fathers for their seemingly contentious attitude toward their Baptist brethren, it would soften their judgment a good bit to read the discussion now going on in Baptist newspapers on the subject of so-called "open-membership."

They would have more sympathy with the fathers.

We speak in no unkindness when we say that the Baptist way of handling passages of Scripture that deal with baptism comes about as near inducing exasperation as Pastor Russell's or Mrs. Eddy's way of handling certain other passages. Baptists, of course, share with Disciple fathers the crude notion that baptism in the New Testament is immersion in water, and in their attempts to avoid the doctrine of "water salvation" they have accustomed themselves to play fast and loose with the plain statements of the Scripture. Disciples, on the other hand, long ago formed the habit of looking at these Scriptures unflinchingly. Their thinking is as clear as daylight on the design of baptism, the place to be given to it in Christian experience.

When our Lord says: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," and when Peter says, "Repent and be baptized . . . for the remission of your sins," and when Ananias says to Saul, "Arise and be baptized and wash away thy sins," the Disciple mind cannot do otherwise than infer that baptism has something to do with salvation, that its place is among the factors that condition salvation.

The very different habit of the Baptist mind toward such Scriptural statements is indicated by nearly every writer in the discussion now current in their denomination. One writer in The Standard (Chicago), quoted by The Christian Century two weeks ago, gives a revealing glimpse into the Baptist mind when he says with delicious naivete:

> When we came to read them [such passages as the above] with our present inquiry clearly defined, we found that these passages on their face only seemed to make baptism a condition of salvation or remission of sins, and we long ago learned how to rid them of that meaning by interpretation, and having gotten rid of their apparent surface teaching of the essentiality of baptism to salvation, we found that they contained no teaching as to the essentiality of baptism to anything.

Of the two bodies the Disciples have a much easier time in adjusting their mental habit to the truth about baptism.

All they have to do is to recognize that baptism is not immersion at all, nor, of course, sprinkling, nor any physical act whatever, but the social and moral act of initiation into the Church of Christ. They do not have to change their exegesis of the Scripture texts an iota. It will hardly be denied by any one that baptism in the true sense of induction into the Church is a factor in salvation, and an ethical factor, too.

But Baptists have to undergo a process of unscrambling their exegesis as well as retranslating the Greek word.

And that is not so easy.

BANDITS IN PALESTINE.

THE Associated Press of last Friday announced that telegrams from Tiberias, Palestine, conveyed the information to Constantinople that a party of teachers from the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut were attacked by bandits a short distance from the Sea of Galilee and robbed, one of them being wounded. The reports were quite meager, and at first some alarm was felt for Mr. Herbert L. Willett, Jr., who had expected to accompany a group of the teachers on an overland trip from Beirut to Jerusalem during the Greek Easter vacation at the college. Advices written a fortnight ago intimate, however, that he thought it unlikely he would accompany this party, as water conditions in Jerusalem are very unfavorable this year. The rain has been very light, cisterns are practically empty, and advices have been sent out by the ecclesiastical authorities in Jerusalem to stop as far as possible all pilgrimage to the city.

Reports of this character indicated that it would be an unfavorable time for the teachers to visit the Holy City, and Mr. Willett thought at that time that he should content himself with shorter trips to Sidon, Damascus and portions of Lebanon. In the absence of cablegrams it is hoped that the damage done by the attack was small, and it seems probable that Mr. Willett was not with the party. However, it is an illustration of the lawless character of life in Palestine off the most frequented roads, and of the inability or indifference of the Turkish government to compel order among the people.

A SAD LESSON.

MANY a moral might be pointed from the tragic death by suicide of Prof. Harry Thurston Peck. One of them is that genius and industry and ambition cannot be a substitute for high moral purpose. He was a brilliant writer, and his work as editor of the Bookman was of unusual penetration and power, but the quality of his literary product deteriorated with his moral downfall. He suffered from a malady of the brain, and to this, it is likely, must be attributed much of his unsteadiness of purpose, and something, perhaps, of his moral dereliction. His case calls for charity and pity, and not for unsparing condemnation. The wife he wronged came back to nurse him in his last illness. Of such fine forgiveness woman's love, yes and man's love, is capable. All honor to her. Professor Peck turned to Christian Science, and his alleged cure was widely announced. His was one of the many cases in which the reaction follows the supposed recovery. There is no sufficient evidence that a pistol bullet is an error of mortal mind.

Methodist Hospital Gets Million.

A new day has dawned upon Wesley Hospital, Chicago, one of the most useful of Methodist benevolent institutions. James Deering, son of the late William Deering, of harvester fame, announced on April 15, that he would give a million dollars for Wesley Hospital. The endowment of the hospital prior to this gift was only $200,000, and yet last year $34,000 worth of charity work was done. A provision of Mr. Deering's gift is that "all of the income be donated to free work for the benefit of the needy." Provision is made, however, for the erection of buildings, etc., under the strictures of this condition. At the meeting of trustees and others at which the announcement of the gift was made, Dr. A. W. Harris, president of Northwestern University, was elected trustee of the hospital to fill out the unexpired term of William Deering.

Cairo, Egypt, May Have University.

The United Presbyterian reports a remarkable meeting held in the dining room of Schenley Hotel, Pittsburg. Five prominent citizens—two of them United Presbyterians—made a feast and sent handsomely engraved invitations to three hundred business and professional men to attend. The unusualness of the occasion appeared in a detail accompanying the invitation, which was a card bearing the legend, in substance if not in form, "No subscriptions will be taken." The meeting was unusual in the fact that there were no clergymen present except three who sat at the speakers' table. There were present judges, lawyers, bankers, engineers, capitalists, merchants and manufacturers. The meeting was unusual in the object in whose promotion the addresses revealed it was held—the establishing of a well equipped university at the "center of the center" of Mohammedanism—Cairo, Egypt. The meeting was unusual in the quality of the addresses and the character of the speakers. The decorations were unusual—the grouping of the flag of Turkey and the Stars and Stripes, with a large map in the center showing in green color the scope of Mohammedan domination and strength. Among the speakers were Thomas Patterson, a leading Pittsburg attorney; Dr. Samuel M. Zwemer, who is leading in the crusade in this country for Moslem missions, and Dr. John R. Mott.

English Preacher at Yale University.

Dr. C. Silvester Horne "stands out in England today as the supreme type of preacher who identifies the Christian gospel with the social and political life of the age." Dr. Horne has recently severed his connection with the great Congregational institutional Church of London, known the world over as Whitefields, because of the burden which membership in the House of Commons imposed upon him. The Congregationalist speaks as follows of Dr. Horne's work at Whitefields: "Dr. Horne made Whitefields by his personality, his courage and his gifts of initiative. From a comfortable armchair in the Western suburbs he moved to Whitefields when it was almost a derelict shell. He made it the symbol of an aggressive, evangelical stronghold amid a pagan environment. He fought social evils, grappled with publicans, brothel keepers, slum owners and all the allied forces of mammonism with a holy zeal that staggered the people who thought Christianity was a thing altogether too respectable to be feared. Meanwhile, he offered the young people of inner London the preventive medicines against vice—clean recreations and happy social intercourse." Dr. Horne has chosen for the theme of his "Lyman Beecher Lectures," which he is delivering at Yale, "The Romance of Preaching."

Dr. T. C. Hall at Ford Hall, Boston.

Dr. Thomas C. Hall, of Union Theological Seminary, New York, spoke two weeks ago at the Ford Hall meeting, in Boston. The Ford Hall forum idea has become very popular. More than twenty open forums in various parts of the country have been modeled after the Boston organization. It is reported that hundreds are turned away from the Ford Hall sessions every Sunday evening. Dr. Hall's topic at the late meeting was "Religion and Social Revolution." The address was a fervent plea that social reconstructionists shall not fail to avail themselves of the enormous dynamic afforded by religion, and that religious people stop blinding their eyes to the ideal element in those who are bent on bringing about a better social order. "Religion," said Dr. Hall, "is still one of the mightiest forces in the world." Speaking of the Protestants, Dr. Hall said: "The principal function of the Protestant pulpit is to stimulate thinking men in the pews. No pastor is doing his duty who tries to stifle the awakening social conscience among those who listen to his preaching. For by so doing he will only send out of the churches men whom the churches greatly need. Tremendous social changes are at hand, and the churches need to be on the ground while these changes are brought about." The Boston Baptist Social Union, under whose auspices the Ford Hall meetings are conducted, recently established in Boston a Ford Hall Town Meeting, a voluntary school in good citizenship.

"Portrait of a Methodist."

As Disciples sometimes go back to the documents of the early days of their movement, in order that they may measure themselves by the standards of the leaders of a hundred years ago, so the Northwestern Christian Advocate is compelling Methodists to look at themselves according to "the pattern that was given them"—by John Wesley. In the last issue of this paper, Wesley's "Portrait of a Methodist" is reproduced in large letters on the front cover. Here is the wording of the "portrait:" "A Methodist is one who has the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost given unto him, one who loves the Lord his God with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his mind, and with all his strength. He rejoices evermore, prays without ceasing, and in everything gives thanks. His heart is full of love to all mankind, and is purified from envy, malice, wrath, and every unkind or malign affection. His own desire, and the one design of his life, is not to do his own will, but the will of him that sent him. He keeps not only some or most of God's commandments, but all from the least to the greatest. He follows not the customs of the world; for vice does not lose its nature through its becoming fashionable. He fares not sumptuously every day. He cannot lap up treasures upon earth any more than he can take fire into his bosom. He cannot adorn himself, on any pretense, with gold or costly apparel. He cannot join in any diversion that has the least tendency to vice. He cannot speak evil of his neighbor, no more than he can tell a lie. He cannot utter unkind or idle words. No corrupt communication ever comes out of his mouth. He does good unto all men; unto neighbors and strangers, friends and enemies."

Religious Holiday in Oklahoma.

Presbyterian Unity Move in Scotland.

It seems that the movement for the consolidation of the Established Scotch Church and the United Free Church of Scotland is confronting some rather puzzling questions. Commenting on this subject, the Presbyterian says: "With characteristic Scotch thoroughness, every step is being taken cautiously, and after all its implications have been canvassed and thought through. The whole plan must be accepted by the laity of the two churches before the union can be finally consummated. One of the most troublesome questions in connection with the union is that of endowments. A parliamentary commission will first of all consider this, as the suggestion which was first made that these endowments be 'pooled,' has not been accepted by the parties interested. Perhaps as vital a question as any to be considered is the national status of the new church. Will it be purely a State church in all that that implies? The proposition that is finding favor is that, while there should be no break with the state, the historical relation of church and state should be modified considerably so as to secure the full recognition of the spiritual freedom of the church."

Churches Aid Spanish Speaking Peoples.

The second annual conference of the Permanent Interdenominational Council on the evangelization of the Spanish speaking people of the southwest was held in El Paso, Tex., recently. The council meets annually in a survey of the activities carried on by all the evangelical churches doing work among the Mexicans of California, Arizona, New Mexico, Texas and Colorado.

Notables in Dr. Jowett's Pulpit.

During parts of the summer, the following notables will occupy Dr. Jowett's pulpit, the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian, New York: Dr. John Douglas Adam; Dr. Douglas Mackenzie, president Hartford Seminary; Dr. Charles R. Erdman of Princeton Seminary; Dr. G. A. Johnstone Ross; Dr. Robert E. Speer; Dr. John Timothy Stone; Dr. F. B. Meyer of London; and Dr. John McNeill of Toronto.

Sunday-schools to Fight Saloons.

A meeting of the directors of the Pennsylvania Sunday-school Association, which includes, among others, John Wanamaker, Alexander Henry, D. D., and C. R. Blackall, D. D., was held two weeks ago in Mr. Wanamaker's office. It was followed by a three days' conference of the association. Two important movements were resolved upon: The circulation of the "voters' vow," aiming to bind together the 200,000 voters of the Sunday-school by a pledge to vote against the liquor traffic and for clean citizenship; and the enrollment of 500,000 boys and girls in a mammoth petition to the next legislature to give them a chance to remove the saloon from the state. It is proposed, also, to enlist the adult Bible classes in a poster campaign.

Moving Pictures to Aid Missions.

The moving picture is to be enlisted to promote missionary education. During the present month three men, namely, Mr. Charles A. Rowland, chairman of the laymen's movement of the Southern Presbyterian Church; Dr. J. P. McCallie, and Mr. Louis A. Holman, assistant art editor of the Youth's Companion, will go abroad with an elaborate equipment to take first-class motion pictures of mission scenes.

"A White List of Plays."

The Roman Catholic movement in favor of cleaner plays has evolved a "White List of Plays" for the direction of Catholic worshipers. In this list are named 130 plays that the church considers proper for members of that organization to see. The following is the standard proposed by the commission: A play must not, with regard to morals, occupy debatable ground. There should be a general agreement that a play is clean and wholesome. The appeal should be simple and universal. The play should be fit for theater goers of all ages and suited to varied tastes.

Dr. Mott to Study "Near East."

Within the past year and a half John R. Mott has held twenty-one conferences at various centers of the Far East. It is announced that after the next meeting of the Continuation Committee, to be held in England in September, Dr. Mott will inaugurate a series of conferences in the Near East, going in succession to such points around the Mediterranean as Algiers, Cairo, Beirut and Constantinople, giving particular attention to the problem of Mohammedanism.

English Thinker in Startling Statement.

Great Britain has been aroused by the statement, ascribed to Sir Robertson Nicoll, that only one in five of those connected with the Nonconformist Sunday-schools unite with the churches. Conditions in America, the Congregationalist informs us, are somewhat better. About two-fifths of those connected with our Sunday-schools ultimately become members of our churches, according to reports of experts. Furthermore, these additions to the church membership from the Sunday-school constitute about eighty per cent. of additions on confession of faith.

Death of P. S. Henson.

Rev. Poindexter Smith Henson, L.L. D., editor of the Baptist Teacher, a religious publication of Philadelphia, for fifty years and formerly for twenty years pastor of First Baptist Church, Chicago, died April 24, at his home in Robert J. Burdette, writer and preacher, reported dying in California.

Chicago. Dr. Henson, who had lectured throughout the United States and in Europe, retired about five years ago when he resigned from the pastorate of Tremont Chapel in Boston. He had been pastor of that church for five years. In 1897 he was asked to take charge of Spurgeon Tabernacle, London, England, but declined, according to relatives. Dr. Henson was stricken with paralysis. He was born on a tobacco plantation in Savannah County, Virginia, Dec. 7, 1831, and was graduated from Richmond College and the University of Virginia. He was educated for the bar, but turned to the ministry.

Presbyterians Bring Children to Christ.

The Board of Publications and Sunday-school Work of the Presbyterians is making an effort to bring into the Sunday-school thousands of unreached and unhelped boys and girls and, through the Sunday-schools, to bring the boys and girls to Christ. The request of this board is that, during the first three months of this calendar year, the last quarter of the church year, an effort be made throughout the denomination to add 15 per cent to the membership of the Sunday-schools and 10 per cent to the membership of the church by leading the Sunday-school pupils to accept Christ and unite with the church.

Methodist Sunday-school Aids Missions.

Since the organization of the Board of Sunday-schools, at the Baltimore General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, that organization has each year made grants and supported missionaries in the foreign field. At the last General Conference, however, at Minneapolis, a new piece of legislation was enacted whereby ten per cent of the monthly missionary offering taken in the Sunday-school was given to this board to carry on missionary work, reports the Northwestern Christian Advocate.

William Shaw Made LL. D.

Occidental College, the Presbyterian school at Los Angeles, has conferred upon Mr. William Shaw, International Endeavor Secretary, the degree of Doctor of Laws. The president of the college, who conferred the honor, is Mr. Shaw's predecessor as general secretary of the United Society, John Willis Baer, LL.D. Here are Dr. Baer's characteristic words in conferring the degree: "Graduate of the College of Hard Knocks, more at home in your shirt-sleeves than in cap and gown, without academic degree, the world has bestowed upon you the degree of M. S., Master of the Situation. By unanimous vote of Occidental College I have the great pleasure of conferring upon you the degree of Doctor of Laws."

New Methodist College in Rome.

A plot of ground has just been purchased in Rome to become the site of a new Methodist college in that city. The location is remarkable for its view of Rome and its environs, and overlooks St. Peter's and the Vatican gardens.

Charles M. Sheldon's New Story.

The new story by Charles M. Sheldon, of "In His Steps" fame, is out in book form. The title is "Jesus is Here." This book, which has been loudly heralded in religious publications for months is, to the Continent at least, a disappointment. That paper believes that the tale, while not an evil one, is not strong meat to nurture stalwart Christian life. Here is the Continent's comment, in part, upon the story: "Dr. Sheldon represents the chief character of the story, apart from Jesus himself, as longing for the attestation of his own religious experience by a new incarnation of Christ in the flesh. Dr. Sheldon appears not to have been at all conscious of the deep and damaging skepticism which underlies that wish. If it could be for the advantage of true spiritual religion in the world that Jesus Christ should return and be present once more in his own person among his people, heaven would not have omitted so to arrange it. And Dr. Sheldon ought to have appreciated that a story representing Jesus walking the streets of New York in the twentieth century involves, no matter how reverent it is, a certain impiety, being in effect a criticism against the Father's providence in his failing to return his Son again to earth."

Old Schoolhouse as Parish House.

A country town in Massachusetts has found a use for an old schoolhouse. The old schoolhouse was bought at a nominal price and fitted up for a parish house. A game-room and lavatories downstairs. clubroom, large enough for lectures, and reading-room upstairs. There the men of all the village, Catholics and Protestants, mingle together in a men's club, and the boys' club and the girls' club have the building afternoons and certain evenings of the week.

The Book World

A Department of Reviews and Literary Notes.

The Unoccupied Mission Fields of Africa and Asia. By Samuel M. Zwemer. It is the purpose of the author to show how large a portion of the world is still untouched by missionary effort, or at best only partially evangelized. He first considers the great areas like Tibet, Afghanistan, Arabia and Central Africa, where the gospel has never gone, or so slightly as to yet be a negligible element in the lives of the people. He then proceeds to show in considerable detail the large number of smaller territories, like the Malay states, Western Sumatra, the Barbary state, portions of Japan, unoccupied fields in India, unreached parts of China, and the Moslem populations of many lands which have never been reached by the gospel. The social and religious conditions of these peoples are described, with many quotations from the literature of travel. The strategic importance of evangelizing just such people is made clear as a part of the imperative task of Christianity, if it is not to miss the opportunity of reaching plastic people with the gospel. The closing chapter deals with the "glory of the impossible," and its many illustrations in the lives of missionary pioneers. The book is admirably illustrated with photographs and maps, and has in appendices lists of books on the various fields, and statistics of the non-Christian lands. (Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions. $1.00.)

The Lord's Return. By Jesse Forrest Silver. On the cover of this book appear the titles of several volumes under the heading, "The Latest Books in Prophecy," yet not one of the dozen or more cited has the slightest thing to do with the real Biblical doctrine of prophecy. They are merely exploitations of millenarian views, and such is the volume in hand. The author shows rightly that it was the general hope of the early church that the Lord would soon return. This hope he speaks of as "premillenarianism." He then continues to trace the ebbs and tides of that doctrine through the story of the church, and to prove to his own satisfaction that all the greatest of the church fathers and leaders held to this doctrine, whereas, those who rejected it were a sad lot. His chart of Christian history looks like a railroad map where the geography is made to serve the purpose of the line. If the facts do not fit the theory, so much the worse for the facts. Premillenarians will find this book an interesting arsenal of statements in favor of their view, but it throws little light on real doctrines of the coming of the Lord, or the teachings of the church on that theme. (Revell, $1 net.)

In the Vanguard. By Katrina Trask. This little volume is a strong protest against war, in the form of a three act play. The hero is a youth who, under the inspiration of the call to arms, enlists and goes away to the front, leaving his sweetheart, as enthusiastic as himself for what she thinks is the national honor. But in the process of the war he is disillusionized. It is not only the horror of war itself, its red and beastly brutality, that grips him with the tragedy of the thing, but much more it is its meaninglessness, the trivial causes invoked to give it momentum, and the barbarism which lies at the back of all its vindication. The young man revolts from all this at the very moment he receives promotion for distinguished bravery. He returns to his home pursued by the scorn of his companions in arms to meet the derision of his fellow citizens and the sad reproach of his parents. But his sweetheart, high spirited as she is, understands better, and believes thoroughly in the righteousness of the harder choice he has made. She sees that it takes far greater courage to stand against a public obsession than to follow the crowd to the front. The lesson is unmistakable, and greatly needed at the present moment. (Macmillan, 50 cents.)

Down Among Men. By Will Levington Comfort. The background of this book is the newspaper work of two reporters who went out to cover the story of the Japanese-Russian war. The younger one gets away early from the battle of Laioyang, and after incredible hardships, which involve the loss of his manuscript and almost of his life, he reaches America ahead of all the other reports and reporters and reconstructs his narrative on the way. It creates a great sensation and he is the hero of the hour. But he falls into dissipated ways and is only saved by the good offices of an older newspaper man and of a girl with whom he falls in love. But his romance is interfered with by the efforts of his older friend, who is fearful that love might distract his attention from the literary task of which he is capable. And so this mentor persuades the girl to give up her lover, which she does, though continuing to inspire him by her letters. The movement of the story is labored and at times obscure. The reader wonders whether the author is deliberately trying to affect the form of symbolism in his descriptions or is merely an uninteresting writer. There are admirable pages, but the story fails to grip. (Doran, $1.25 net.)

LITERARY NOTES.

Elizabeth Cooper, the author of "My Lady of the Chinese Court Yard," just published by Stokes, indignantly denies the stories current in this country about the Chinese woman's lack of feeling where girl babies are concerned. "It is a fact," says Mrs. Cooper, "that girls are not welcomed as much as boys, for they cannot worship at the family shrine, and when married become a part of their husband's family, but I have never seen a case of abuse of a child because it was a girl. I found the Chinese mother to be very much the same as mothers of other nationalities. They lavish a wealth of affection on their children, both boys and girls, many of whom are horribly spoiled." Mrs. Cooper's knowledge of Chinese life was gained during ten years spent in Shanghai with her husband, then Consul General for the United States. As wife of the senior officer of the consular body she brought together for the first time the wives of the Chinese and foreign officials. The family of Li Hung-chang were her close friends and she came to know intimately Chinese and Manchu women of the highest class. "My Lady of the Chinese Courtyard" is the vivid life story of a high-class Chinese woman as told by herself. Her life as a young wife is described in human, intimate terms—her subjection to her mother-in-law, her many duties, her great and almost pathetic joy over the birth of a son. Later we see her as the honored mother of children, but encompassed by the change and turmoil of New China.

Few Americans who travel through Japan realize that many of the luscious apples, peaches, quinces and other fruits they enjoy there were grown originally from American seedlings. Nor yet that the first Agricultural College established by the Imperial Japanese Government in 1876 was modeled after the Massachusetts Agricultural College. When the Bureau of Colonization was established (says Mr. T. Philip Terry, in his "Japanese Empire,"—Houghton Mifflin Company) Count Kuroda engaged forty American experts to come out with ample supplies of harvesting machinery, seeds, trees, etc., to improve the island of Yezo, especially its future capital, Sapporo. A beautiful level plain with sufficient slope to insure drainage was selected; and avenues 160 ft, wide with intersecting streets from 100 to 120 ft wide were laid out and flanked by sidewalks before a single house was built. Today no city in Japan is airier, sweeter or more attractive. Just outside the city is the big breeding farm (Makomania), a huge establishment much like a Kentucky horse-breeding farm (Makomania), a huge es- are astonished to see American horses, bred in Japan, led about by native jockeys and grooms.

Young people whose interest in Mexico has been stimulated by the continued disturbances in our neighbor country will find both entertainment and information in two stories written by Nora Archibald Smith and Frances Courtenay Baylor and published a few years ago by Houghton Mifflin Company. Miss Smith's story, "Under the Cactus Flag," gives the experiences of an American girl in the state of Sorona, a section which is especially prominent at the present time. "Juan and Juanita," by Miss Baylor, is the story of a little Mexican boy and girl who are captured by Indians and carried out of the country, and of their many adventures in making their escape.

Of Human Interest

Carnegie as a "Movie" Actor.

Andrew Carnegie, the famous Laird of Skibo, reecntly made his debut as an actor for motion pictures and "made good" to such an extent that hardened directors found nothing to criticize in his playing and are seriously considering making him an offer to repeat his performance on another occasion.

Immediately upon his arrival at the Edison studios, reports Popular Electricity, Mr. Carnegie proceeded to post himself upon the duties of an actor. A handsome library set had been made and Mr. Carnegie took his place beside a table. When he got the work he proceeded to give his lecture in the most business-like way imaginable. He seemed utterly oblivious of the camera and discussed the subject of the distribution of wealth and the obligations which great wealth imposes upon a person as if he were talking to a friend.

The film and talking machine record which he made will be exhibited in vaudeville and a record and print of the film will be placed in the archives of the Modern Historic Society. One of the Edison players who was an interested spectator remarked that it was a great pity Mr. Carnegie had turned his attention to steel and libraries, as the stage thereby lost a great actor. Never had he seen such self-possession on the part of a man who faced the motion picture camera for the first time.

A Short Nominating Speech.

Shelby M. Cullom is credited with the shortest nominating speech ever made for a Republican candidate for president in a national Republican convention. The Republican convention met at Philadelphia in 1872 and nominated Ulysses S. Grant for a second term as president of the United States. Senator Cullom made the nominating speech. Here it is:

"Gentlemen of the convention: On behalf of the great Republican party of Illinois, and that of the Union—in the name of liberty, of loyalty, of justice, and of law—in the interest of economy, of good government, of peace, and of the equal rights of all—remembering with profound gratitude his glorious achievements in the field, and his noble statesmanship as chief magistrate of this great nation—I nominate as president of the United States, for a second term, Ulysses S. Grant."

Of the speech Cullom said, "As I uttered the word "Grant" at the conclusion of my speech and his picture was lowered from the ceiling of the hall the demonstration was indescribable."

Alas for Fame!

A Chicago woman went to Scotland expecting to find the proverbial shepherd quoting Virgil and the laborer who had Burns by heart. She was, however, strangely disillusioned, according to Lippincott's.

She accosted a policeman and inquired as to the whereabouts of Carlyle's house.

"Which Carlyle?" the bluecoat asked.

"Thomas Carlyle."

"What does he do?" the policeman wanted to know.

"He was a writer—but he's dead," she faltered.

"Well, madam," the big Scot informed her, "if the man has been dead over five years, there's little chance of finding out anything about him in a big city like this."

A Story From President Hadley.

President Hadley, of Yale, at a tea in New Haven said, apropos of certain impractical and useless studies:

"These studies remind me of the stammerer who went to a specialist, and after a course of twenty lessons learned to say without a trace of a stammer, 'Peter Piper picked a peck of pickled peppers. Where's the peck of pickled peppers Peter Piper picked?'

"A friend congratulated the stammerer on his splendid achievement.

"'Yes,' he admitted dubiously, 'all very f-f-fine, but it's such a very hard remark, you know, to w-work into an ordinary c-c-conversation.'"

Henry Watterson on the President.

It was destiny that placed Woodrow Wilson where he is, writes the Louisville editor in the Courier-Journal. In these matters Providence has ever some all-wise purpose in reserve. God has indeed from the first held our country in his holy keeping. The president's abilities are unmistakable. His intrepidity seems not only sufficient but abundant. No one questions his integrity. What has he to do with a heart? If he had one, it would be constantly getting in his way like an ill-cut garment.

Heavens, no; now that we are used to the idea that he is his own Jorkins—that he has no wicked partner—that he is onto his job—"no favors asked or given"—the black flag to graft and grafter—we like him better so, and would not exchange him for the veriest prince of good fellows, living or dead. With such a man in the White House the people can go to bed and sleep o' nights. His personality may not be a thing of beauty nor a joy forever; and yet his taking off would eclipse the gayety of Democracy and impoverish the party's stock of resounding platitudes.

I made no mistake in estimating the capabilities of Woodrow Wilson for shining public service; nor failed to hit the bull's eye when I warned the party leaders what they were going to get when they got him.

Taking Down a Lord.

Lord Cockburn, after a long stroll, sat down on a hillside beside a shepherd, and observed that the sheep selected the coldest situation for lying down. "Mac," said he, "I think, if I were a sheep, I should certainly have preferred the other side of the hill." The shepherd answered: "Ay, my lord; but. if you had a sheep, ye would have had mair sense." And Lord Cockburn was never tired of relating the story and turning the laugh on himself.

The World is Growing Better

Child Bureau's Head Makes Report.

The work of the children's bureau, recently established by the United States Department of Labor, was reviewed by Miss Julia C. Lathrop, chief of the bureau, in an address before the third international congress on the welfare of the child at Washington City last week, and she spoke of the work outlined for the future. She said in part:

"The children's bureau has carefully avoided taking up any subject within its field which was already in the hands of any other government agency. The first object selected for study was infant mortality, because of its obvious importance, its comparative simplicity, and the fact that it was not then being studied by another government agency. The bulk of the allowance asked by the bureau for the coming year is its proposed estimate is designed for the continuance of this study into infant mortality and for allied work.

CENSUS OF BABIES.

"The inquiry into infant mortality conducted by the children's bureau is original in character, first, because it begins by a study of the birth record rather than the death record; second, because it is not a medical study, but its design is to secure data regarding the social, industrial and civic surroundings of infancy in about fifty typical American communities, especially small towns and distinctly rural districts.

"The results hoped are, first, a body of valuable statistical information; second, an awakening of public interest and responsibility by the mere fact of the inquiry, and, third, information upon which further advances in preventing work can be based. This inquiry cannot go to any community which does not register the births of its babies, and hence another natural result is an improvement in birth registration.

"This country has no system of vital statistics adequate to furnish an exact estimate founded on the figures of the few cities and states which do have adequate statistics, but the vital statistician of the bureau says that probably 300,000 children died last year in the United States. The great sanitarians tell us that half these lives could have been saved if we had utilized methods of hygiene and sanitation already understood—more than that, if children are well born and cared for, that infant mortality may be a negligible quantity. The power of reduction lies with us, and it is illimitable in extent.

MORTALITY CAN BE LOWERED.

"In New Zealand, where a volunteer society for the Health of Women and Children has been at work for some years, the death rate has been reduced to fifty-one for the whole country, while in certain communities it is still lower, notably in the City of Duntdin, where it has been reduced to thirty-eight. The New York City board of health says: 'Public health is purchaseable. Within certain natural limitations a community can determine its own death rate.' Newsholme, the great English authority, says infant mortality is the best single index we have of social conditions.

'The problem of infant mortality has been stated by the scientists. The methods of meeting it have been worked out by the sanitarians. It now remains to popularize those methods, to increase public interest in securing their application. The children's bureau is attempting to popularize that vast field of information regarding social, civic and individual hygiene, which, if applied by citizens and communities, will result in a lowering of the infant death rate and a raising of the general standard of health."

Disciples Table Talk

Texas Convention, Gainesville, May 11-14.

Texas Disciples are making elaborate plans for their annual convention to be held at Gainesville. E. S. Bledsoe is president of the convention. The following are some of the features: A Sunday-school Parliament, led by S. W. Hutton, the new state secretary. Address by Colby D. Hall, of Fort Worth, on "Men and Millions." Musicale, by Texas University Orchestra and Glee Club. Address by E. M. White, of Ft. Worth, on "The Religious Press." Addresses by T. E. Tomlinson, F. D. Kershner and J. C. Mason. Address by S. J. Corey on "The Every Member Canvass." Address, "The Unification of the Disciples' Work," by R. Graham Frank. Addresses of General Secretaries. Address, "Men of Texas," by Sterling P. Strong. Men's Banquet. Address, "A Man's Job," by W. H. Webb, Sherman.

P. C. Macfarlane Discusses Wilson.

Peter Clark Macfarlane, at one time secretary of the Brotherhood of the Disciples, has evidently found himself in his role of interpretative reporter. His articles concerning big movements and big men of today in Collier's and other magazines are attracting wide attention. Admirers of his writings are saying that the best piece of work that has come from his pen is the article on "The President in Practice," which appeared in Collier's of two weeks ago. This is a careful, discriminating study of President Wilson and it deals very interestingly in prophecy regarding the future of "the greatest absolutist in our history."

North Yakima Church Celebrates.

W. F. Turner, pastor at North Yakima, Wash., reports that the fifth anniversary of the dedication of the $55,000 church building was celebrated April 19. I. N. McCash, president of Spokane University preached morning and evening and led in readjusting the debt. The offerings in cash and pledges amounted to over $6,000 which, Mr. Turner writes, amply cares for all needs. Morton L. Rose, for ten years the pastor of North Yakima, with his wife and daughter, were present, on their way to their new pastorate at Winters, Cal. Mr. Rose preached in the afternoon and lectured on the following evening. He was given a welcome that amounted to an ovation reports Mr. Turner, who states that to him is largely due the building and the fine standing of the North Yakima church.

Development at East Liverpool, O.

I. J. Cahill, Corresponding Secretary of the Ohio Missionary Society, writes that the Second Church at East Liverpool, Ohio, has had a remarkable experience. Two years ago L. I. Mercer as State Evangelist went to this former mission church, which was then greatly depleted. His ministry encouraged the members, added to the membership, and set things in order for a forward movement. P. E. Britton became the pastor and after the "Billy" Sunday meetings added 106 to the church. Then they built a church auditorium and a short meeting resulted in twenty more additions. Their last meeting closed with ninety-nine confessions of faith and leaves this feeble band a mighty host.

T. E. Winter Takes Philadelphia Work.

T. E. Winter, for four years pastor at Fulton, Mo., has accepted the pastorate of Third Church, Philadelphia, to begin work July 1. Mr. Winter writes that he expects to enjoy his new field, and that he considers it one of the most promising opportunities the brotherhood affords. The board at Fulton passed resolutions highly commending Mr. Winter as "a constructive worker, a scholarly preacher and teacher, a sympathetic pastor, a faithful exponent of evangelical religion, quick to make use of every effective agency for the advaancement of the cause; in short, a minister of Christ of the highest type." The board gives this pastor large credit for the building of the new $60,000 church home. Mrs. Winter is also commended in the resolutions. A review of Mr. Winter's work is given in the Fulton Gazette, from which report we quote:

"Mr. Winter's work with the Fulton church has been thoroughly constructive. He took charge of the church June 1, 1910, and on the 8th day of August, 1910, the congregation began tearing down the old church building. A new $60,000 church has been erected and all but $8,000 of that amount has been paid in cash into the building fund, and $3,000 of this amount is covered by pledges. The building is considered one of the best planned and equipped churches in the state outside the cities of St. Louis and Kansas City. During Pres. A. J. Bowen, of University of Nanking, given reception at University of Chicago.

Rev. T. E. Winter, who leaves Fulton, Mo., for Philadelphia work.

Mr. Winter's pastorate the Sunday-school has been re-organized, graded and placed upon a modern educational basis, while its enrollment and average attendance have been doubled. The church also has been thoroughly re-organized in all departments, has added over two hundred members, introduced the budget plan of missionary and benevolent work together with the Duplex envelope system, and greatly increased its offerings to these causes. A spirit of harmony and hopefulness exists among the members as a result of the work done by Mr. Winter and his efficient wife, and it is in a position for even larger growth and usefulness."

Three Disciples on Indiana Republican Ticket.

Among those nominated by the recent Republican convention at Indianapolis, are the following: Hugh T. Miller, Columbus, nominated for United States Senator; Dr. Horace Ellis, Vincennes, nominated for superintendent of public instruction, and Ira C. Batman, Bloomington, nominated for judge Appellate Court, first division. All of these are Disciples.

Union Avenue, St. Louis, Clearing Debt.

April 19 was the sixth anniversary of the erection of the $225,000 building of Union Avenue Church, St. Louis. This day was made the occasion of an effort to clear the debt on the building. G. L. Snively had charge of the campaign, and during the day $50,000 was pledged, cutting the debt to $41,000. An anniversary communion and memorial service was held at 3 in the afternoon, Dr. B. A. Abbott, pastor, officiating.

At Memorial Church, Chicago.

Prof. Allan Hoben still continues to supply the pulpit at the Memorial Church of Christ in this city. For several weeks he was busily engaged in his political campaign as candidate for the city council from the sixth ward. Dr. Willett supplied the pulpit on Palm Sunday and Easter, when there were special exercises in both Sunday-school and church service, with baptisms. It is the hope of the pulpit committee to secure Prof. Hoben as regular minister if suitable arrangements can be made.

Pre-Easter Services in Chicago.

During the week preceding Easter, daily services were held in the Central Y. M. C. A., under the direction of the Federal Council of Churches of Chicago. Addresses were given by Rev. W. T. McElveen for the Congregationalists, Dr. Wishart for the Presbyterians, Dr. Chas. B. Mitchell for the Methodist, Prof. Willett for the Disciples, and Dr. M. D. Adams for the Baptists.

U. of C. Honors Nanking Professor.

On Wednesday of last week a luncheon was given at the Quadrangle Club of the University of Chicago in honor of Pres. A. J. Bowen of the University of Nanking. The guests included Professors Henderson, Mathews, Coulter, McClintock, Ames and Willett. Pres. Garrett of the Theological Seminary of Nanking, who is spending some months at his old home at Hanover, Ind., was unable to attend.

Kendallville, Ind., Church Builds Larger.

The church at Kendallville, Ind., under the leadership of Rev. W. D. Trumbull, has recently completed a commodious addition in the form of a well equipped Sunday-school auditorium, at a cost of something more than two thousand dollars. Dedicatory exercises were held on Sunday, April 12, and in the evening Dr. Willett preached the sermon.

J. W. Lowber in Social Service Work.

Dr. J. W. Lowber of Austin, Texas, is active in the work of the Christian League for social service. He is called out frequently to lecture in different parts of the United States.

New Disciples' Religious Education Commission.

That the Disciples are alert to the demand of the times for a higher standard of religious educational propaganda was evidenced when the convention at Toronto passed a resolution calling for a "Religious Education Commission of the Disciples of Christ." President Bell, acting upon this resolution, has appointed the following men as members of the Commission: Prof. W. C. Morro, Butler College, chairman; R. M. Hopkins, Cincinnati, Ohio; Prof. Vernon Stauffer, Hiram College; Prof. W. C. Bower, Transylvania College; and Prof. W. S. Athearn, Drake University.

C. R. Neel Discusses Mormonism.

Mormonism at short range was discussed before the Lincoln, Neb., Ministerial Association by C. R. Neel, pastor of the church at Bethany. Mr. Neel was for five years in charge of a Salt Lake City church, coming from there to Nebraska. He is inclined to the belief that polygamy is on the wane not because the Mormons do not believe in plural marriages but because it is a matter of policy. Following the decline of polygamy cohabitation has increased. That is to say many of this faith have their concubines. He discussed the Mormons from commercial, political, missionary and religious angles. They dominate the commercial and political life of Salt Lake City and many parts of Utah, he said. Mr. Need praised Brigham Young, one of the founders of the church. He declared that he was a brainy and brilliant man but was unscrupulous. Once he heard Joseph E. Smith, the present head of the Mormon church, declare that outside of Mormonism there was no salvation. While followers and leaders would not admit it, Dr. Neel asserted that the church stood at the present day for blood atonement, a most hideous doctrine to Christians.

James Ware Eulogized.

W. Remfry Hunt, of China, speaks in the following enthusiastic words of James Ware, the recently deceased pioneer missionary: "James Ware was a rare soul. The mission field made him great. He came to China a sailor boy, and died in Shanghai as a recognized scholar sinologue, and as one of the most efficient translators from the original Greek and Hebrew of the Old and New Testament Revision Committee. In over three decades of service James Ware had worked like a Trojan and walked with the finest of the leaders in the mission field. He used his given talents well and has entered higher service. He rests from his labors and his works do follow him. We had much in common in our humanity and in our ideals. When he erred, it was always on the side of love. The churches of all the denominations in Shanghai booked him for all special occasions. In the twenty-five years I have known him I never knew him carping on the so-called failures of others. Among his Chinese colleagues Brother Ware lived as a personal friend and they confided in him as they would in a mother. He knew God and walked humbly."

Harris R. Cooley at Des Moines.

Hon. Harris R. Cooley delivered a lecture at University Place church, Des Moines, recently. Mr. Cooley is the director of the department of Charities and Correction of the city of Cleveland and has had wide experience in the treatment of criminals. His subject was, "The Underworld, or the Poor and Criminal of a Great City." He told of the results he has achieved at the city prison and at Cleveland's Boyville, a farm in the country, where bad boys are changed into the best boys in the slums. Mr. Cooley has made a study of penal and philanthropic institutions in both this country and Europe. He stands for a broader spirit of brotherhood in dealing with the criminal classes.

Missouri Pastor Edits Daily.

R. E. L. Prunty is an enterprising business man as well as efficient pastor. The April 2 issue of the Moniteau County Herald, published at California, Mo., is a special church edition, and the paper was edited and advertising solicited by Mr. Prunty, the Ladies' Aid of the church being in general charge of the enterprise. Nearly all the business men of California are represented on the advertising pages and nearly 3,000 copies of the issue were printed. The California church, according to the Christian Church "write-up," has been in existence since 1850.

The Butler Alumnal Quarterly.

The April number of the Butler Alumnal Quarterly contains, among many other interesting features a photograph of the late Dr. Benton with articles of appreciation by former president Scot Butler and Professor Demarchus C. Brown. Dr. Henry Jamieson has an able and interesting article on "Beautifying the City." Many brief news items and personal notes follow. The Quarterly is edited by Miss Katherine Graydon. All its contributors are Butler alumni.

In Memory of Herman C. Dodd.

The following resolutions were passed by Wilson Avenue Church, Columbus, O., in memory of Herman C. Dodd, former pastor of that church, who died March 27. The resolution is signed by the elders of the church, including J. J. Tisdall, pastor: "Inasmuch as our esteemed brother and former pastor, Herman C. Dodd, fell asleep in Jesus March 27, 1914, we, the Wilson Avenue Church of Christ, Columbus, Ohio, in congregation assembled, do hereby express to the widow, Mrs. Sabra S. Dodd, and the two daughters our deepest sympathy and condolence in this their great sorrow and bereavement. We also wish to testify to the sterling Christian character of our Brother and to the splendid work he accomplished as our pastor. May our heavenly Father richly sustain and keep the bereaved family is our prayer."

Missouri Pastor as Newspaper Reporter.

Henry W. Hunter, pastor at Higginsville, Mo., is trying his hand at newspaper writing. Mr. Hunter approached Mr. George Scott, Editor of the Higginsville Advance, recently and suggested that if his paper had a column that would treat of every day things in a sympathic and enlightening manner, also giving it a social service touch, it would find many readers. He spoke of the matter several times and finally Mr. Hunter consented to edit this department and be responsible for what was said therein. The result was that the department "Interpretations" was started and has been running for over six months now with an interest that increases. Some of the subjects that have been treated by Mr. Hunter are: "The New Patriotism," "The Church and the Young Man's Game," a review of a book by F. L. Milnes, "Sex Hygiene in Schools," "A Town With a Policy," "Social Service, What Is it?" "Safety First," "Good Roads,' etc.

New Organization at Dayton, Ohio.

The Santa Clara Avenue Church, a new mission established in a growing residential section of Dayton by the Central Church in January, 1913, has grown into an independent church. The organization took place Friday night, April 3, with about 75 charter members. This work began through the cooperation of a few faithful workers in the community together with some of Central's best supporters, they conducting Sunday-school and John P. Sala preaching Sunday afternoons. In August the congregation, with the help of the Ohio Board, was able to call its present pastor, Clarence F. Evans.

L. C. McPherson in Canadian Fields.

Lowell C. McPherson, American Society evangelist in the East, has recently been holding meetings with the Canadian Disciples. He states that up to the evening of March 26, he spoke 47 times that month; seventeen times in St. John the first thirteen days and thirty times the next thirteen days in Tiverton, N. S. The last six days of his stay in Tiverton he baptized 20 people and received two others into the church by statement. He has now returned to Halifax for a series of meetings.

S. T. Willis Attacks Gambling.

"The spirit of grabbing, through some device or other, the earnings of some one else without giving value in exchange leads to all sorts of hellish works, lying, cheating, blasphemy, gluttony, lust, murder and such like." In this fashion Dr. S. T. Willis, pastor of First Church, Minneapolis, Minn., attacked the gambling evil on the anniversary of the first year of his pastorate. His subject was "The Gates of Hell in St. Paul," and he decleared that they are many. "An open door to perdition for many, not always the young, either, is the gambling den," he said. "There are so many forms of this evil and it is so widespread that it is most insidious. It may be in the form of the bridge party or shooting craps, or the card table or the wheat pit, or the stock market, or in any one of a thousand forms." Mr. Willis also declared himself against the dance hall, the immoral house, the saloon, and against the general spirit of worldliness.

Chicago Disciples Meet.

Last Sunday week at 3 o'clock was held the Quarterly Assembly of the Chicago Disciples. The meeting convened at First Methodist Church. Special features were ten-minute addresses on Home Missions as follows: "The Reconciliation of the Church and Labor," Arthur I. Zeller, Chicago Heights church; "The Church and the Community," W. C. Hull, Douglas Park church; "Efficiency in Church Work," F. A. Carlisle, West End church; "Methods in Evangelizing the Foreigner," Basil S. Keusseff, Russian Mission.

Let Us Have Peace!

A letter from the Commission on Peace and Arbitration of the Federal Council of the churches of Christ in America.

We, representatives of the federal forces of seventeen million Christians in the United States, desire to put on record our steadfast friendship for the Mexican people, and to express our sympathy with them in the disorders which now trouble their country. That a way out of their distresses may be found is our earnest and constant hope. We wish them prosperity and peace.

We wish further to express our conviction tthat the thought of war between Mexico and the United States is abhorrent to the vast majority of our people. The citizens of our Republic want no war with our southern neighbor, nor do they desire to dominate it, or to interfere with its internal affairs, but on the other hand they desire cordial relations and friendly intercourse.

We rejoice that in our President and our Secretary of State we have men who are lovers of peace, and whose purpose it is to maintain peace, if at all possible, not only with Mexico but with all the nations of the earth. That the purpose of our President and his Councillors shall be carried out is not only our hope but our confident expectation.

We wish to assure our representatives and senators at Washington that the voices clamoring for war do not represent the sentiment of the sane and substantial people of our Republic, and we would remind them that the few newspapers which would hurry the government to extreme measures are voicing the wishes, not of patriotic and disinterested citizens, but of mischief makers and of certain vested interests whose aggrandizement is furthered by war.

"Blessed are the peacemakers"—so we believe—and we are confident that the glory of the present administration will be enhanced and its fame augmented, not by the slaughter of tens of thousands of the young men of the two republics, but by the peaceful solution of a difficult and vexing problem, by the forbearance and long-suffering and calm wisdom of a Christian statesmanship.

A Forward Step

DEDICATION OF THE NEW BROADWAY CHURCH, CLEVELAND.

In the last dozen years the Disciples of Cleveland have dedicated five new buildings —Lakewood, West Boulevard, Crawford Road (formerly the old Cedar Avenue Church) Euclid Avenue, and Broadway. Each of these events marked a distinct advance in our work, but the dedication of the last named which took place on Sunday, April 19, was unique, not only among the Cleveland Disciples but in the entire brotherhood. As stated by Secretary Grant K. Lewis on that occasion, it is the first instance among us where we have erected and dedicated a building among the "new Americans."

In 1891 J. Z. Tyler, then in his prime as pastor of the Euclid Avenue Church was master of ceremonies at the dedication of a stone structure on Aetna Road in the southern section of the city, whose population then numbered about 275,000 people. Many of these were of the New England type, much like their ancestors who settled on the Western Reserve. The community was then distinctly American and promised to become one of the good residence sections of the city. In the short period of twenty-three years the situation has completely changed. Cleveland now has a population of 667,000, more than fifty per cent of whom are "new Americans." The Bohemians gravitated toward Aetna Road and now number about 75,000. They are industrious, patriotic; many of their children carry off honors in the public schools, while fully 50 per cent of them are not vitally connected with any organized religious life. As usual, the American constituency migrated to other sections, the membership of the church was cut in two, and its future was despaired of. Like other churches similarly situated, it had but two alternatives —either to become a mission for a few years and finally go the way of many others or, to plant itself in the midst of these new people and adapt its program to their peculiar needs.

At the suggestion and under the inspiration of the present pastor, Frank D. Butchart, and under the direct supervision of the Cleveland Disciples Union, the American and the Ohio Christian Missionary societies were interested in the situation, and these three organizations together with the local church undertook to leave the old site and build a suitable plant very near the heart of these interesting people. On the above date, representatives from the other ten churches met with the membership of the old church to dedicate the new house as the Broadway Christian Church. Secretary F. M. Rains, of Cincinnati, conducts affairs in his usual good-natured way, securing $6,000 in pledges, which provides for the total cost of $26,000.

Architecturally, there was no pretense at rivaling St. Peter's in Rome, St. Paul's in London, or the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York. The building is a plain but neat brick structure and in keeping with other structures in the community, except those erected by the Roman Church. The basement floor contains an excellent gymnasium—which will be used for dining room and Bible-school purposes—shower baths, and domestic science room. The second floor provides a splendid auditorium, pastor's study and office, and a commodious social room, while the third floor is in the form of a gallery which provides fourteen alcove class rooms. The seating capacity, including the departmental rooms is 500, and the building will accommodate a school of at least 800. It will be the policy of the joint boards, under the supervision of the pastor, whose preparation and vision together with his eight years of experience in the field, give him a peculiar fitness for the new task, to conduct class work, club work for boys and girls, a gymnasium and such other forms of social service as will reach the community, these to be made as channels leading into the Bible-school and church. The writer is now engaged with the pastor in a week of decision meetings, and while it will be the pastor's aim to make the church a community center in every sense, the religious emphasis will be constant and Christ will be uplifted daily among these "new Americans." The joint board has the utmost confidence in the investment and will spare no effort to make it a success.

INDIANAPOLIS CHURCH PROSPERS.

Since entering its new building in February, the Third church, Indianapolis, has been making constant gains in membership and progress in all its varied activities. The Sunday-school is planning an interesting series of rallies. The first was an Easter rally, to be followed by a girls' rally, boys' rally, women's rally and men's rally. The new Carnegie pipe organ will be installed about the first of May, when the equipment of the new building will be complete. On a recent occasion, Rufus von Kleinsmid, associate superintendent of the Indiana reformatory, gave his lecture on "Efficiency Causes of Crime." T. W. Grafton is to be congratulated on the progress at the Third

REDUCED RATES TO TERRE HAUTE.

On account of our big State Convention the Terre Haute, Indianapolis and Eastern Traction Co., has made a rate of one fare and a half for the round trip from Indianapolis to Terre Haute and return. The reduced rate will be $2.20. You may go on any special or regular car any time on Monday, May 11, and return on any car up until noon Friday May 17. The limited cars leave Indianapolis at 7:20, 11:20, 1:20, 3:20, 5:20 and 8:20. The Traction Company will run as many special cars as we need on Monday, May 11. Cars will be waiting at the station, and when forty people are ready they will start.

In order to attend the first Monday session you should leave Indianapolis by 8:00 o'clock. The interurban people must know how many to expect in order to give us the right kind of accommodation. Will you please write a card telling me what time you want to leave Indianapolis. If you will do this I will see that a car is waiting for you. Remember you must go Monday in order to get this rate, as it holds good for that day only. Let us go early and start the convention with enthusiasm. Ask for a convention ticket and remember that the fare is $2.20 round trip.

THE BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION MAKES GAINS.

The Easter offering of the National Benevolent Association was larger last year by about $4,000.00 than any previous year. The Easter returns at the general office for the first seven days following Easter Sunday of 1913 were $4,090.71. The Easter returns to the general office for the first seven days following Easter Sunday of 1914 were $6,545.92, which is a gain of almost exactly 60% over the offerings of last year for the same period of time. The needs of the twelve institutions of the National Benevolent Association are so great and so urgent that we are earnestly hoping this splendid rate of increase will continue to show in the daily receipts of Easter offerings.

We deeply appreciate the spirit of sacrifice that characterizes an increasing proportion of our churches and schools. Many of these good schools are going far beyond their apportionments. We quote briefly from two letters out of today's (April 23) mail. They are representative of very many others we might quote.

If your church or Bible-school has not taken an Easter offering, will you not at once add the widow and the orphaan to those with whom you would have fellowship by sending a generous offering at a very early date to NATIONAL BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION, 2955 North Euclid Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

IN MISSION FIELDS.

The National Missionary Council of India, which met at Calcutta, February 4-5 last, recommended that mission study circles be formed among the European and Anglo-Indian communities.

Dr. G. W. Brown, missionary of the Foreign Society, is a member of the Permanent Literature Committee of the National Missionary Council of India.

Doctor and Mrs. Macklin of China will visit the churches in Australia as the guests of the brotherhood in that land in the near future. It will mean much for our splendid churches in the land of the Southern Cross, and will prove a change for Doctor and Mrs. Macklin of the greatest value. During the past few years Doctor Macklin has been under a great strain.

Mrs. James Ware has lived in Shanghai, China, for twenty-eight years. She has a girls' school of about fifty pupils, which is almost self-supporting. It pays the teacher's salary and running expenses, leaving only the rent to pay, which is about $6 per month. What China needs more than anything else is Christian wives and mothers. The Chinese teacher in this school is a girl that Mrs. Ware adopted some twelve years ago. She had lost both of her feet from foot-binding. She graduated from our girls' college in Nankin, conducted by Miss Lyon, and spent two years in the Normal School, and is well prepared for the work. Withal, she is a devoted Christian woman.

The prospects for Children's Day for Heathen Missions, the first Sunday in June were never before brighter. Orders are pouring into the office of the Foreign Society in a larger stream than in any former year. The Foreign Society furnishes exceptionally attractive Children's Day supplies, free of charge, and they should be ordered by every Sunday-school at once. No doubt the schools will pass the $100,000 mark this year. They are sure to do so unless all signs fail. F. M. Rains.

Looking Toward the May Offering for Home Missions

AN EQUAL EMPHASIS.

If any word from me relative to the Home Mission offering could add in any way to the interest and enthusiasm that should mark this ministry it would indeed give me great pleasure.

There can be no sort of doubt that we must do foreign work, as it has been called, through the agency of the Home Mission Society. To make Jesus Christ dominant in American life is just as imperative as the attempt to make Him dominant in the life of those peoples we designate as heathen. I feel assured that there is as much spiritual impoverishment, and perhaps more, in most of our American cities than in Tokyo or Calcutta. So far as physical civilization is concerned there is now but little difference between the home and foreign fields. In spiritual impoverishment there is just as vivid need for the gospel in America as there is in Asia.

The work of the American Christian Missionary Society ought to be made as outstanding as the work of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. The need, I firmly believe, is not more or less in one field than the other. When one thinks of the conventionality, provincialism and materialism of the church in America, to say nothing of the great constituency without even formal relationship with the church, there should be awakened in our hearts with reference to America the passionate cry of John Knox in relation to Scotland, "Give me Scotland or I die."

Louisville, Ky. E. L. Powell.

"THE EBB AND FLOW OF THE IMMIGRANT TIDE."

The most far-reaching factor in the evangelization of the world today is found doubtless in the large immigration to America. This migration is the largest in volume known in the history of the race. The approximate number of the entire population of Israel which migrated out of Egypt under Moses was three million. There were hordes of barbarians which overwhelmed Rome and left a mark on Europe that can never be forgotten, yet the largest army they mustered had less than 80,000 warriors. The crusades have ever been considered epoch-making, and these involved several millions of people, but more men, women and children from other lands have come to the United States and Canada in the last six years than swept across the face of Europe in a century and a half during the crusades.

They are coming to America at the rate of a million every year. Whole sections of our big cities are nothing short of colonies of foreign peoples. One public school in New York City contains twenty-six nationalities. They are reaching out from the cities and beginning to honeycomb even the rural districts, as many North Central States will show.

These immigrants need the gospel that has made America what it is. The same loving, helpful, practical service that commends the gospel to the foreign peoples in their native lands will captivate them for Jesus Christ all the more in a country new and strange. This kind of work cannot be done by starting "missions" in rented store buildings on back streets, for the immigrant must be "brothered" into the kingdom of God. The greatest mistake evangelical Christianity ever made was in selling out its houses of worship and forsaking the settlements as they were colonized by immigrants. A million immigrants a year present a million responsibilities and opportunities to the American church to make the gospel of Jesus Christ universal. The American Society has four points of contact in large cities with these immigrants and numerous local congregations are undertaking, as limited experience directs, to do work among the foreigners. At present our work is exceedingly small but it is a beginning. We must push forward for large funds in order to equip these missions so that they can effectively serve the multitudes reached by them.

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

INTERNATIONAL UNIFORM LESSON FOR MAY 17, 1914.

Luke 16:16-18. Memory Verses, 30, 31.

Golden Text—Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he shall also cry, but shall not be heard. —Prov. 21:13.

American Standard Bible.
Copyright, 1901, by Thomas Nelson & Sons.
(Used by permission.)

(19) Now there was a certain rich man, and he was clothed in purple and fine linen, faring sumptuously every day: (20) and a certain beggar named Lazarus was laid at his gate, full of sores, (21) and desiring to be fed with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table: yea, even the dogs came and licked his sores. (22) And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and that he was carried away by the angels into Abraham's bosom: and the rich man also died, and was buried. (23) And in Hades he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. (24) And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue: for I am in anguish in this flame. (25) But Abraham said, Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and Lazarus in like manner evil things: but now here he is comforted, and thou art in anguish. (26) And besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed, that they that would pass from hence to you may not be able, and that none may cross over from thence to us. (27) And he said, I pray thee therefore, father, that thou wouldest send him to my father's house; (28) for I have five brethren; that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torment. (29) But Abraham saith, They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. (30) And he said, Nay, father Abraham: but if one go to them from the dead, they will repent. (31) And he said unto him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, if one rise from the dead.

Verse By Verse.

BY C. C. BUCKNER.

v. 19. Now there was a certain rich man: We are accustomed to call this man "Dives," which is the Latin word meaning "a rich man." Clothed in purple: This was the color of the outer garment. And fine linen: The inner garment was made of linen.

v. 20. Named Lazarus: This is a contraction from the Hebrew, Eleazar, which means, "Helped of God."

v. 21. Even the dogs came and licked his sores: This is to indicate the awfulness of the man's condition. Whether it was a painful or pleasant sensation does not concern us.

v. 22. He was carried away by the angels into Abraham's bosom: Jesus makes use of the current idea of angelic bearers of the dead.

v. 23. Hades: This word is not synonymous with "hell." It was the resting place of both the worthy and unworthy dead.

v. 24. Father Abraham: The rabbis said, "The fire of Gehenna has no power over the sinners of Israel, for Abraham descends and rescues them from it."

v. 25. He is comforted: For his real worth, not for the hardships endured.

v. 27. Send him to my father's house: Too often we allow the opportunities of service to our loved ones to pass beyond us. Testify unto them: The rich man is here seeking to shift the responsibility for his sins upon others by the implication that he had not sufficient warning of the terrible penalty of sin.

v. 31. If they hear not Moses and the prophets: Men cannot be frightened into genuine repentance.

At the Heart of the Lesson.

BY REV. A. Z. CONRAD, PH.D.

AFTER DEATH, WHAT?

The world has no glimpse of the life beyond the tomb except through the portals of revelation. The inevitableness of death all know and feel. The yearning of the heart for some knowledge of the future life is constant. The tombs of all nations tell the story of the search for the secret of the after-life. The natural longing for immortality is reinforced by reason and conscience. There are violent contrasts of condition in the world about us which have no satisfactory explanation apart from the future life. The prosperity of the wicked is a matter of common observation. Vice gloats over its victims and goes unpunished. Violated law is practiced with impunity. Pinching and paralyzing poverty deprives multitudes of peace and comfort. Goodness maintained at tremendous cost receives scarcely a look of recognition in many instances. Industry is often unrequited. Twenty thousand dollar necklaces of pearl, ten thousand dollar banquets for dogs, hundred thousand dollar musical instruments in private drawing rooms, on one street, while in the same city a little distance away is seen the struggle up in the face of poverty, disease and woe; half clad and hungry children, neglected and maltreated wives and mothers. Every consideration of justice demands that there should be a day of reckoning. Virtue cannot go forever unrewarded else justice is dead. God hath appointed a day in which justice will be tempered with mercy, but judgment will be passed. This is demanded by every sense of right.

EXECRATED EXALTATION.

Jesus had spoken the parable of the unjust steward. It had increased hostility. When unrighteousness is rebuked one of two things will happen, repentance or rebellion. The Pharisees rebelled. In verse 14 we read, "They were lovers of money." There is an opposition worse than open rebellion. It is the insult of ridicule. Not daring openly to oppose Jesus they resorted to a jeering sarcasm. "And the Pharisees also who were covetous heard all these things and they derided him," literally, "Turned up their noses at him."

They treated him with sarcastic contempt. It is the argument of the critics who have no just answer. Their presumptuous self-righteousness which was ever parading their prosperity as an evidence of God's favor required a stronger blow than had yet been given. They had assumed that wealth was a sign of divine approbation. They related purse to piety. Their own self-approbation and self-satisfaction were accepted in place of the commendation of God. With a withering rebuke Jesus reversed their estimates of themselves and without equivocation drew their portraits before their eyes.

PRAYERLESS PRODIGALS.

In a parable the most terrible ever uttered by Jesus Christ he reveals the futility of a self approval which takes no account of the law of God. The most striking portrayal of after-death conditions ever given to the world has been presented in the parable which we read. It is so plain a child can understand it. To deny it is to divest Christ of all authority and erase every utterance of his from the sacred Book. It can neither be explained away nor ridiculed out of court.

"There was a certain rich man," v. 19. This is typical and representative. It includes all who in the midst of abundance forget God. His wealth was vast. His purple apparel indicated not only high rank but certain royal prerogatives. Fine linen inner garments suggest not only wealth, but culture and refined taste. He was concerned more about clothes than character. He was concerned to please his palate but not to perfect his piety. It is possible to enjoy costly viands and win no victories. He was a man of affairs. He represented a maximum of business with a minimum of benevolence. His physical luxuriousness had corresponding spiritual leanness. Hospitality is possible with no helpfulness. He was convivial but not conscientious. His wealth was no crime. We are quite as likely to neglect the rich, religiously, as the poor. More definite effort is put forth today for the redemption of the slums than for the redemption of the scum. In a boiling cauldron the accumulation at the top is quite as much in need of purifying as the sediment at the bottom. Between the two there is a vast deal of both wealth and poverty, legitimate, honest, upright. Neither wealth nor poverty, as such, is either to be commended or condemned.

PATHETIC POVERTY.

There is a pathos about unrelieved poverty which appeals to every sympathetic being. "The certain beggar" spoken of by Jesus is as representative as "The certain rich man." Lazarus was not to be commended because he was poor. He is to be commended because he evidently bore his poverty with resignation. In both instances we have to reach the character of the men from the consequences of their lives. It is a sad commentary upon the civilization that compels honest, deserving, needy men to beg. Lazarus may have been robbed of his wealth, he may have been the victim of conspiracy, or of conditions he could not prevent. The fact was, he was a poor, helpless, poverty-stricken invalid. He was laid at the rich man's splendid portal. Lazarus was Dives' opportunity more than his obligation. We are so constantly deceived by conscienceless degenerates that the heart becomes easily steeled against deserving destitution.

FROM PAUPER TO PRINCE.

"And it came to pass that the poor man died and was buried, and was carried by the angels of heaven into Abraham's bosom." This is a brief but striking statement of the inexpressible felicity which followed his unrelieved poverty. There is no setting back of the hands on God's chronometers. The one thing of which we are positively sure is our departure from this world. The wretchedness of Lazarus unrelieved by the rich man was immediately removed by the incident of death. His poverty had been a prayerful poverty as the rich man's life had been one of prayerless prodigality. The immediateness of blessing is declared. "He was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom."

"SON, REMEMBER."

"As a man soweth so shall he also reap." Not only has God spoken it. He has written it in the very constitution of Man. The condition of Dives was a result of his own deliberate choice. He chose worldly attractions, he lived a life of selfishness, he forgot human distress, he forgot God, he forgot goodness. "Son, remember." The Patriarch gave this answer to his appeal. "Thou in thy life time receivedst thy good things." It was not stated that he received good, or goodness, but "Thy good things." He did not propose to be deprived of physical gratification in the hope of Heaven. There are many of his kind living today. "Likewise Lazarus his evil things," suffering, distress, and trial, and burden. "Now he is comforted." By what? By relief, from all the oppression and distress. But more. By the approval of God. "Thou art tormented." How? By the reflection of what had been lost through the neglect of God. By the sense of unforgiven sin. By insatiable desire which could not be relieved. By the thought of his past indulgences, which had burned out his very life. By the knowledge of the selfishness which had lost to him divine blessing.

THE FIXED GULF.

"And beside all this there is between Lazarus and you a great gulf fixed." It is scant comfort anyone can take through distortion of Scripture which would extend the probationary period beyond the grave to those who are living in sight of the cross here. It would be hard to contemplate a greater definiteness of declaration than we have. Jesus Christ warns us against projecting the privileges of this life into the next. Anywhere, anytime, in all eternity, that any immortal soul should repent and turn to God the very nature of God would demand recognition, pardon and peace. The great gulf fixed means something. It means that direction is definite. It means that disposition is permanently determined by choice. From no single word of Jesus Christ can there be gained one moment's assurance or even hope that those who have had an opportunity to know him here, and who have declined, will be likely to be regenerated in the world to come.

The sun meets not the spring bud that stretches toward him with half that certainty, as God, the source of all good, communicates himself to the soul that longs to partake of him.—William Law.

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

TOPIC FOR MAY 13, 1914.

Church Finance. I Cor. 16:1-3; 2 Cor. 9:6, 7.

A doctor of my acquaintance says that when a fool has nothing else to do he cuts down a tree. If one is out of sorts, he is tempted to make a remark of similar import about certain critics of the church. The critics of the church are not all fools by any means. But there are intelligent persons who seem to lose their intelligence when they discuss the financial policy of the church. Quite often the weakness of the reformer of church finances is that he has had a very limited experience both as a contributor and as a collector of funds. Men who manage their own business successfully may be absolute failures as managers of the business of a church.

A VISION OF SERVICE.

The first thing to be discussed in connection with efficiency in church finances is the mission of the church. If we begin with money, we shall not go far. Prudent, frugal men have been known to offer their entire fortunes to their country in times of war. Under ordinary circumstances they were careful to keep their money. The vision of their country in need made them willing to serve it with all they could offer. Where there is no vision there is no willingness to give money to the enterprises of the church. Some men have caught the meaning of the command to go into all the world and preach the gospel. They freely give of their means for the support of missionaries. Is the church rendering an important service to its community? Let that service be understood. If the church is not doing anything to moralize and spiritualize its neighborhood, self-respecting men will not ask anybody to give money to keep it alive.

"EACH ONE OF YOU."

There is great power in the church when every member does his part. The discouraging fact is that the sense of responsibility for the growth and influence of the church has no place in many lives. The benefits of civilization and religion as accepted by not a few of us prove that we are important persons. We do not receive them as appeals to generous and heroic living. Our teachers must take part of the blame. We ought to have been made to feel that every benefit carries with it an obligation and an opportunity. Perhaps the leaders of our churches can do more than they have done to show where obligation and privilege meet. The most hopeless man is he who cannot see that the help rendered by the weakest is worth while. Many thousands do nothing because they think they will not be missed. And we ministers who take all our illustrations from the lives of conspicuous persons are partly responsible for this. The heroism of the obscure should be our theme more often than that of the renowned. We have yet to learn the meaning of democracy in religion.

"THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK."

Those who keep the morning watch realize the benefits of regularity in the devotional life. We are more apt to study the Bible with profit if we have a time for study. Will it not be advantageous if we have a set time for giving of our means for the support of the church? I do not understand that Paul is laying down a law from which no deviation is to be allowed. We must give in our own way and because we are glad to give. But we usually do our work best when we are systematic. The day of worship is naturally the day for us to consider all our obligations to the institutions of religion. If it is more convenient to pay on some other day, our contribution will doubtless be just as acceptable to God. The suggestion that each one lay by on the first day of the week means that not only the individual but also the church should be systematic in its business. Slipshod methods go with indifference and incompetence.

1 Tim. 6:17; 1 Pet. 4:10; 2 Cor. 8:11-14; 2 Sam. 24:24; 2 Chron. 15:7; Prov. 13:7; Matt. 19:21, 22; 1 Cor. 13:3; Phil. 4:10-16; 1 Tim. 5:8; Heb. 6:10; 13:16.

"Wild Cat" Stock Investment

The honest investors—who expect only the best safe return for their money—instinctively grasp their pocketbook strings the tighter—when you mention Mining—Oil—or—"wild cat" Insurance stocks, and their like.

Their instincts are right—too. Shun all types of so-called "Big Return" Investments as you would the pestilence. They contain nothing but pitfalls for the average person.

Look for the investment with a fair return—about 6 per cent—then you are sure of your principal. Take my advice. Be content with a fair return on your investment.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

The Bethany Graded System Is the Only Body of Literature Published by the Disciples That Follows the International Course Throughout

OTHER systems depart from this course, either in part or throughout all departments. There are at least three reasons why the thorough-going International outlines should be followed by Disciples' schools: (1) Co-operation with other communions, for which we as a people stand, is thereby assured. Many and loud are the complaints coming from towns where the "half-way" graded literature is being used, and where graded unions are being organized. (2) The spirit of co-operation with the International Sunday School Association is shown only by following its guidance in the matter of selected lines of study. (3) The best system of study is assured. For the International Committee, with its specialists of world-wide reputation, is able to outline a better course than any single denomination can devise.

The New Spirit in Sunday School Work is Embodied in the Bethany System of Sunday School Literature

THE recent appointment by President Hill M. Bell of a Religious Education Commission for the Disciples is indicative of an unrest with the conditions that have obtained in the Sunday Schools of the past. It is a source of satisfaction to the Disciples Publication Society that the Bethany System of Literature has been prepared on the basis of the highest ideals of religious education.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR HERBERT L. WILLETT, CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

But If Not

Suppose we have been mistaken about it all. Suppose we have been reasoning throughout from false premises. Suppose we begin our mathematical computations with an error in the multiplier or divisor of the first equation and have been multiplying, dividing, adding and subtracting on the basis of that error throughout the problem. We think our figures tell the truth, "but if not"—

Faith must reckon with these three words, and reckon in ways to which some forms of faith are stranger.

Let us take the familiar incident of the three Hebrew children in the fire. They had faith, and by that faith they came through the furnace without the smell of fire upon their garments. That we say was the triumph of faith. But if that thing happened once in the world's history it was only once, and a hundred thousand times men have suffered in the fiery furnace for their faith's sake and have never come forth at all. What about their faith? The instructive thing about it is that the three brave Hebrews themselves contemplated precisely that possibility. Their faith in God was not merely a faith that He could save them out of the fire. They believed that He could; they hoped He would, "but if not!" They were brave enough to contemplate even that awful possibility.

It is just at this point that we need now and then to take stock of our faith, and to realize that it may exist in either one, or both, of two quite different component elements. We go to the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, and we read of those "Who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens. Women received their dead raised to life again."

What a glorious faith it was that could do those things! As we read the words we assume that faith must always produce these results, and not only so but that faith in God consists in the assurance that every time and always God will perform these wonderful deliverances.

This noble passage ends with a sad but glorious antithesis. It tells us that "others were tortured, not accepting deliverance;" that "others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover of bonds and imprisonment." It tells us that "they were stoned, sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword." It tells us that "they wandered about in sheep-skins and goat-skins; being destitute, afflicted, tormented." It tells us that "they wandered in deserts and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth."

Now, manifestly, if the faith of these people consisted merely in their belief that they would escape these tortures, their faith was vain, and they died in their sins, or at least they died in sorrow and delusion.

Have we had two kinds of faith, or is there a common element in them both? We turn back again to those fine heroes in the book of Daniel, who answered the king and said, "If it so be, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace and he will deliver us out of thy hand, O king. But if not!"

* * *

Yes, yes and if not, then what? "If not, we will worship the image. If not, we will count our faith a failure. If not, we will believe there is no difference between the living God and Nebuchadnezzar's image. If not, we shall know that we have trusted in a delusion." Let us take notice that this is precisely what they did not say. They believed that God was able to deliver them. They hoped that He would deliver them, but they contemplated without shrinking the other possibility. This is what they said:

"But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up."

Now here was the essence of their real heroism. If they had known to an absolute certainty that their passage through the fiery furnace was to be a mere triumphal exhibition, it would have had no more moral quality than belongs to the juggling of any performer in sleight of hand. Their faith became truly heroic only as they contemplated the possibility that the thing they hoped for might fail and even then determined that they would be true to God and duty.

Sometime or other we all must face this possibility. We have our beliefs and they are precious. "We know in part and we prophesy in part" and the little that we know is unspeakably dear and the greater part we believe is even dearer. It is dearer because it is this faith which we have purchased at so great a price and that price is measured by the possibility of these three words, "But if not."

What Is the Word of God?

"The word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it."

A SERMON BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES.

THE text belongs to an age when the word of God was not identified with a book or a compilation of books, so much as with the living voice of conscience and aspiration. Although written records existed, of which the book of Deuteronomy itself is a notable example, yet the "word" was primarily something spoken. It was vocal and vibrant. The criteria by which these words of the mind's flowing thought are tested cannot be the same as the criteria usually employed to determine the genuineness of documents. After one has discovered the age of a written record, its authorship and its literary construction, one has yet to ask its meaning and its value. The words must be made vocal again and allowed to speak to the mind and heart as they did the first men who cherished them.

The Bible does not claim to present all truth. Even the world itself could not contain the books necessary for that. Nor are we to assume that everything which the Bible records is consistent with history and modern science. The earth is not flat and the world did not come to an end in the first century of the Christian era. The Bible, like other great collections of books, contains divine words. It does not distinguish these by infallible marks and we are forced to seek out for ourselves some means of determining their value. We need tests which are applicable, not only to the Bible, but also to the Vedas, to the Koran, to modern literature, and to living oral speech. Our age craves practical, empirical tests which afford the sense of reality even if they yield results which are tentative and incomplete.

DISCOVERING THE WORD OF GOD.

The text itself suggests such a method for discovering the true word of God. "The word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart." This assertion may be taken either as descriptive of something one already knows, or as the means of discovering what is not clearly defined. In the latter case, the meaning is clearer when the sentence is inverted to read: "That word which is nigh unto thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart," is the word. This would mean that whatever word is intimate and vital and commanding is the true word. There are other texts which are similarly illuminating when inverted. Take the one which compares the word of God to a two-edged sword. One here gets the emphatic assurance that a word which is quick and powerful and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discoverer of the thoughts and intents of the heart, is the word of God.

In another passage, it is said that all scripture given by inspiration of God is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness. In that form the statement has been the subject of endless theological discussion. It has been agreed that all scripture given by inspiration should be profitable in these ways, but the question keeps reappearing, What scripture is really given by inspiration? How much simpler it is to take the predicate of the sentence as a genuine definition of the subject. Then it means that all scripture which is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness is given by the inspiration of God. When the psalmist says, "The entrance of thy words giveth light," we confidently believe him to mean that all light-giving words are divine. Again, he exclaims, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path," and we cannot be mistaken if we conclude that whatever illuminates our way and guides our steps is thereby proved to be divine.

GOD'S WORD IN EVERY HEART.

The inversion of these familiar texts enables us to take our stand within immediate experience and to select as divine that which is best in that experience. The author of Deuteronomy evidently endeavored to impress this fact. God's word is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven nor beyond the sea. The divine word is not a mystery which only persons of peculiar gifts may discover. It is at the heart of every man's deepest conviction. You may call it conscience, or the voice of duty, or one's most ideal interest, or one's notion of being a gentleman. It is not the exclusive possession of great men, or of fortunate men, or of learned men. It certainly is not the prerogative of "psychics," or of neurotics, or of ignoramuses. It speaks in every heart. All appeals to the masses presuppose their capacity to hear it. All education strives to quicken the power of the common mind to appreciate it. All religion which is vital and satisfying speaks and understands this universal language.

The text gives a characterization of the divine word by which it may be distinguished and recognized. It is intimate and vital; it is warm with the heart's burning passion; it is capable of fulfillment in noble action. These qualities may be variously paraphrased. Three terms from our daily experience are here selected. They are intended to emphasize that nearness and depth and utility of the inspired word which so impressed the writer of Deuteronomy. We may affirm, then, that the word of God is serious; that it is sane; and it is enduring.

The word of God is a serious word. It is earnest and important. It cannot be insincere nor idle nor capricious. Small talk and curious gossip do not utter it. The serious word concerns our main purposes, the ends and interests with which we feel our deeper selves involved. The lighter moods are natural enough and quite inevitable. Much may be said in their behalf. Man's life is not all of a piece. One cannot always be his best and greatest self. There are lesser selves which take their turns. In many moments we are only at play. We assume a role. We jest. We play the devil's advocate. In each character one hears and speaks the language that the character demands.

THE IMPORTANT WORDS.

Nor are these characters confused. Everyone knows how to allow for casual remarks at tea parties and on gala-days. But when the hour strikes, the player throws aside the mask and resumes the serious task. He is again in earnest and his will strives once more towards its goal. Now the greater words are demanded. There must be no false commands, nor any failure to respond. Nothing but the truth will satisfy. The words spoken by a business man over his desk in his busy hours have the edge and thrust of reality. His personality is stamped on them. He must redeem them later. So it is with the locomotive engineer at the throttle. So is it with the physician bending over his patient. Each, at his task, devoutly attends to all that he hears and urgently seeks the truest word which can be found. Such words have structure and stability. When weighed against the drifting images of reverie, they are real and substantial.

The greater the crisis the more important words become. When Moses had brought the Israelites within sight of the promised land, he was required to let them go forward without him. He had led them through hunger and plague and war. Many times they had lost heart and rebelled. How could these wayward, impulsive people be made loyal and courageous for the task before them? The writer of Deuteronomy saw that moment in all its tremendous urgency. He felt that it was of vast and cosmic significance. Heaven and earth were called to witness. It was an occasion of life and death, of blessing and cursing, a moment for the word of the ancient covenant and of the inmost conscience to be recognized as the very word of God.

IN TIMES OF CRISIS.

In the crises of personal history also the serious things are said. On the day when the son is leaving home to try his fortunes in the open places of the world, the father yearns to sink a word deep into the boy's heart. It is likely to be the word he heard from his father, which experience has only enhanced and brightened. Or it is the word which good friends speak to each other in the mellow moods of comradeship. The trustful, confiding hour in which souls unburden themselves and hold no reservation is the hour of divine speech. There is a peculiar quality of tone and accent at such moments which baffles all description, but it is the quality known to the heart itself. One sometimes suddenly becomes aware of this deeper note of candor and sincerity in a conversation. At first, there is the casual air, the natural remoteness and austerity which is the conventional habit of civil folk. Without any warning or conscious intent, at the mention of a name, the real communion of souls sets in. By a strange shift, not unlike the half-pleasant sensation of being lowered quickly in an elevator, the conversation descends to a profounder depth. No extraneous assurances are asked or given. The two souls are sure of each other directly and unhesitatingly. The word they convey and cherish in subdued breath, but with inner abandon, is a word with divine seriousness and charm. In after moments they will remember it. In periods of silence and loneliness that memory will radiate warmth and healing light.

This depth and intensity of meaning are the religious quality. Nowhere is it profounder than in that crucial moment when the troubled soul, conscious of its guilt and sincerely penitent, hears the words of forgiveness and comfort. When the child, disregarding his father's will and suffering, in folly and waywardness comes to himself and turns back toward the outstretched arms of love, then he begins to know what the word of God is. It is the word of compassion and pity which a human father finds welling up in his heart for the son that was lost and is found. It is the word which reconciles estranged friends. That word works miracles in him who utters it and in him who receives it. No other sign is necessary. It carries its own evidence. The joy which flows from it proves its nature. The peace and power which it brings are marks of its divinity.

JESUS SPOKE WORDS NOT HIS OWN.

Jesus seemed at times to be amazed at the words of compassion and assurance which he spoke to the wayward and the weak. They were not His own but another's. "The words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself." "The word which ye hear is not mine. That is the natural impression every sensitive mind still receives upon reading the conversations of Jesus at the supreme crises of life. We still cherish what He said to mothers about their little ones; what He said to young men seeking eternal life; what He said to the weary and heavy-laden; what He said to the multitudes on the mountain at the beginning of his ministry; and what He said at last from the cross itself.

The word of God is a sane and solving word. It is not the utterance of haste or anger. Nor is it the exclamation of the mystic or the eccentric person. Deliberation and consistency belong to it. The divine word gives light. It shows the way and reveals the path.

On this account, the Beatitudes are divine words. They are guides to happiness and to blessedness. Men crave satisfaction. They seek the way to it. In their confusion and short-sightedness, they ponder over the problem. The books of religion and philosophy are multiplied in the search. Many vain and empty words concerning it are spoken by false prophets and by blind guides. These words of Jesus are novel with the grace of simplicity and the charm of solving wisdom. They reaffirm the clearest of lessons of experience, namely, that docile and reverent souls possess the means of true power; that eager and hungry spirits gain spiritual satisfactions; that to the merciful, mercy is given and that the pure in heart see God.

EXPERIENCE THE FINAL TEST.

Christianity is itself good proof of the validity of these sayings, for it has always been most completely satisfying and most successful when it most completely exemplified these principles. The early Christians often gave evidence by their character that they had found answers to life's deepest needs. "They were generally quite commonplace and unimportant people with a treasure in earthen vessels. Their message they put in various ways, with the aphasia of ill-educated men, who have something to tell that is far too big for any words at their command. But they were astonishingly upright, pure and honest; they were serious, and they had in themselves inexplicable reserves of moral force and a happiness far beyond anything that the world knew."

Experience is the final test. The words which prove true are of God. "And if thou say in thine heart, How shall we know the word which the Lord hath not spoken? When the prophet speaketh in the name of the Lord, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not spoken."

It is also evident that the word of God is found close to the living needs of the human heart. The word men crave is the one which will be the solvent for their present perplexity and doubt. That is the comforting assurance about the deepest hunger and thirst. Its very intensity is a kind of guarantee that it will be satisfied. Sometimes our anxiety is met by the warning that we are anxious about the wrong things. To have the direction of our desires changed is often their best fulfillment. But when the needs are vital, when they are not self-centered nor concerned with artificial interests, then they are tokens of truth about to be discovered. Again and again the prophets of modern science have besought nature for knowledge and have found it. They have watched and waited, they have delved and tested, they have literally suffered and agonized in the search for the cause and cure of diseases which waste human life. Again and again they have succeeded, and now sober men of science look forward to the elimination and destruction of all contagious scourges and plagues.

WHEN GOD SPEAKS CLEARLY.

Such experiences give man new confidence in his arduous pursuit of wisdom. As he centers his interest upon the great cause of human welfare, he gains assurance in the quest for truth. God seems to speak to him with greater clearness and with a fuller revelation when he craves knowledge which serves the deepest needs of men. Perhaps it is this which gives such vitality to the movements for social justice, world peace, and universal education. These mount the highways on which men have always been enveloped by the greatest light. Here they have gained the highest and most useful revelations.

The word of God is an enduring word. It endures not because of any extraneous quality but because of its inherent vitality. It proves itself time after time in the life of successive generations. It is cherished like all useful things because it commends itself directly to the judgment and experience of men. When Jesus spoke to the common people, they heard him gladly. His stories went home to their hearts. He spoke as one having authority. He knew deeply and intimately their needs and what would satisfy them. His sayings have therefore been repeated from friend to friend and from father to son. Disciples of Jesus through the centuries have surrendered their own comfort and endured untold hardships in order to carry his words to the ends of the earth. Any words which have this power to win men to their perpetuation are worthy to be called divine. For these words have never been profitable in a worldly way. At first hearing they have not been popular. They have struck at ancient customs and ancestral faiths; they have denounced many forms of personal pleasure; they have imposed burdens and crosses and still men have clung to them and passed them on to those they loved.

GOD SPEAKS TODAY.

Words which commend themselves in this way to the deep and continuous experience of men show themselves thereby to belong to the body of divine truth. And any words which are heard now for the first time and which shall continue to repeat themselves with such wealth of affection and such mastery of men's wills may thereby be known to be the words of God. If a scientist makes a new experiment in his laboratory and furnishes a clear record of it, he has added to the sum of knowledge. He has achieved something which is true for everyone else who is concerned with that problem. In that sense his discovery is absolutely and universally true. And if in addition to being true, it is also of vast importance to the welfare of mankind, as the discovery of the cause of cancer would be, then it takes on religious significance and may be devoutly felt to be the very word of God.

Those who believe that God still speaks to men are able to find confirmation in many historical occasions. For at these times, words have been spoken which are so serious, so solving and so persistently true to experience that they are thereby judged to be divine. The process of bringing this word to clear expression and full definition is often long and tragic. It was so with reference to human slavery. Men were slow to perceive the truth about it. There are individuals yet who do not recognize it, but there is no civilized nation which has not put itself on record as to what the word of God is concerning slavery. Other revelations concerning social justice are surely being given to those races which are most sincerely endeavoring to find them and to live by them.

AGE DOES NOT MAKE WORDS GREAT.

It is not, then, the mere age of words which proves them. They must also have radiating, social vitality. They must live in the minds of great souls, affording power and satisfaction. Unfortunately not all men strive to attain and utilize the highest forms of truth any more than they strive for the highest works of art. Men of base impulses may deny the truth. Persons of irresponsible wills cannot be the patrons of practical ideals. Those who have no hunger or thirst cannot know the great satisfactions. Only serious men, bearing genuine responsibilities, are appreciative of the divine word. They are therefore the ones to whom it comes. They are the bearers of revelation in religion, in science and in social justice. They constitute the successive companies of prophets. Through their search for the light, they gain illumination and they hand on the torch to other eager hands uplifted to receive it. This light, borne forward by loyal souls faithful to the path it shows, is the true and living light of the word of God.

This word is never to be measured by the particular, external form in which it comes. It may come in a burning bush, or in a dream, or in the beautiful personality of a friend. We are less likely to expect it in some strange experience than were men of old. The commonplace, familiar means of knowledge have risen to the dignity of heavenly messengers. God's truth emerges out of reasoned thoughts and out of disciplined efforts of will. It lies on the open page of many a book. It throbs in the news of the day. Where more clearly may one find the shattered illusions of mere pleasure or the agony of tragic selfishness and greed? Daily life swells with the vast tides of the fathomless sea of the moral universe. Out of its depths come good and ill in bewildering profusion.

But on every hand are interpreters and guides, keepers of the hard-won knowledge of good and evil. The teacher of little children, the judge of the court of law, the artist at the shrine of beauty—each utters the divine word. Friends earnestly conversing, mother and child embracing, lovers rediant with joy, share with each other its infinite glory and power.

Up to Baalbek

A Winter Journey to the Ruins of the Ancient Roman City of the Sun.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT, JR.

WE WENT to Baalbek, two of us, near the end of December, expecting snow-covered ruins, cold winds and frozen, wintry landscapes. And in the darkness of six a. m., as we hurried down to the train, all the chill we had anticipated attacked us, as it did again when the groaning train crawled up to the snow level of the Lebanons. But after an eight hours' trip, when we reached the little station of Baalbek on the branch of the railroad from Reyak to Tripoli, we stepped into the month of May. The rich, red soil of the plain, now ploughed for the first crop, seemed to be steaming under the burning sun. A stern, rocky hillside, yellow as the desert sands, frowned down on the village with its numberless dark eyes, which we knew were old hermit caves and tombs. Tall, gloomy cypresses here and there stretched themselves to their utmost to escape the clouds of dust rising from the road, as the tinkling flocks of sheep went past, or a caravan of tawny camels softly padded on its way to Damascus markets.

We hurried to the ruins to prowl around awhile before dusk, and see something of the mammoth walls of the old temple enclosure. We climbed over the debris, looked into dark tunnel mouths, vaulted new-made mud walls in the fields which inclose the old temples, and wondered, as every visitor must, at the large stones which those ancient architects contrived to utilize. There is a tradition accepted by many of the most learned Orientals that Baalbek was in its glory before the flood, because only mastodons could have put into place blocks over sixty-three feet long and thirteen feet thick and high. Although the only tourists, we were not alone, for the people of Baalbek are not of those who ignore the wonders of their surroundings or find in them only a mine for silver and coppers. Rather do they seem to love the old stones, and they live with them, laughing, singing, dreaming, perhaps seeing what to our cruder eyes seems invisible.

THE TEMPLE OF BACCHUS.

I shall not attempt to usurp the rights of the red-backed guide book, for I cannot describe the Temple of Bacchus with its elaborate carving, the huge and imposing Propylæa, the Hexagonal Court, the vast extent of the ruins, and most perfect of all, the six giant columns, all that remains of the vast Temple of the Sun, brooding eternally over the perished glory of the spot. I can only attest the quiet which these calm and majestic ruins, undaunted amid centuries of strife, of war, of earthquake which shook their very foundations, bring to one who goes to them willingly to be soothed. They seem proud to stand as tokens of the wonder of man's ancient skill. The very turmoil produced by the great upheavals of nature which have scattered mammoth blocks in confusion seems peaceful, glad to be at rest after centuries of noisy worship and martial shouting. For the temples have been forts as well as altars. Only one thing jars—an unsightly tablet high up in the wall of the Temple of Bacchus, which gaudily commemorates, in thoroughly bad taste, the visits of the German emperor, who allowed himself the honor of camping in the court of this ancient shrine.

We had a glorious morning inside the ruins, struggling to reach high walls or masses of debris as yet unclimbed, in our search for advantageous spots for our kodaks. We inspected the gloomy little cells of the early Roman priests, saw the leaning column, the three pieces of which were so cleverly clamped together with bronze insets that the shock of the pillar's fall, which left a depression on the side wall of the temple, and centuries in an unnatural position, have not separated. We counted the variations of the Egyptian (wrongly called the Greek) key design ingeniously wrought into pillars and friezes. And then we left reluctantly to purchase ancient coins and stones guaranteed to have been found in the temple area.

The Silent Ruins of Baalbek.

OUR MOST INTERESTING EXPERIENCE.

But it was on the way back to Beirut, in a third-class compartment—for at such a distance from home one learns to be economical—that we had the most interesting experience of the trip. Our traveling companions were three desert dwellers, clad in the coarse white cloth they use so much, and comfortably postured among their bags and sacks at one end of the compartment. At the opposite windows a Turkish soldier, very ragged, very pockmarked, with one eye gone, and a general look of having seen considerable hardship; and a timid, modest, Beirut storekeeper who endeavored to attract as little attention as possible. And in the center of the seat, opposite Brown and myself, another Beduin, tall, turbaned, disdainful, with the pride of his race and hatred of the townsman written in every line of his spare figure.

No sooner had we taken our places than the drama commenced—whether for our benefit or not I was unable to determine. The soldier, unable to find his ticket, rudely pulled the tradesman from his seat into the middle of the aisle, where the little fellow crouched until the search was at an end, and he was allowed to return to his place. That was a signal to our Beduin neighbor, who, after a few scathing remarks about townsmen in general and those in Beirut in particular, accompanied by sweeping gesticulations, wantonly struck the tradesman and threw his tarboosh on the rather filthy floor. The protests of the victim were unheeded amid the hearty acclamations of the representative of power, and the tormentor, encouraged by such approbation, for a few moments did all that years of practice in the art of baiting could suggest to make life a burden to the object of his dislike.

AN EXCITING MOMENT.

At last the latter, stung to self defense, flew at the haughty figure beside him and was in a fair way to take vengeance by strangling him, when the soldier, whose sport was thus being spoiled, intervened and threw the tradesman back into his corner, striking him viciously with his stick to enforce respect. Silence for a few minutes, while the desert rewound its disarranged turban and the town lighted its cigaret. But as bad luck would have it, a wraith of smoke blew into the soldier's face, and he, who had lived in smoke all his life, suddenly grew resentful and reminded the onlookers that he was not to be so rudely treated, by administering another sharp rebuke with his cane. Probably the Beduin felt that he would be less impolite, for he snatched the burning cigaret, and when the owner objected, threw his tarboosh once more on the floor.

Then three things happened to change the situation. Brown and I, tired of the horse play, ceased to act as audience, and turned away from the actors. The tradesman leaned over and kissed the ragged coat of the Turk. And the rattle of an officer's sword was heard in the next compartment. Whichever fact influenced the soldier, he changed sides at once, nodded encouragingly to the Beirutian, and warned the Beduin to be more polite and restore the soiled tarboosh. But the man could not realize that his game was over, and instead of obeying, kicked the hat into a corner of the car. Whereupon he was reminded that disregard of the force of arms is a dangerous amusement by a slap on the cheek that must still tingle, and a none-too-gentle thrust in the same direction the fez had gone. His three companions, comfortable in their corner, did not bestir themselves to his aid, and so he picked himself up, again adjusted his turban, drew his feet up on the seat so as to sit on them, and sulked in silence. We were very glad to see him so discomfited, but were prepared for the sequel: the whole party of six drinking arak together— at the expense of Beirut—at the next station, and giving all evidence of mutual esteem and consideration.

The sons of the Prophet may stand united on their religion, but they do not overlook racial or class distinctions in the process of exterminating unbelievers.

The moon was brilliant on the snow-covered crests of Sannin as we walked home from the station, and when the bells rang in the New Year just as we entered the college gate, I wondered who in the noisy cafes of our great cities of the West could help envying us the silence and the beauty of our surroundings here.

A Journey to George Ade's Home

BY EDGAR DEWITT JONES.

[Editor's Note: Since Mr. Jones' article was written, the death of "Uncle John" Ade, father of the humorist, has been announced in the newspapers. This makes the story of the "journey" to his home the more timely. The fact that John Ade was a member of the Christian Church at Kentland, Ind., will lend interest to the narrative.]

NEXT to visiting a celebrity as his guest is, I suppose, to visit his home as the guest of his father. At any rate, I arrived at this conclusion after a visit to "Hazelden," George Ade's country home near Brook, Indiana, as the guest of his father, Mr. John Ade.

It happened last summer and in this way: I was at Fountain Park Chautauqua, near Remington, Indiana, for a two weeks series of addresses. There I became acquainted with Mr. John Ade, who has a cottage on the grounds and has occupied it every season the Assembly has been in existence, which is about a quarter of a century. Everybody thereabouts calls Mr. Ade "Uncle John," and after you have been in his company for a day or two the desire to use that affectionate and intimate appellation is quite irresistible.

Mr. Ade, Sr., is an accomplished horseshoe player; in fact, is one of the champions of the Hoosier State along with ex-Governor W. T. Durbin, one of the Mr. Studebakers of South Bend, and former vice-president Fairbanks. In blissful innocence I accepted an invitation to play a game of "shoes" as Mr. Ade's partner, and for the next half-hour I was about as proud of my skill as a twelve year old boy is of his newly arrived baby sister.

One fine day when I was sitting on the porch of Mr. Ade's cottage I chanced to ask him a question concerning his famous son's country place, whereupon the gracious gentleman said, "George isn't at home, he is on his way back from Europe, but I will take you to Hazelden tomorrow if you'll go."

VISITING "HAZELDEN."

I said I would be delighted to go, and the next day we set gayly off in the comfortable car of a neighborly fellow-cottager. The hard roads of northwestern Indiana are excellent speedways and our automobile spun merrily along up to within four miles of our destination, where some important mechanism broke and the motor stopped short and refused to start again. Mr. Ade telephoned to his son's house and very soon a spick and span car put in its appearance, took us aboard and within a few minutes we were turning into the beautiful grounds of Hazelden.

Altogether, Mr. George Ade has about twelve hundred acres in his estate, lying close to the little town of Brook. The house, a brown bungalow sort of structure, is situated in the midst of a glorious company of stately old trees, many of which bear the marks of expert doctoring. The grounds are exceedingly well kept and Mr. Ade's landscape gardener has done artistic work. As I strolled over the grounds with my good guide, I saw the Holland windmill pump, the beautiful flowers, the old English backyard garden, the club house and the tiled swimming pool. I likewise observed a portion of the green sward marked off for a game called "Rolling Golf," an invention, I was told, of the humorist himself.

Much as the grounds interested me, the house interested me more, particularly Mr. Ade's study, or den, or library, whatever he may call it. The book-lined walls, the numerous curios gathered by the playwright the world over, the rare prints and pictures—all fascinated me greatly. I recall the appearance of the desk, that there was an opulent looking cigar box on it, that the box was not empty, and lying there with several other books a copy of Gene Stratton Porter's "The Harvester."

Mr. Ade, Sr., sat down in the swivel office chair, pulled open a drawer and brought out a pile of papers. "Here's some of George's writings, I guess," he said. I experienced commingled thrill and embarrassment, somewhat like a young father when for the first time he appears in public pushing a go-cart in which lies his "heir apparent." I observed that one of the manuscripts was an unpublished Fable in Slang, and I recall it was in pencil and written in a most legible hand, which is contrary to all the orthodox traditions of famous authors' copy.

Mr. George Ade, Hoosier Humorist whom "fame has not spoiled." He is "plain, unfrilled and democratic to the core," in spite of the honors the world has thrust upon him.

NO "FUSS AND FEATHERS" FOR GEORGE.

The likelihood is I saw more of the author's workshop as his father's guest than I would had I been his own, for Mr. George Ade is celebrated among his home folks almost as much for modesty and dislike of fuss and feathers as for his genius.

They tell around the Chautauqua grounds that some years ago a well intentioned but blundering platform manager announced that "Mr. George Ade, the famous humorist, is on the grounds today," which so disturbed that modest man of letters that he straightway departed from the Assembly grounds.

How good it is to go among the homefolks of a celebrity and learn how fame has not spoiled their gifted fellow and that he comes and goes among them plain, unfrilled and democratic to the core. Such is the reputation of the author of "Artie" and "The College Widow" in his home and it is all very good to hear and better to see, and best of all, to feel.

On our way back to the Chautauqua grounds we stopped for an hour or so with Mr. Joe Ade, brother of the humorist, who has the oversight of the estate. He made us to feel at home at once by cutting two luscious watermelons and otherwise showing us much old-fashioned hospitality. We also took a look at his fine draft horses and splendid brood mares. Some say that Mr. Joe Ade is even more witty than his famous brother, and all the folks thereabouts declare that the boys get their wit naturally enough from their father.

THE ELDER ADE A HUMORIST.

Every day of my two weeks at Fountain Park I fraternized with Uncle John Ade, listened to his tales of pioneer Indiana, smiled at his quiet humor and laughed heartily at his good, wholesome stories, but I never played another game of horseshoes with him, or against him, no siree!

At the devotional services each morning, sitting in a chair so as to be directly in front of the speaker, for his hearing is not good, sat this gentleman of the old school. Sometimes I saw the fine old face moistened with tears as he followed closely the preacher's message and found comfort in the strong faith of his fathers.

When I first met Mr. Ade, Sr., I congratulated him on being the father of George Ade, and if I shall ever meet that successful writer I shall straightway congratulate him on being the son of John Ade.

THE EMPTY PEW.

By Samuel D. Harkness.

Had I the gift of poetry,
I'd mourn in rhythmic verse
The bugaboo that frightens me
Into conniptions worse
Than smallpox or the mumps.

The preacher's pain I would deplore
Is not the salaree,
For I am getting all I'm worth,
And then some, so you see
This trouble's bigger still.

My enemy's the empty pew,
A gnome of savage mien,
Who makes me preach the gospel to
A crowd that's "sight unseen,"
Because they are not there.

He yawns, and stares at me so blank,
And nods with vacant grin;
And says, "Now, parson, shoot away
Your arrow's meant for sin—
I'll gladly blunt them all.

And when the trumpet call shall sound,
If I'm left in the lurch,
I only trust there never comes
A call to serve some church
Where rules the empty pew.

The Congress at Indianapolis

What was Said and Done at the Annual Open Forum for Discussion of Disciples' Problems.

THE vitality and permanence of the Congress of Disciples of Christ were never more clearly demonstrated than by the fifteenth annual session at Indianapolis last Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. It convened in the face of many circumstances of an untoward character; its location was shifted at the last moment from Kentucky to Indiana; little advertising was done; in some quarters attempts were made to discredit the organization; even some of its leaders and officers evinced discouragement and the majority sentiment seemed to be that the Congress had better be allowed to skip a year without meeting.

In face of these circumstances and sentiments the gathering at Indianapolis takes high rank in point of attendance, character of papers, breadth and eagerness of discussion, and in appreciable contribution to the thought-life of the Disciples of Christ.

DR. SHARPE'S DEVOTION.

It must be said at the opening of this report, as it was said in a resolution to that effect passed at the close of the Congress, that the successes of this gathering are traceable to Dr. Charles M. Sharpe, of the Disciples Divinity House, of Chicago. As secretary of the Congress and chairman of the program committee he bore the burden of both program and arrangements and overcame the doubt of others by his own faith that, even against the many odds, the gathering could be made a success.

Downey Avenue Church, in beautiful Irvington section where Butler College and the College of Missions are located, was the place of meeting. Pastor Charles H. Winders and his congregation graciously undertook the offices of host for the Congress when it was found a few weeks ago that Lexington, Ky., would not be able to entertain the gathering. Many delegates were received into the homes of the community, a considerable number were provided for in the beautiful home of the College of Missions and a few went to the down town hotels. Luncheon and dinner were served by the church ladies in a temporary "tabernacle" adjoining the church building. Signs of the growth of the cause in Irvington were evident in the rising walls of a new Sunday-school building which is the first section of a beautiful and adequate new house of worship shortly to be erected. The auditorium of Downey Avenue Church was just the right size for the services, being comfortably filled in the day time and ample enough by crowding somewhat to receive the evening attendants.

KEEPING THE CHANNELS OPEN.

Dr. E. L. Powell, Louisville's premier preacher, did not leave his eloquence at home when he left for the Congress. His opening address on Tuesday evening on "Keeping the Channels Open" was an impressive and luminous plea for growth and progress through the "open mind." He did not believe that we have yet attained the full truth but that more light was continually to be expected to break from the word of God. Dr. Powell's key words seem to be liberty and love. He declared repeatedly in this address and in the remarks with which as presiding officer he punctuated the program, that the Disciples of Christ have ample margin for the exercise of full liberty to think. Heresy is not a vice of the head, he declared, but of the heart. It consists not so much in thinking error as in the possession of the schismatic spirit. "There is only one heresy, and that is unbrotherliness."

Rev. Walter S. Goode, pastor at Lakewood, O., read the first paper of the Congress on Tuesday night. His theme, "The Minister's Intimate Religious Life," was a searching analysis of the subtle temptations peculiar to the minister and an interpretation of the necessity of demonstrating in his own experience the ideals which he continually preaches to others. This address the present writer did not hear but it is reported by those who were present that it was a conscience-searching address.

DEMOCRACY AND ECCLESIASTICISM.

The current (or should we say "recent"?) discussion among us Disciples as to the organization of our local congregations into an orderly and representative convention for the purposes of a more democratic administration of the missionary and other practical interests common to all our churches was the occasion of the first paper of Wednesday morning. The opposition in certain quarters to such a General Convention as was created at Toronto last October on the ground that it delivers the Disciples over to that awful monster called ecclesiasticism suggested that the title of the paper be formulated thus: "Christian Democracy and Ecclesiasticism Discriminated," and suggested also that the said discrimination be made by Judge Frederick A. Henry of Cleveland, O., who was the president of the Toronto meeting of the General Convention. Judge Henry amazed his hearers with his original and competent grasp of the Scriptures. Almost his entire paper was devoted to an exegesis of the passages throwing light upon the polity of the early Church. No minister present would have done this technical task better. He argued that no fixed type of polity obtained in the early Church or can be dug out of the Scriptures. Elders and deacons were not at first an order with well defined prerogatives and duties. They were simply the older men and servants or ministers, respectively. The practical outcome of Judge Henry's paper was the thesis that we are not bound by any fixed "ancient order of things" as to our polity today, but are left free to meet the problems of our communities and our times with whatever plans of organization seem most efficient.

CLEVELAND VERSUS CLEVELAND.

Judge Henry was followed by Rev. W. K. Azbill also of Cleveland, who made an effective address at Toronto in opposition to the new order of Convention, and thus came into the front of the stage as its leading opponent. Mr. Azbill was granted the same length of time as Judge Henry had used. He spoke without manuscript and without notes, but his formulations were us clean of syntactical indirections as if they had been carefully written down. Mr. Azbill, like Judge Henry, began a long way back of the present concrete problem and was compelled to leave to the imaginations of his hearers the application of his theories to the delegate convention controversy. He was unwilling to accept Judge Henry's exegesis of the New Testament, but was not disposed to make his argument at that point. He denied both our Scriptural right to organize such a convention and the expediency of it when organized, but he confined his argument to the consideration of its expediency. With a display of erudition in the field of church history, no less admirable than Judge Henry's grasp of New Testament teachings, Mr. Azbill pointed out the havoc wrought in all ages of the church by conventions and councils and authoritative bodies of all sorts. He contended that all disunion and our present sectarian order of things were the result of such ecclesiastical organizations arrogating to themselves authority to speak and act for the Church of Christ. His argument took no account of the actual differences of thought and the great currents of advancing or ebbing spiritual life that flowed through history. The great Protestant rupture, and all subsequent denominational subdivisions would not have occurred, he contented, had it not been for the existing ecclesiasticism. The Disciples are headed straight for a division, or perhaps many divisions, if they tolerate the program upon which the General Convention launches us.

A MODEL DISCUSSION.

An eager discussion followed, participated in by Rev. W. F. Richardson of Kansas City, Dr. Powell, Dr. Jabez Hall of Butler College, Rev. Carey E. Morgan of Nashville, Dr. Sharpe, Pres. Miner Lee Bates of Hiram College, who suggested that there would have been nothing to divide had there been no union of a representative and organic sort, Rev. A. B. Philputt, who expressed a degree of doubt about democracy as a competent method of handling all our interests, and others.

There was a beautiful spirit in the discussion, exemplified no less by Mr. Azbill, who stood probably alone in the sentiments he voiced, than by all the rest. The personalities and recriminations with which certain newspapers have dealt with this issue were, of course, conspicuously absent.

In the afternoon Dean Shailer Mathews of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago spoke on "The Minister and Radicalism." Dean Mathews is president of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America and occupies, therefore, the position of a sort of common denominator of all the denominations. He was introduced by Rev. Graham Frank, of Liberty, Mo., as "one of us," not alone on account of the office he holds but in virtue of the spirit and temper of his life and work.

Dr. Mathews talked conversationally for about an hour, in a style such as he would adopt in the class room or at a committee meeting. But nobody's attention wandered for a moment. Every sentence said something. The epigrams and thrusts with which his private and public speech abounds and which make the leading editorial in The Biblical World—of which he is editor—the most fascinating feature of that excellent periodical, kept his audience at the point of attention all the way. Dr. Mathews puts what the football boys call "pep" into his address, but he puts it into his matter rather than his manner. He declared the minister was not a prophet but an apostle. The prophet is one who speaks for God; he has a message and delivers himself of it and takes the consequences—which are usually costly. The prophet is the radical. The apostle is "one sent" by the Church, he is the voice of the Church, the representative of institutionalized religion. The minister's function is apostolic rather than prophetic. The prophet speaks the absolute truth without regard to the times or circumstance or degree of preparedness on the part of his hearers. The apostle, and therefore the minister, takes into constant reckoning the habits of mind, the customs and the present character of the institution. He identifies himself with the institution. He restrains himself from getting far ahead of his institution lest he lose them, and so is lost himself.

RADICALISM DEFINED.

Under several headings the speaker made application of his distinction. Radicalism in social theory, in criticism, in philosophy, in theology, was considered, the radical being the out-and-out theorist who refuses to reckon with the friction of circumstance or the capriciousness and perversity of human nature. The radical, according to Dr. Mathews, is the idealist who is blind to conditions.

This address was not discussed, the hour of its beginning being late and a reception to the delegates by the faculty of Butler College having been announced to take place at 4:30 at the college residence. Many were the regrets that this original and lucid treatment did not receive a review from the floor of the Congress. There were many who would have approved, without revision at a single point, the entire address. Others, awakened by the address to the character of their own actual relation to their churches, would have asked questions that took form in their souls while the Dean spoke. Still others would have challenged out and out the logic of the address and its reality, or, admitting its logic, would have characterized it as, in its net effect, untimely and inapropos.

WHAT IS THE SOCIAL GOSPEL?

The evening address stimulated unmixed enthusiasm. Dr. Mathews spoke again, this time on "The Social Gospel," which he affirmed was the same old gospel. There are not two gospels, he declared at the outset, but one. The social gospel is the good news of the kingdom of God with reference to this very earth-life of ours. In caustic and vivid terms the lecturer characterized as pessimists and skeptics those who doubt Christ's power to take for his kingdom all the departments and forces of our social order. "So profound is my own faith in the Deity of our Lord," he said, "that I cannot believe he will have to fall back upon some premillennial cataclysm in order to establish his Kingdom." The social forces of the world are being Christianized, the forces that center in the individual man and make him what he is. The Feminist movement, the Immigration movement, the movement for Industrial justice and the Peace movement were discussed.

It was a faith-creating address. When Dr. Mathews sat down Dr. F. E. Lumley of the College of Missions spoke in review. He contributed additional light on the nature of the "Social Gospel" by showing that it is the gospel to the individual, but with an enlarged conception of what an individual is. The individual is a social phenomenon, he said. No individual liveth unto himself.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

EDITORIAL

THE PRESIDENT AND PEACE.

AS AN illustration of patience and self-control President Wilson today commands the respect of the world. Last week war seemed inescapable. The whole country had settled down to the acceptance of it. The army and navy were on the qui vive for it. The President alone, and his cabinet, would not yield to the rushing torrent of militant clamor until events should compel them.

It begins to look as if the President's patience might be rewarded.

The dove has found at least a twig on which to rest.

THE CONGRESS.

IT WAS a gripping and stimulating affair they had in Indianapolis last week. The Congress of the Disciples of Christ, with a program of intensely interesting and vital subjects treated by thoughtful and earnest leaders and freely discussed from the floor, met in its fifteenth annual session.

Every man and woman present felt the history-making influence of the gathering. There were differences of opinion and there was frank, clean-cut expression. But the voice of the reactionary and legalist was almost unheard. Those who were in attendance at the Congress for the first time marveled at the freedom of speech which characterized it and some were amazed at the self-revelations of many leaders.

The Congress is a confirmer of one's optimism and faith in the Disciples of Christ. Our thinking has not settled down to fixed forms. We possess the power to think fresh thoughts of our own and for our own times. We are wearied of the questions of the scribes, and we have ample courage and wit to grapple with the questions of life and death.

The question of "delegate conventions" was debated as a question of Christian efficiency, not as a question of divine revelation.

Even the question of rebaptizing unimmersed Christians who ask admittance to our fellowship (wherever is there a group of Disciples nowadays in which that question is not discussed?) was discussed in this form: Will their admittance help or hinder the cause of Christ? It was taken not as a problem to be solved by scriptural law, but by the application of the spirit of Christ.

Many a minister and churchman went home resolved henceforth to utter with greater frankness the convictions that have grown up in his soul.

HONOR THY FATHER.

THIS is nearly a forgotten commandment. People are honoring their mothers, but are giving little recognition to the claims of fatherhood. A while ago we had written an editorial calling especial attention to this matter, but withheld it because Senator J. Hamilton Lewis made his rather spectacular proposal to establish a "Fathers' Day," and we preferred not to make our suggestion as a tail to his kite. But Senator Lewis' suggestion enabled us to taste out the matter, and to show how little a sentiment could be rallied in favor of the recognition of fathers. We have Children's Day and Mothers' Day, but it will be a long time before a proposal to establish Fathers' Day meets other response than mirth. We do not propose such a day. But we do propose more honor to fathers.

We do not mean forefathers, nor grandfathers. We mean fathers who work for a living and come home tired. We mean the men who serve on juries and who carry the hod and who work in offices and who bear the heavy burdens which modern society has laid on men. We mean the men who are being killed off with surprising and alarming rapidity between forty-five and fifty-five, so that the average community has a large number of middle-aged widows and practically no widowers of the same age. We mean the men of whom the comedians sing, "Everybody works but father."

OURSELVES AND CHRISTENDOM.

"WE DISCIPLES belong to Christendom," insisted Rev. B. A. Abbott, of St. Louis, in speaking on Christian unity at the Congress last week. This is a point of view we must studiedly take. We must learn to speak for Christendom, to feel that Christendom is voicing itself through us, and thus to cultivate in ourselves the catholic mind.

Such an utterance is luminous. It suggests humility of heart. It inhibits all bumptious speech.

And the converse of the statement is equally true and equally luminous:

Christendom belongs to us!

Shailer Mathews, a Baptist, was introduced to the Congress as "one of us." He is one of us. His church is ours, it belongs to us. Alexander Campbell is not more "of us" than John Wesley or Washington Gladden. Everyone who belongs to Christ belongs to us. The Disciples in abandoning the sectarian order have done so in the interest of a wider fellowship, a truly catholic fellowship.

Isn't it anomalous that we should be so much as able to raise in our minds the question whether or not we should admit into our fellowship those who already belong to us?

LOUIS R. PATMONT.

THE murder of Rev. Louis R. Patmont should be made the concern of every Disciple of Christ. His disappearance from Westville, Ill., a mining community suburban to the city of Danville, while at work among foreigners has been generally discussed by the daily press. The search for any clue of him proved fruitless until Tuesday of last week, when, at the suggestion of his brother, Oscar Patmont, a body which had been interred in Cleveland, O., on April 6 was exhumed and positively identified as the missing minister.

The body had been found on the Lake Shore tracks near West Park, Cleveland, and, though murder was strongly suspected by the coroner, was buried without identification. How the body came to be there is not yet known. The most natural hypothesis is that Mr. Patmont was murdered in Illinois and his body put in an empty freight car and carried to Ohio.

Who murdered him?

That question ought not to be allowed to rest until the last resource for finding an answer has been exhausted.

He was a faithful minister of Christ. His brethren in Christ's fellowship should furnish the funds to trace the crime back to the hand of the incarnate demon who committed it.

The Christian Standard, Cincinnati, of whose staff Mr. Patmont was a member, is receiving money with which to prosecute the search for the truth as to his manner of death. We recommend that all our readers participate in the collection that paper is taking.

THEORY AND FACT.

AT ONE of the sessions of the Congress of Disciples held in Indianapolis last week it was necessary to delay the program until the arrival of the train bringing Prof. Shailer Mathews to the city. Several impromptu speeches were made and some business transacted and still Doctor Mathews did not appear. The chairman asked the Congress what it wished to do to fill in the time.

Responding, Rev. Austin Hunter, of Chicago, suggested a theme which he would like to have discussed. It was objected that there would not be time to take up such a topic, as Doctor Mathews was expected at any minute. To which Mr. Hunter replied that it was impossible for the lecturer to arrive in less than forty minutes. "It is now 3:20," he said. "There is no train upon which he can possibly get to the city except the one due at the union station at 3:30. This train does not stop at Irvington, hence a trip from the union depot must be made which will take fully a half hour," etc., etc.

But to the convulsion of the audience, while Mr. Hunter was urging his argument with great detail and decision Doctor Mathews suddenly appeared walking down the aisle. Amid the roar of laughter Mr. Hunter sat down with a wave of the hand in token of unconditional surrender.

All of which was taken by the Congress as a parable.

NATIONAL HONOR.

A NATION like the United States should be jealous of its honor. The flag is dear to us, and any approach to an insult to that symbol of our national life we resent. But we need to face facts. A semi-civilized country, like Mexico, can not seriously affront a nation like the United States. It is a small, dirty-faced boy on the street making grimaces at a passing citizen. Whether that citizen will take offense at the small boy will depend upon how big a man he is. There is something pathetic about the wave of passion and war fever that has swept over the country because of the irritating and insulting conduct of a half-breed Indian in the city of Mexico.

The rush to war over such an incident might seem like a high tribute to the flag and a fine sensitiveness to national honor. But there are vastly larger interests involved than at first appear. It would be possible for us to lose alike the respect of the more serious-minded world and our own self-respect by plunging into an unnecessary series of hostilities with a small and half-educated neighbor. Our task in the light of Christian civilization is one of calmness, poise and self-restraint. It is a cheap and easy method of gratifying a superficial passion for a nation to resort to arms. It is a nobler sign of patriotism and Christianity for it to deal with a neighbor like Mexico in the spirit of toleration and correction. We can easily defeat Mexico, but at the same time we might be defeating our highest interests and tarnishing our Christian name.

It is conditions like these that restrain our President from acting impulsively upon the clamor of those who would plunge these two nations into war. He is holding to a new point of view, a point of view which has been worked out in very modern times and which everybody freely approves in time of peace but which every nation straightway abandons at the first hint of insult to its flag.

From this new point of view it is becoming clear that nobody can dishonor our flag but ourselves.

"NO MORE LIQUOR ADVERTISING."

THE Chicago Record Herald carried this three-column announcement on its front page in a recent issue:

No More Liquor Advertising.

"The Record-Herald has decided to eliminate liquor advertising from its columns. It will fulfill its existiig contracts to print this class of advertising and having done that it will accept no more.

"In making this announcement The Record-Herald desires to be rightly understood. The manufacture and sale of liquor are sanctioned by law and the advertising is legitimate advertising. However, printing this class of advertising involves social questions that call for emphasis and increased consideration.

"The Record-Herald goes into many thousands of homes. In virtually all of these homes there is an abiding sense of the need of protection against the abuses of the liquor traffic especially for the young. In a constantly-increasing degree there is abstention from the use of liquor for the sake of the young. There is the haunting fear that from the first indulgence the young and unformed character may unconsciously drift into an uncontrolled and destructive habit of excess.

"Liquor advertising does not discriminate between use and abuse. It commends without reserve what the best social sense of the day more and more disapproves as dangerous.

"The Record-Herald does not deny the view that pure alcoholic liquors have their wise and proper use in individual instances, but contends that the responsibility for the advocacy of such use should rest with the family physician rather than the family newspaper, and declines henceforth to share this responsibility."

Just now is a good time for the publication of such an announcement. Other papers will be added to the lengthening list of those who take this honorable stand. We congratulate the Record-Herald and all papers of like principle.

THE EXCEPTION.

THE railways of America carry passengers 49,712,502 miles safely for every one killed; 2,466,236 for every one injured, but the papers say nothing of the 50,000,000 safe arrivals, but make much of the one fatality. If a minister preaches the gospel today faithfully, and the members of the church listen patiently, there will be little in the morning's paper. But if he says some foolish thing, or if at the close some member of the congregation thinks he has done so and tells a reporter the whole nation will know it Monday morning. Do not be too profoundly impressed with the exception. The vast majority of ministers and churches are doing their duty quietly and well.

HELP TO ENTER THE POOL.

IT WAS a pathetic reason which the impotent man at Bethesda gave for his long lingering in one of the five porches. He had no man to put him into the pool. It was not a wholly good reason. There was something to be said on the other side. The people of Jerusalem had troubles of their own and there were few men who could afford to spend their whole time at the pool waiting for the troubling of the water and the opportunity to help a sick man in. They had a living to earn. Moreover, there was probably no general agreement among Jerusalem physicians that the waters had any medicinal value, and of those who thought the analysis indicated some virtue there were doubtless those who thought it as great at one time as another. The story about the angel was a mere superstition; no one had ever seen any such angel, and the evidence was quite insufficient to justify bringing to town of a great number of diseased mendicants. Moreover, if the man really wanted to be healed, he could have shown a little more interest in the matter. He had been there so long, had grown so to enjoy the poor health, had so made his misfortune his stock in trade, had grown so fond of telling in detail about the times when he almost got there, that it would have been a pity to deprive him of so much satisfaction as he got out of his infirmity.

Nevertheless, it was a pity that he was able to say, with any appearance of truth, that he had been ready to be healed if he had been able to secure help. Some one, surely, could have given him, just once, the little help he needed. It was far less than the help he must have required in his infirmity. And the years had fled swiftly. Thirty-eight years! A terrible time to wait; and all the time no man with time to help just once at just the right moment.

There are men who have waited as long as that for an invitation to confess Christ. There are men beside the pool who ought not to be there, but who ought to rise and take up their burden and walk off with it.

There are men who would become Christians if some of their own personal friends who are not professionally religious, who are not paid for it as ministers are, would ask them.

The present is a time of quiet religious interest. Many men are approachable and ready for an invitation to confess Christ and unite with the church. It is doubtless their own fault that they have not done so hitherto, and that they do not now do so. Neverheless, they will wait beside the pool unhealed unless some man helps them to enter.

The Larger Christian World

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Churchill Predicts Spiritual Awakening.

Winston Churchill, the author of "The Inside of the Cup," recently made the following statement in New York City: "No man and no society and no nation can do without religion. We cannot live by bread alone but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Because we are realizing this fact, we are at the dawn of a new spiritual age. It is as though we had to be exiled from God in order to feel the need of him. Certain it is that a longing for him has sprung up in this nation, and that longing is growing stronger every day. It needs to be defined, it needs to be guided and interpreted, but it is here."

Methodists Elect Sunday-school Head.

The Book Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church has elected as editor of Sunday School publications, to fill the office made vacant by the death of Dr. John T. McFarland in December last, Rev. Henry H. Meyer, A. M., D. D., of New York City. The position carries with it the responsibility of providing training for more than 4,000,000 boys and girls, young men and young women, in the Sunday Schools of the Methodist Church. Dr. Meyer comes to his office well equipped, having served for the past twelve years as assistant editor of Sunday School publications in the office in which he is now elected chief.

Dean Mathews Visits East.

Dean Shailer Mathews of the University of Chicago spent a week in Bridgeport, Connecticut, recently, giving a series of lectures on "Christian Fundamentals" under the auspices of the Pastors' Association. The leading paper of the city published them in full. The audiences were invariably large. The subjects were: "How Our Theology Was Made," "The Christian Doctrine of God," "The Loss and Recovery of the Christ," "The Doctrine of the Atonement" and "The Christian Doctrine of Salvation."

William Allen White, Christian.

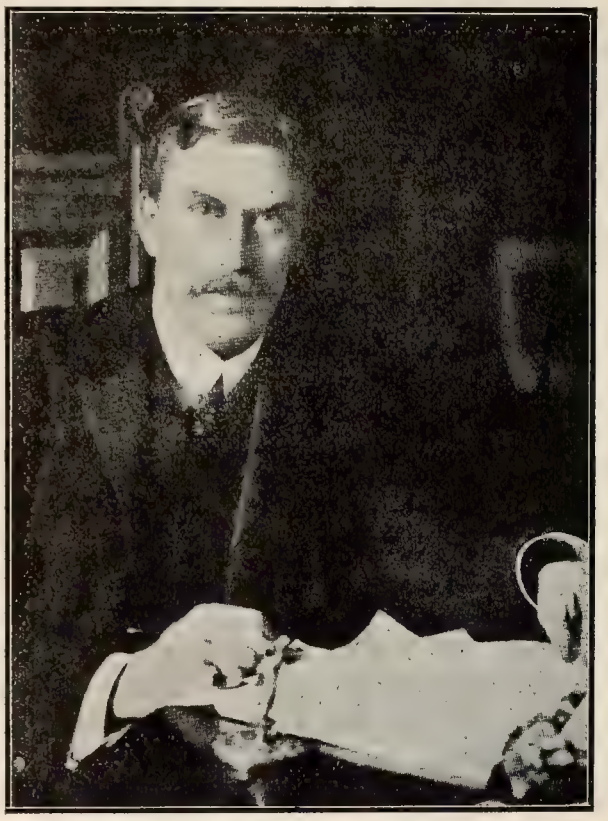
At the request of a member of a layman's gospel team of Wichita, Kan., which held a meeting recently at Emporia, Kan., William Allen White, editor and author, told the audience what the Christian life had done for him. His act was prompted by an appeal of Henry J. Allen, editor of the Wichita Beacon.

Y. M. C. A. Has New Magazine.

The Young Men's Christian Association has often been criticized because it has not given justice to the organized work of the church. To those who have felt that such criticisms have been well-founded, the following news note will be of interest: The North American Student is the name of a new magazine representing all of the Student Christian Associations of the United States and Canada. It has John R. Mott as chairman, Charles D. Hurrey, vice-chairman, Robert E. Speer, treasurer, and Charles W. Bishop, secretary. The editor is George Irving, 600 Lexington avenue, New York City. "Through its pages," says the editor, "we expect to be able to focus attention on special work that needs to be done, to sound out a clear call on subjects that should be emphasized, and provide a forum where all that concerns the highest life of our educational institutions can be discussed and promoted. We are extremely anxious to have as our readers and advisors the leaders in the organized work of the Church." Among the early contributors will be Bishop Rhinelander, Bishop Lloyd, "Ralph Connor," and other prominent persons.

Religious Work at University of Chicago

Mr. Sherwood Eddy, General Secretary for Asia of the Student Young Men's Christian Association, recently conducted a series of evangelistic services in Mandel Hall at the University. Very large



Rev. C. Silvester Horne, M. P., of London, who came to America to deliver the Lyman Beecher Lectures at Harvard last week and whose sudden death at Toronto last Sunday will shock the English Protestant world. Mr. Horne delivered one of the addresses at the Anglo-American Conference on Christian Unity under the auspices of British Disciples of Christ in 1910.

audiences listened night after night to his earnest appeals for manliness and Christian living. Conferences were held with different groups of students and in the fraternity houses. Nearly two hundred young men indicated their determination to become Christians. The effect of Mr. Eddy's work at the university was in a high degree wholesome and inspiring. As one of the indirect results of his work the students have enlisted in a campaign to support Mr. Galen Fisher, the efficient Y. M. C. A. Secretary at Tokio. Probably no man representing the missionary force in Japan is better known or more valued than Mr. Fisher. About two thousand dollars have been raised among the students of the university of Chicago for his support. There are many graduates of the university, and especially the Divinity School, in mission work in the Orient, but this enterprise in behalf of the Tokio Christian Association provides the undergraduate body with an opportunity for direct missionary work.

American Church for London.

A project to build in London a Union American Church with a seating capacity of 3,000, and also meeting-rooms, lecture-rooms, church parlor, and library, is on foot. It is stated that there are over 40,000 Americans in London. If the church is built, it will be similar to those in other European capitals and will be used not only for a church but as a social center for both resident and visiting Americans.

Still Another Church.

Still another religious cult has come into being, the Church of the Social Revolution, with Bouck White, author of "The Call of the Carpenter" and "The Carpenter and the Rich Man," for leader. The church was organized at a meeting held in the New York home of Bolton Hall on Apr. 6, 1914, with Martha Bruere acting as chairman. Its purpose, according to a recent announcement, is to found a body "that shall sing the new rebellion and declare that God and the labor movement are natural mates," and the hope underlying the movement is that it "will do away with the divorce between religion and economics, whereby each languishes—soul without a body and body without a soul." "A socialism of the heart" is thus to be started. For the present the church meetings are held in Berkeley Theater, New York City.

Lyman Abbott on Prayer.

A contemporary remarks that even the folks who think they don't like Dr. Lyman Abbott's theology must acknowledge from time to time their debt to him for a fine phrase that illuminates like a sunburst the ideals of the most orthodox religion. Such was his saying a few years ago: "People nowadays do not believe really in the fatherhood of God but in the grandfatherhood of God; they believe in God loving but not in God requiring obedience." And just lately he has added this new gem: "Prayer is not an order on God for a gift deserved, but fellowship with God because he himself is desired."

Endeavor Paper "Greets" N. R. Best.

Each week the Christian Endeavor Worlds prints the picture of some prominent leader in Christian work whose birthday happens to fall within the week, and presents him with a "Birthday Greeting." One of the latest is a greeting to Nolan Rice Best, editor of The Continent. The message is as follows: "Among the many editors who are helpful friends of the Christian Endeavor Society, we Endeavorers, Mr. Best, give you a place second to none. We rejoice in your steady progress. as proof-reader in a publishing house, as editor of a county newspaper, as editor of The Interior, and now as editor of The Continent, that splendid Presbyterian weekly which represents all that is best in religious journalism. We delight in your wise and sturdy books, and in the strong, thoughtful editorials which you write. We are proud of your contributions to denominational life, especially of your work on the Presbyterian 'Book of Common Worship.'

We glory in your temperance activities as national committeeman of the Anti-Saloon League. We are glad of your warm and constant interest in Christian Endeavor and your powerful advocacy of our work. Those of us who know you personally are inspired by your earnestness and sweetened by your modesty and friendliness. Well named, your search is always for the best, and great is the multitude of those whom you are helping toward the same high goal."

"Lumberjack Sky Pilot" Operated Upon.

Rev. Frank E. Higgins, famous as the "lumberjack sky pilot," an evangelist of the Presbyterian Church, underwent a serious operation for sarcoma in the Mayo hospital at Rochester, Minn., April 16. The growth was taken from Mr. Higgins' shoulder, and a portion of the collar bone cut away. The surgeons believe that a recurrence of the difficulty can be prevented by the treatment which Mr. Higgins is still receiving Evan Roberts Predicts Lord's Coming.

Evan Roberts, who led the great Welsh revival a few years ago, has sent to thousands of people a typewritten letter announcing that the Lord will return within the next ten years. It is believed that this young awakener is temporarily suffering from an unbalanced mind.

St. Louis Churches Report Decisions.

Reports from the St. Louis Lenten campaign for decisions for Christ are exceedingly encouraging. The Methodists, it is reported, made a whirlwind campaign of it, and reaped a harvest of 4,000 new members. The Presbyterians report 1,000 gained by the effort.

World's Christian Youth to Meet.

At the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco in June or July, 1915, a world's congress of young people's societies will be held, embracing Christian Endeavor, the Epworth League, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, the Baptist Young People's Union, the King's Daughters and others. Representatives are expected from all countries in the world. The meetings, which will last ten days, will discuss methods of work.

Henry Wallace Lauds Church College.

Henry Wallace, editor of "Wallace's Farmer," Des Moines, contributes an article to the United Presbyterian, which he introduces with the following statement: "In my last paper I raised the question of where the church will find educated Christian laymen fitted to take the place of the preacher, where absent, or competent to hold up his hands where he is present, as Aaron and Hur held up the hands of Moses. I know of no place except the Christian college, such for example, as the five colleges sustained by the United Presbyterian Church and similar colleges of other denominations."

The "Yale School of Religion."

Henceforth the official name of what was the Yale Divinity School is to be the Yale School of Religion. This change of name is significant of the changes in curricula, organization, etc., that are now taking place. The new school is to be all the name indicates, a truly great and comprehensive affair.

Peace Sunday, May 17.

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, through its Commission on Peace and Arbitration, invites the churches to observe Sunday, May 17, for the question of international peace and arbitration, this being the anniversary of the first Hague Conference.

Presbyterian Church Canvass Success.

The Presbyterian Church committee charged with promoting the every-member canvass is "making hay." A booklet containing the story of ninety-four churches' experience tells of increases of contributions "four-fold," "70 per cent" deficits once common wiped out, and so on.

Methodists Care for Old Ministers.

At the recent meeting of the Book Committee of the Methodist Church, in New York, it was voted to declare for 1914 a dividend of $300,000 to the retired or superannuated ministers.

No Campaigning for Moderatorship.

The Presbyterians seem to have profited by the criticism of the rather disgraceful campaigning on the part of certain church leaders for the moderatorship, which was witnessed at Atlanta last year. The election of Dr. John Timothy Stone, of Chicago, as moderator, it will be remembered, came as a rebuke to this method of election, and there seems to have come into general assembly business a new era, which is highly gratifying to all.

TEN REASONS FOR GOING TO CHURCH.

Rev. H. S. Bradley, D. D., in Congregationalist.

1. We like to please our friends. You have not a worthy friend who would not be pleased to have you go to church.

2. The Sermon may help you. Daniel Webster said, "It is a mighty poor sermon that doesn't hit me somewhere."

3. It helps us keep in touch with the Eternal Verities. There is danger that God, our lost loved ones and the future world will be crowded out of our thoughts.

4. It helps to keep our ideals fresh and high and stimulates us to live up to them.

5. It encourages an institution that stands for the best things, and that cannot live without friends and supporters.

6. It helps us to see things in their right proportions. We need the comprehensive view which takes in not only dirt and dollars, but also Character and Eternity.

7. The reflex action of worship is as inevitable as it is ennobling. One cannot help but grow like that which he reverences, loves and adores.

8. Its Service appeals to the best sides of our natures: the music to the Aesthetic, our friends to the Social, the Sermon to the Intellectual, the worship to our oldest and deepest Instincts.

9. The thought and speech on high themes, the noble hymns and dignified music are needed to offset the slang, profanity and ragtime with which we are daily assaulted.

10. George F. Hoar says, "There is no more commanding public duty than attendance at church on Sunday. It would be impossible to maintain liberty or self-government if our churches were closed, and public worship of God is to be maintained only by attendance upon it."

Methodists Consider Ministers' Salaries.

The Laymen's Association of the New England Methodist Conference has voted that the minimum salary of a married minister in the country should be $850 and in the city $1,000. They propose to group the churches, so that the stronger churches shall help the weaker raise at least these sums as salaries.

Sunday-school Boosting Reaches Limit.

The limit of Sunday-school boosting has been reached in a certain Oklahoma school. Here's the "scheme." The following information regarding conditions for the prize-drawing was handed to the scholars: "You better jump on the automobile and come to Sunday-school, where you will receive a big stick of chewing gum and a card on the back of which you will find full directions, as follows: Chew the gum. Then mold it with your fingers into a serpent and adder (Prov. 23:31-32) or anything you think of which symbolizes the dire effects of intoxicating liquor, or make something which represents what happens to men and boys who drink, such as a policeman's club, jail, etc. Stick your model on the opposite side of the card and bring it back next Sunday, March 8. Prizes will be given for the two best models." It is interesting to know that the first prize was awarded to a little girl who chewed her gum into "a coffin with a snake in it!" Verily the church and Sunday-school are learning the tricks of advertising. And, in the meantime, the advertising associations are undertaking religious poster campaigns! It will soon be necessary to adjust our glasses to ascertain which is which!

Wilson Indorsed by Catholic Club.

At a largely attended meeting of the Catholic Club of New York, at which Cardinal Farley was present, a message of indorsement for President Wilson was drafted and telegraphed to the president. "We send you a testimonial of good will as the chief magistrate of our country," it read, "and extend our pledge in the present national crisis to stand behind you and support you and pray for your success and health to bear the heavy burden placed upon you in the effort to maintain our Constitution."

Washington's "Go-to-Church" Campaign.

The churches of Washington, D. C., set April 5 as "Go-to-Church" Sunday. It is estimated that 10,000 more persons attended service than have ever done so before in this city on any one day. Every church, Protestant, Jewish and Catholic, was well filled at every service. The date was advertised in the street cars, by placards and through the newspapers, as well as having been announced from the pulpits. The President attended service in the morning at the Central Presbyterian church (Southern).

Presbyterians Make New York Count.

A census was taken on March 29 of the church attendance in the Presbyterian churches of New York City. The Presbyterian membership in New York is 26,000 and 19,248 persons were present at both morning and evening services on the Sunday named. This represents a decline in ten years from an attendance equalling eighty-nine per cent of the membership to an attendance equal to seventy-four per cent of the membership. During the same period the membership has increased 2,100, or nine per cent. On the above mentioned Sunday Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst preached in Madison Square Church to 319 persons. At the famous Brick Church in Fifth Avenue 416 persons were present. There were four really large congregations, namely, the Fifth Avenue Church with nearly 4,000, the West End, situated west of Central Park, with nearly 2,000; the Madison Avenue Church, east of the Park, with 1,400, and the North Church on Washington Heights with 1,000. Only 855 children were present at the morning service, compared to 2,029 ten years ago.

Of Human Interest

He Fought Mexico Under Taylor.

Chicago has long had a "Mexican Veteran Club," but now there are but two surviving members, Francis Benton and Sampson Wilder Wood. It was almost seventy years ago that they rushed to the front with the first American troops to enter Mexico, but their memories are vivid of the experiences of those days. Mr. Benton, in a recent interview with a Chicago newspaper man, had this to say of General Zachary Taylor, the hero of the war:

"All the men loved General Taylor. He never made any show or parade, hated to wear his uniform and was very democratic. He seldom wore a uniform in the field to indicate his rank. The only time I can remember when General Taylor wore his uniform was when he expected a visit from one of the officers of the naval squadron. General Taylor knew that the naval officers always were punctilious about appearing in full regalia, so, out of courtesy to his guest, he put on his uniform.

"But the naval officer, knowing General Taylor's aversion to a uniform, thought he would pay the General marked respect by appearing in civilian clothes. When they met they were both very much surprised and embarrassed.

"At one time I carried a dispatch to General Taylor, and he made me sit down and asked me how I liked the service, and told me I would not be in Mexico long. He always had a pleasant word for everybody. The first time I ever saw him a lot of us boys were looking at his horses. He had two, a large black one and a white one, and the white one was a little bit the favorite. He came out to us and spoke to us and invited us up to camp to sit on the long bench outside his tent and talk to him. He always liked to talk to us boys when there was no business on hand, and he was always informal and no great hand for ceremony. He was absolutely fearless. I think I have never known anyone more daring. He rode his white horse at Buena Vista in front of everybody and was a fine mark for the Mexicans.

"The white horse was wounded once and in the hospital, but he, the General, was fortunate enough to bring his favorite horse back to the United States at the end of the war. General Taylor usually sat with both of his feet on one side of the horse, in a very slouchy way and quite unlike General Scott, who always sat his horse with great dignity. He was a great man and we all worshiped him."

The President's Privilege.

President Wilson has had his nails manicured by a profession manicure just once in his life, states the Saturday Evening Post. That once was after he was elected President and before he was inaugurated.

He had some time in New York, and decided to use it in a visit to a manicure. A fluffy blond person officiated with the orange stick and pumice.

She took the hand of the future President, began operations and began conversation at the same time.

"Where do you live?" she asked archly.

"In Princeton, New Jersey," Mr. Wilson replied.

"Oh," she said ecstatically, "what a privilege! Have you ever seen the house in which Mr. Cleveland lived?"

What the President Could Not "Boss."

The Agricultural Department sent one of its expert gardeners to the White House to care for the rose-bushes. While he was busy trimming them, says an exchange, a man in a slouch hat, with a short coat buttoned close up to his neck, approached the gardener and offered some suggestions.

"You are cutting those bushes too closely. There'll not be any flowers on them this year," said the stranger.

"That so?" asked the workman, as he continued snipping off the twigs. "Well, I have been trimming rose-bushes for thirty years; and, if you knew as much about this job as I do, you might be doing it yourself."

The other man turned on his heel and walked into the White House, where he entered the President's private room, sat down at the President's desk, and went to work at his own job.

What Kind of a Man is Villa?

"Our women and children have as good a right to fine things as the women and children of the United States have; and it's the fault of the Mexican men that they haven't got them." So Pancho Villa once replied to an American who asked him why he was on the warpath, reports the Cleveland Press. "In other words, his insurgency rests upon precisely the same basis of motive as the politer progressive movement in the United States, differing only in circumstances. The rebel chief expresses a feeling which is the chief mainspring of human progress. . . . Don't let the shock of Villa's crudities and much-exaggerated cruelties close your mind to the possibility—nay, we believe, the certainty—that underneath them is a human soul flaming with righteous wrath at acute injustice. A Mexican man out to do, as best he may, a man's job in behalf of the weak, the poor, the wronged."

The World is Growing Better

Campaign for Dry Chicago.

On Monday, April 13, 1914, at 2 o'clock, there was assembled in the Red Room at the LaSalle Hotel, Chicago, about 350 delegates representing church and civic reform organizations.

The convention was called to order by Arthur Burrage Farwell as temporary chairman. F. Scott McBride, state superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Illinois, was elected permanent chairman.

THE CONVENTION CALL.

The call for this convention read as follows and was signed by the following organizations:

"To All Representative Chicago Friends of Temperance: There is hereby called a delegate convention to meet at 2 o'clock p. m., Monday, April 13, 1914, in the Red Room of the Hotel LaSalle, for the purpose of effecting a permanent organization for the impending campaign against Chicago's 7,000 saloons.

"Anti-Saloon League of Illinois, Baptist Ministers' Conference, Brotherhood Presbyterian Church in U. S. A., Church Federation Council, Chicago Law and Order League, Chicago Tract Society, Chicago Boys' Club, Chicago Foundlings' Home, Chicago Tract Society, Chicago District Epworth League, Catholic Total Abstinence Union, Cook County Sunday School Association, Chicago Christian Endeavor Union, Chicago Deaconess' Home, Chicago Industrial Home for Children, Chicago Training School, Congregational Ministers' Union, Christian Ministerial Association, Chicago Methodist Preachers' Meeting, Englewood Law and Order League, Epworth Leagues Methodist Episcopal Church, Frederick Douglass Centre, Hyde Park Protective Association, Anti-Cigarette League, Illinois Woman's Home Mission Union, Illinois Total Abstinence League, Illinois Christian Endeavor Union, Northwestern Branch Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, M. E. Church; Order of Good Templars, Prohibition Central Committee of Cook County, Presbyterian Ministerial Association, Sarah Hackett Stevenson Memorial Lodging House, Salvation Army, The Gideons, The United Presbyterian Association, Volunteers of America, Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Woman's American Baptist Home Missionary Society, Woman's Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, Woman's Baptist Mission Union, Young People's Civic League, Young Women's Christian Association."

A CAMPAIGN COMMITTEE.

It was decided to organize a Chicago Local Option Campaign Committee, which is to be constituted as follows:

Delegates from organizations which pledge their support to an active campaign to expel the saloon from the city of Chicago. Basis of representation shall be as follows: Five delegates from the Young People's Civic League; five delegates from each religious denomination; three delegates from each clergymen's association; three delegates from the Cook County Sunday School Association; three delegates from each young people's organization of the several religious denominations; five delegates from the W. C. T. U.; five delegates from the Prohibition party; three delegates from the Good Templars; five delegates from the Anti-Saloon League; five delegates from the Catholic Total Abstinence Association; other organizations two delegates each. The local committee shall have the power to add ten or more individuals to its number. In addition a list of about fifty persons was added to the committee.

The details of the campaign, including the time of holding the election according to the action of the convention, were left to the above campaign committee.

The convention was probably the largest and most representative ever assembled to consider the problem of driving the saloons out of Chicago.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

Woman Suffrage Week, May 1-8

The Official Board of the National Woman Suffrage Association has recommended that the first week in May be observed as Woman Suffrage Week, and that on Saturday, May 2d, public meetings be held, and the question of votes for women be brought before the various communities in the most effective way possible. While it is a time for recounting the notable victories that have crowned the good cause, it is also a time for girding the loins for the great task that shall be before us. In accordance with this, the National Board recommends that the following resolutions be passed at all the meetings of their affiliated and auxiliary socities to be held on May 2, 1914:

"We, the citizens of _____ have assembled today to voice our demand that women as citizens of the United States be accorded the full right of such citizenship.

"We congratulate the four million women voters who have won their right to the ballot in ten States, and confidently expect to see five more States under the franchise banner after the November elections.

"We hereby declare that suffrage for women has become a national as well as a local issue, and we urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to enact federal legislation which will insure to women equal rights with men.

"We therefore ask the Congress of the United States to proceed without delay in the most feasible and practical manner to remove the barriers which prevent American women from the exercise of full franchise, and to make our country, not a government in which half the people are denied the right of participation, but in truth and reality a democracy."

I. J. SPENCER ON SUFFRAGE.

In the town in which this writer lives, the business men have been asked to decorate their buildings with suffrage colors, and on the last Sunday in April, all ministers were asked to preach sermons on woman suffrage. I. J. Spencer, pastor of the Central Christian Church, graciously granted this request and on Sunday morning spoke to a large audience on Christianity and Woman Suffrage."

He quoted the text: "In Christ there is neither male nor female," but said the sermon was built upon passages from both the Old and New Testament. He had been requested by the Equal Rights Association, he said, to preach on the subject and cheerfully availed himself of the opportunity of speaking his earnest convictions on a question which was a vital one at present.

He said that man's treatment of woman in the past, especially where the Christian religion had not prevailed, had not reflected credit upon him. The treatment women had received at the hands of Christ during His earthly ministry would always appeal to woman's gratitude. His courtesy and mercy to the woman of Samaria, to the outcast brought before Him in the temple at Jerusalem, and His forgivenness to the penitent creature in Simon's house were mentioned to show that "our Lord extended His favor to woman as well as to man."

"When the Pharisees confronted Him with the question as to whether or not a man might put away his wife for any trivial cause, He declared that there was only one real cause for divorce, namely, adultery. Both the Old and the New Testament teach that there is one and the same moral standard for women and men," said Dr. Spencer.

When Paul said he suffered not a woman to teach and that women must keep silence in the church, he was speaking of a local, racial temporary rule. It was particularly necessary for that time, and particularly among the Greeks, that women should go veiled and remain silent in the Christian assembly for the sake of decency and good order. It was a shame for a Greek woman to speak or sing, to unveil herself or teach in the church."

Among the Jews, he said, women were permitted to prophesy. Dr. Spencer gave Miriam, Deborah, Hannah and Huldah in the Old Testament and such women as Anna, Philip's daughters and Phoebe in the New Testament history, as illustrations.

WHY DENY THE RIGHT TO VOTE?

He was asked if the right to vote should be denied to women "on account of their ignorance, their inferior moral character, because they pay no taxes, conduct no business, are not engaged in industrial pursuits, have no responsibility in safeguarding and developing the home, are not patriotic and feel no concern for the education of their chuldren."

"Men and women go together to the marriage altar," said Dr. Spencer, "share together the cares and responsibilities of the home, and their children, talk together as partners in business, labor side by side in stores, factories, schools and universities, co-operate in the church, in public philanthropy and share together the joys and sorrows of life. Why should the ballot box put asunder those whom God hath joined in so many vital and responsible interests?"

"In Christ there is neither male nor female and why should there be sex distinction in our sacred democracy? We allow women to vote on the school question. Why not allow them to vote on the liquor question, the white slave question, the industrial questions? The great majority of teachers in the Bible schools today are women. We send them forth to heathen countries as missionaries, where they serve God as Christian heroines.

"In the light of all the dignity and privileges of womanhood in the kingdom of God it looks to me like cruel injustice, as well as unwarranted folly, to withhold from the women of the United States the privilege of the ballot, which we desire as patriots and as Christians to be reverenced and used for the welfare of our Nation."

WOMEN WIN ILLINOIS REFORMS.

Illinois women cast their debutante vote in huge numbers at the elections last month, and the State is still feeling the shock of a great moral force. Analysis of their vote shows the following facts:

In Chicago 162,961 women (police returns) went to the polls. In seven wards they decided the results of the aldermanic contest, in every case in a way gratifying to the Municipal Voters' League and disappointing to the corrupt element. More than three times as many women voted as in the primaries, and about 75 per cent of these registered (217,614) went to the pools. Their presence made an election peaceful that was expected to be turbulent.

Throughout Illinois the women's vote was largely responsible for the closing of 1,039 saloons. Twenty-two counties were voted dry, in addition to those that had been so before; 121 townships comprising 168 cities and villages changed from wet to dry; 53 remained dry, one dry township went wet and 74 wet townships remained wet. At least 33 women were chosen to offices.

AUTHOR LAUDS SUFFRAGE.

Winston Churchill contributes an article to the recent suffrage edition of the Manchester Union. He says, among other good things:

"Any doctrine which is in harmony with social evolution cannot fail of embodiment in a democratic government. Woman suffrage is part and parcel of the sociology and best economics now beginning to be taught in our universities. In California, where I have been staying, the women and the men are finding the situation a perfectly natural and wholesome one. They are grasping the fact that, under modern conditions, a government which is conducted by men's votes alone is one-sided.

"Woman suffrage does not mean, as some fear, the elimination of the home as the unit of our civilization. Experience is proving that there are no more vigorous defenders of the home than the majority of women voters in the States where the suffrage has been given them."

"ANTI-SUFFRAGE REASONS."

Alice Duer Miller edits a witty woman suffrage department in the New York Tribune. In a recent issue she gives the following:

OUR OWN TWELVE ANTI-SUFFRAGE REASONS.

1. Because no woman will leave her domestic duties to vote.
2. Because no woman who votes will attend to her domestic duties.
3. Because it will make dissension between husband and wife.
4. Because every wife will vote exactly as her husband does.
5. Because bad women will corrupt our politics.
6. Because bad politics will corrupt our women.
7. Because women have no power of organization.
8. Because women will form themselves into a woman's party.
9. Because men and women are so different that they must have different duties.
10. Because men and women are so much alike that men with one vote each can express themselves and us, too.
11. Because women cannot use force.
12. Because the militants can and do use force.

Disciples Table Talk

Summer Schools of Methods.

The Sunday-school Department of the American Christian Missionary Society is doing a vital service for the Brotherhood in its featuring of schools of methods for Sunday-school workers. Three schools have been arranged for the summer—at Lexington, Ky.; at Keuka Park, N. Y., and at Bethany Park, Ind. Full information regarding these schools may be obtained from the A. C. M. S., but the following are the chief facts concerning each: The Lexington school will be held June 11-19, with W. E. Frazee as dean; the one at Keuka Park, July 15-24, with J. A. Serena, as dean, and the Indiana school, August 4-14, with Garry L. Cook, dean. Last year among the Disciples of Christ only fourteen such schools were held coming up to the International Standard. They enrolled 1,576 students, representing 473 Bible-schools of whom 506 complied with the necessary requirements, and received the Certificate of Recognition. These numbers will be greatly increased this year.

The Canton, Mo., Ministerial Retreat.

Two years ago several ministers of northeast Missouri held a delightful retreat at Shelbina, as guests of the Shelbina church and B. H. Cleaver, their minister. Last year a larger number went to Canton and had a splendid retreat, using the new dormitory as their home and having free access to all the privileges of dormitory, gymnasium and swimming pool, with just enough program to make it interesting and a delight. This experience will be repeated this year at Canton, July 14-17. All comers will be entertained at the dormitory, which is equal to living at a first-class hotel. A part of each day will be given to a program, the central theme of the studies being, "The Social Message of Christ to Our Age." A nominal charge will be made to defray the cost of meals and this will be all the expense, except travel. The railroad fare will be pooled. The retreat is planned for the ministers of northeast Missouri. For details as to rates and other matters, write to Prof. H. B. Robison, Canton, Mo. Benjamin L. Smith, of Moberly, Mo., is president of the Retreat organization.

L. R. Patmont's Body Found.

The mystery of the disappearance of Louis R. Patmont, "dry" worker and foe of Catholicism, from Westville, Ill., March 31, was cleared last week at Cleveland, O. A nameless body that had lain in a grave in Rockport Cemetery for fifteen days was identified as the body of the missing man. Oscar Patmont, student at Phillips Bible Institute at Canton, O., made the identification to the satisfaction of Cleveland authorities when the body was exhumed. Absolute identification, according to the brother and friends, was assured by two peculiarities of the body—a tatooed anchor faintly showing on the right forearm, and a crippled finger on the right hand. The man from the grave had been found dead along the Lake Shore railroad tracks in West Park, April 6, and the cause of his death had remained a mystery. Attaches of the coroner's office, for lack of any other explanation, had assumed he was killed by a train. But there were several things which seemed to disprove this theory. Both legs and an arm of the body were broken and a hand was scarred. Two weeks ago, after the unidentified body had been taken from the county morgue and interred in Rockport Cemetery, H. E. Sala, Disciple evangelist, came from Canton to Cleveland. He had known Mr. Patmont. He looked at the official morgue photograph of the dead man and at the clothing. The face in the picture was scarred and the Canton minister was unable to identify it as the Westville evangelist. But he was not satisfied, and before going back to Canton took steps toward having the body exhumed. On April 28 Mr. Sala and Oscar Patmont came to Cleveland, and final identification was made. How the evangelist's body came to Cleveland can be answered only by conjecture, according to his brother.

[Later: Reports indicate that the body found in Cleveland, upon examination by Mr. Patmont's pastor, from Detroit, and others, appears not to be the body of Mr. Patmont.—Editor.]

Rev. George Darsie, whose church at Terre Haute will entertain the Indiana Convention.

"MEN AND MILLIONS" UNDER WAY.

The campaign to raise six million dollars for education, missions and benevolence and to enlist one thousand workers for American and foreign missions will be started at Gainesville, Tex., next Monday, May 11. Mr. Abram E. Cory and a "team" of fifteen associates will spend five weeks in that great state, visiting a hundred churches or more. They will ask for individual gifts of large sums of money, $500 being the minimum. The churches as churches will not be solicited. The Men and Millions movement will not only not interfere with regularly organized missionary and benevolent activities but will co-operate with such activities to awaken the churches and to institute the "every-member canvass" in all congregations. Next Sunday should and doubtless will be a great day of prayer in all our churches throughout the land. The launching of this Movement is not alone the most gigantic, but in many respects the most significant enterprise undertaken by the Disciples of Christ in modern times. The conscience of the whole church must be quickened to recognize its responsibility to make the atmosphere in which Mr. Cory and his colleagues may do the great work their brethren have committed to them. In a telegram to The Christian Century Mr. Cory especially requests the prayers of the churches and pastors.

Let such a wave of intercession arise next Lord's Day from all hearts in all parts of the land that this Movement may be bound, at its very launching, "with golden chain about the feet of God!"

Third, Philadelphia, Awaits New Pastor.

Last week was noted the fact that T. E. Winter, of Fulton, Mo., had been called to the work at the Third, Philadelphia. The following from Allen A. Moats, secretary of the Philadelphia Disciples' organization, indicates that great things are being expected of the new pastor: "For more than a year, the church has been dependent upon supplies, but the leaders in the church have kept things well in hand, and while there was an indebtedness a year ago of practically a thousand dollars, and the expenses incident to securing a pastor were greater than regular maintenance, not only has the debt been met, but with receipts of more than four thousand dollars, there is now a balance in the treasury of almost a thousand dollars, with money in the treasury of every church organization. No less than seventy-seven have been received into the church, forty-three by immersion, the Men's Bible-class furnishing twenty. Every condition is in readiness for a great stride forward with the coming of Mr. Winter."

Bethany Receives $20,000 Gift.

President T. E. Cramblett, of Bethany College, has announced a gift to the college by Miss Margaret Parkinson, of Washington, Pa., of a farm of 261 acres, valued at $20,000. The farm adjoins the college grounds on the north, and will be used for agriculture and horticulture, with a view of giving young men an opportunity of earning their way through college. It contains a beautiful forest of fifty acres.

Sixth District, Mo. Convention.

The annual convention of the Sixth District, Missouri, Disciples will be held at Centralia, Mo., May 11, 12. W. A. Shullenberger, of Mexico, is president. Among the convention speakers are: Alva W. Taylor, W. A. Shullenberger, B. H. Cleaver, J. P. Rowlison, Miss Muriel White, Mrs. Luella Moss, Prof. H. M. Garn, J. W. Dry, J. C. Frank, Earl M. Todd, Mrs. I. T. Hall, Mrs. J. L. Moore, Mrs. O. W. Lawrence, Miss Alice Doherty, Mrs. Walter Higbee, Mrs. Latshaw (State C. W. B. M. President,) W. F. Richardson, J. M. Harris, V. H. Whaley, W. D. Endres, J L. Garvin and C. M. Chilton.

Dr. Ainslie on Peace.

Baltimore preachers found themselves on both sides of the issue on the question of peace or war with Mexico. Of course, Dr. Peter Ainslie preached strongly against war. We quote from his recent sermon: "I do not believe that war between the United States and Mexico is justified. Whatever may have been the necessity of war between nations in the past, the test of modern civilization is the ability to adujust international differences without war. It is to our credit to resent any nation invading our country, but I question whether it is to our credit to invade another country with our army and navy so long as there is a court of arbitration before which our differences will be given a just hearing. I am not criticising the present administration. I am protesting against my country going to war with a neighboring and friendly republic. President Wilson set the highest standard in international affairs when he refused to recognize a murderer as the head of a nation. That standard is being demolished by going to war with that same nation because of the spiteful conduct of the head of that nation to our country."

Hyde Park, Chicago, Has New Plan.

Hyde Park Church, Chicago, now keeps a record of the church attendance of every member. This church is continually adding new members, ten having been added the last month. One of the latest accessions is Mr. W. T. Yu, who comes of a large and influential Chinese family of Canton. Mr. Yu is twenty years of age, and entered the University of Chicago this year, having been sent to this country by the Chinese government, being chosen by competitive examination to make a study of American life.

Drake in All-Day Rally.

April 24 was observed as Rally Day at Drake University. Disciples from all over the state were present. Theodore P. Shonts, of New York, member of the Board of Trustees, led in the campaign.

Central, Des Moines, is Host to Many.

Central, Des Moines, is winning a reputation for hospitality. Within a recent week this church enjoyed visits from the following leaders: Secretary S. J. Corey; President M. L. Bates, of Hiram; R. A. Long, of Kansas City; Secretary A. E. Cory and Prof. H. L. Willett.

Drake Completes Campaign for $200,000.

President Bell announces that as promised the campaign to raise $200,000 for Drake University closed May 1. The officers of the university find that the $200,000 sought was subscribed and in addition a sufficient amount was received to cover any shrinkage. In connection with the campaign to raise $200,000, about $30,000 in addition to that was realized for the endowment funds of the university. It is probable that the total subscriptions received during the campaign will reach $250,000, at least. The friends of the institution feel that they have accomplished a great victory, and wish to thank all those who made the success of the campaign possible. As a result of this campaign the university is promised in due time about $600,000 additional for its endowment.

Unique Meeting at Chillicothe, Mo.

Edward Priest, pastor at Chillicothe, Mo., planned a rather unusual series of meetings for late April. Beginning April 20, there were given at the church strong sermon-addresses on various phases of church efficiency, by ministers of northwest Missouri who have distinguished themselves in their respective lines. Following this was held an evangelistic campaign of a week. Speakers during the first week's meetings were A. M. Levack, of Brookfield, Mo.; J. W. Kilborn, of Cameron; R. G. Frank, of Liberty, and R. B. Helser, of Trenton. J. D. Arnold, of Manhattan, Kans., conducted the evangelistic services.

Youngstown Disciples' Union Meets.

The Disciples' Union, of Youngstown, O., and vicinity, met at the Hillman Street Church, April 28. W. W. Sniff, of First Church, New Castle, was the speaker of the occasion.

Eugene, Ore., School Seeks Quarter Million.

A New Church for Chicago.

Announcement of the beginning of a new church for Chicago comes from City Secretary O. F. Jordan, who says that the Chicago Christian Missionary Society will hold a preaching service in Edgewater at Hamilton Hall, 4737 Broadway, Sunday, May 17, at 4:00 p. m. Dr. H. L. Willett and others will speak. Members of the various city churches will attend. The hall is reached by "L" to Wilson ave., or Broadway and Lawrence surface cars.

Dean Charles R. Brown of Yale University School of Religion recently visited Transylvania College and preached on Sunday morning to a congregation that packed to overflowing the large auditorium of Mark Collis' Broadway Church in Lexington, Ky.

Seldom does a small book attain such momentum of popularity as E. E. Elliott's "Making Good in the Local Church," now being published in the third edition. It will be sold at our state conventions during the summer and fall.

NEWS FROM THE FOREIGN SOCIETY.

The National Missionary Council of India, which met at Calcutta, February 4-5 last, recommended that mission study circles be formed among the European and Anglo-Indian communities.

Dr. G. W. Brown, missionary of the Foreign Society, is a member of the Permanent Literature Committee of the National Missionary Council of India.

Dr. and Mrs. Macklin, of China, will visit the churches in Australia as the guests of the Brotherhood in that land in the near future. It will mean much for our splendid churches in the land of the Southern Cross, and will prove a change for Dr. and Mrs. Macklin of the greatest value. During the past few years Dr. Macklin has been under a great strain. We congratulate all concerned.

Mrs. James Ware has lived in Shanghai, China, for twenty-eight years. She has a girls' school of about fifty pupils, which is almost self-supporting. It pays the teacher's salary and running expenses, leaving only the rent to pay, which is about $6 per month. What China needs more than anything else is Christian wives and mothers. The Chinese teacher in this school is a girl that Mrs. Ware adopted some twelve years ago. She had lost both her feet from foot-binding. She graduated from our girls' college in Nankin, conducted by Miss Lyon, and spent two years in the Normal School, and is well prepared for the work. Withal, she is a devoted Christian woman.

The graduation exercises of our colleges and schools in Tokyo, Japan, were conducted March 24, 25 and 27. The kindergarten graduated twelve, the Boys' Middle School, twenty-four; the Girls' High School, four; and the Girls' Bible-school, one. The new school year began Friday, April 10, and a considerable increase in the enrollment was expected.

The Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C., George A. Miller, minister, will support Mrs. G. J. P. Barger in Africa, as their Living-link. Dr. Barger will go in the fall to take some special course in tropical diseases in London. He will begin work in Africa about the first of January.

The great exhibition in Ueno Park, in Tokyo, Japan, was opened in March. It celebrates the coming to the throne of the new emperor. Thousands of visitors at the exposition open a wonderful opportunity for evangelistic work.

The thirty-first annual convention of our churches was held in Takinogawa, Tokyo, Japan, recently. The special subjects under discussion were the three year evangelistic campaign and self-support. Our churches have determined to enlarge the work in every direction.

AMONG YALE DISCIPLES.

The Campbell Club of Yale gathered on the evening of April 23rd as guests of the president and Mrs. Archer. John R. Ewers, of East End Church, Pittsburgh, was the guest of honor. Secretary Abram E. Cory, of the Men and Millions Movement, and President Miner Lee Bates, of Hiram College, were also guests for a part of the evening. The club had been wishing for some time to have Secretary Cory come over to Yale, and when it was learned that he was to be in New York this week an invitation was at once sent to him to come on to New Haven for the evening of April 23rd. President Bates came almost unannounced, but found, nevertheless, a warm welcome, especially on the part of the host and hostess, who are graduates of Hiram.

Both Secretary Cory and President Bates had to leave New Haven by an early train. Before they went, however, it was the privilege of the club to hear some words from them. Mr. Bates would consent to do no more than give a brief word of greeting. Mr. Cory told of the great task he is leading, the most imposing bit of church enterprise that America has yet seen. He told in a frank and generous way how the Men and Millions Movement has assumed its present proportions by a process of development, many different individuals contributing to its growth by offerings of prayer and suggestion and money. Mr. Cory's visit and that of President Bates gave the club a further view of the wholesomely bigger things the Disciples are attempting and accomplishing in a missionary and educational way.

Mr. Ewers made an informal though vigorous and opportune speech. He is every inch alive, and talks and acts accordingly. In what he said he emphasized the need and sufficiency of religion for the present world. Of course, religion to him means the religion of Jesus Christ. It was good to hear him say so strongly that no vital and permanent religious work can be done by anyone who does not believe tremendously in the divinity of Christ. "Christ is divine in a way that I am not," he said. He told of the effectiveness of vital religion not only for churches, but for all sorts of institutions and governments. Such notes as he struck sound good in these days. For this time and the years ahead there is the clear need of stress on productive personal religion.

During the evening new officers were chosen to lead the club next year: Andrew Leitch, Butler, 1911, and Rodney McQuary, Cotner, 1912. The former was chosen president, the latter, secretary and treasurer. The club serves a useful purpose in the life of Yale Disciples, promoting loyalty to Yale and maintaining the Disciples fellowship and consciousness. Mr. Archer, the retiring president, expects to receive this June the B. D. and M. A. degrees (the latter under the new two-year requirements), and to continue his studies next year in Harvard in the department of History of Religions.

J. C. ARCHER,
President "Campbell Club."

Our Brotherhood Secretary, E. E. Elliott, will appear before the students at Texas Christian University, Phillips University and Drake University during May.

JAPANESE MISSIONARY TOURING COUNTRY.

Sidney L. Gulick, immigration expert, is visiting leading cities of the country under arrangements made by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, which includes thirty Protestant denominations, to represent the missionaries of Japan concerning American relationships with the Eastern races.

Sometime ago the American missionaries in Japan sent a petition to the Federal Council requesting the appointment of a commission to consider the whole question.

Dr. Gulick purposes to secure, if possible, a better understanding of the Oriental problem, and active measures for the promotion of the friendship of the East and the West.

For this he thinks a thorough consideration of the entire immigration problem is essential, and the adoption by Congress of a program quite different from that now before the country.

He recognizes that California's anti-Japan propaganda has its measure of truth and right, and yet he feels that many of their fears are based on misconceptions and insists that Japan's demands have also their measure of truth and right. In some way these must be harmonized. This, however, is not so difficult as first appears, for the swamping immigration from Asia can be prevented by a law providing for a percentage basis which would at the same time allow very large immigration from Europe.

Dr. Gulick has been a missionary in Japan for twenty-six years; has served on the faculty of Doshisha University, and has been a lecturer at the Imperial University of Kyoto. He is also the author of something like a dozen volumes, published in English and Japanese, the latest of which is just appearing, entitled "The American-Japanese the East and the West."

New York City and Its Needs

Report of Disciples' Missionary Union of Greater New York.

The magnitude of the city of New York can not be fully realized except as one is a continuous part of the city's life. The growth, the conditions, the opportunities, are appalling.

New York City since 1910 has added more than 600,000 people, this growth in itself making a city about the size of Cleveland.

A little thought regarding the following statistics will make evident the truth of these statements:

Population, about	5,365,000
Roman Catholic communicants, about	1,600,000
Protestant communicants, about	422,000
Hebrews in synagogues,	122,000
	2,144,000
Non-communicants, about	3,221,000
Churches—Roman Catholic, Protestant and Hebrew, about	1,500
Average seating capacity, about	1,000
Total seating capacity, about	1,500,000
Population, about	5,365,000
Churches are about half full Sunday a. m.	750,000
About one-quarter full Sunday, p. m.	375,000
About one-twentieth full at the mid-week services.	75,000
About half full at Sunday-school.	750,000
	1,950,000
Non-church attendants, about	3,415,000

Among the attendants at the Sunday evening, mid-week and Sunday-school services there are many repeaters; therefore, the attendance per week at the church services would not equal 1,950,000.

Boys and girls of school age in Greater New York in 1913.	1,316,072
Boys and girls of school age in S. S.	442,482
Balance not in Sunday-school.	873,590
In New York there are:
Dance halls, about.	549
Theaters, about.	246
Picture shows, about.	600
Saloons, about.	12,270
Making a total of.	13,665

places of amusement, saloons, etc., open daily against 1,500 churches open on an average of but three days per week.

With such a field and condition, the Disciples' Missionary Union of Greater New York is doing its very best under the great and helpful assistance of the American Christian Missionary Society.

Our churches and missions are putting forth every effort, and work heroically at their task.

The report of the five missions for March is as follows:

Days of service.	185
Sermons.	35
Baptisms.	5
Accessions by letter.	1
Bible-school enrollment.	827
Average attendance.	551
Money raised on the field by the missions.	$1,006.53

For all information regarding the mission work, the location of the missions, or any of our churches in the city, please address the writer,

Chairman of the Mission Committee.

Luke 17:1-10. Memory Verses, 3, 4.

Golden Text.—He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.—1 Cor. 1:31.

American Standard Bible.
Copyright, 1901, by Thomas Nelson & Sons.
(Used by permission.)

(1) And he said unto his disciples, It is impossible but that occasions of stumbling should come; but woe unto him, through whom they come! (2) It were well for him if a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were thrown into the sea, rather than that he should cause one of these little ones to stumble. (3) Take heed to yourselves: if thy brother sin, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him. (4) And if he sin against thee seven times in the day, and seven times turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him.

(5) And the apostles said unto the Lord, Increase our faith. (6) And the Lord said, If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye would say unto this sycamine tree, Be thou rooted up, and be thou planted in the sea; and it would obey you. (7) But who is there of you, having a servant plowing or keeping sheep, that will say unto him, when he is come in from the field, Come straightway and sit down to meat; (8) and will not rather say unto him, Make ready wherewith I may sup, and gird thyself, and serve me, till I have eaten and drunken; and afterward thou shalt eat and drink? (9) Doth he thank the servant because he did the things that were commanded? (10) Even so ye also, when ye shall have done all the things that are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants; we have done that which it was our duty to do.

Verse By Verse.

BY C. C. BUCKNER.

v. 1. Occasions of stumbling: The Greek word rendered occasion of stumbling is the name of an upright stick in a trap, which, when touched springs the trap. So long as sin is in the world there will be traps set for us. They were set for Jesus. He "was in all points tempted, like as we are." Woe unto him through whom they come: It is grievous when we fall into temptation, but the leading of others into temptation is the most grievous of sins.

v. 2. It is well for him, etc.: Physical suffering is not so sad as spiritual suffering. These words point to the supremacy of the soul. To injure one's body is not so wrong as to pollute one's soul.

v. 3. Take heed to yourselves: All the words of this verse are directed to the man who has been sinned against. Most of us are willing to rebuke him but too few are equally willing to forgive him.

v. 4. And if he sin against thee seven times in the day: Seven was the number of perfection. So there is no limit to the number of times we should forgive our brethren.

v. 5. Increase our faith: This strikes me as being rather amusing. Jesus has been touching the tender spots of their individual lives. They seek to dodge the pointed words with this formal and stereotyped petition

v. 6. If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed: Jesus is teaching that it is the quality of faith that counts. Sycamine tree: This was probably the mulberry tree. Be thou rooted up: This figure meant the accomplishment of any great difficulty.

v. 7. Having a servant: A slave. Come straightway and sit down to meat: "God is no respecter of persons;" if we would be like our Father we must not be. We must not look down upon men because they are not our equals in intellectual or financial acquisitions.

v. 9. We are unprofitable servants: For the reason that the master has only got what he has paid for.

At the Heart of the Lesson.

BY REV. A. Z. CONRAD, PH.D.

Evil and good are in constant collision. Unregenerate human nature is continuously victimized. Uneradicated selfishness is a perpetual protest against piety. Conceit is caustic. Humility is not a natural grace. In the name of learning how much of error is promulgated. Truth at its best has only a fighting chance in this world. "It is impossible but that occasions of stumbling should come," said Jesus. Of course, while the powers of evil are permitted accession to the heart's throne wrecks are inevitable. The very voice of God is challenged. Evidences are explained away. Beauty is an affront to ugliness. Virtue is irritating to vice. Commands arouse rebellion in the half-sufficient soul. The greatest peril to health is not conspicuous contagion but the invisible death germ. Not the cyclone but the gypsy moth imperils the orchard. The mightiness of the minute is the great lesson of modern science in biology. Frost ruins more harvests than thunder storms. In the Kingdom, the chief wreckers are not bold, blatant denunciators and detractors. The church is most wounded in the house of its friends. It was a professed disciple who betrayed his Lord. Hamlet's father was not destroyed by an avowed enemy, armed and armored and a challenger to mortal combat. It was the stealthily poured poison deposited in the ear of the victim. The deed was already done before the victim knew it.

THE WRECKERS.

Jesus saw the inevitableness of occasions for stumbling. He pitied the people who were being imperiled by false preachers. He knew the occasions of stumbling would come because he knew that darkness had nothing in common with light. He knew the natural heart is both assumptuous and self-deceived, because of a disposition to disobedience. The great occasions for stumbling remain much the same through the generations. They come from human arrogance, ignorance, pride and presumption. Jesus anticipated precisely the things that have happened since his kingdom was established in the earth. His words undoubtedly have reference to those who deny the realities of Revelation.

DEALING WITH OFFENDERS.

"If thy brother sin, rebuke him, and if he repent, forgive him." At first thought we would say, "There is no neglect of 'the rebuke.' Men are ready enough to censure those who depart from the path of rectitude. We do not need to overurge the activity in discovery and denunciation of sin." Is this true after all? Is there not a woeful neglect at this very point? How many of us listen to profanity without one word of protest. We are in association with those who deliberately desecrate the Lord's Day, but we express no word of sorrow. We witness foolishness and all kinds of meanness without so much as a look of reproach. We assume that these are personal matters and that it is none of our business. As surely as we are our brother's keeper so surely have we a responsibility in the matter of individual sin and sinning. Our duty must be exercised tactfully, kindly, lovingly, but it may not be neglected. What is demanded is a kindly protest together with a fervent appeal when any kind of sin is deliberately indulged in in our presence. There is a sufficient influence unexercised, latent and unemployed in the Church of Christ to correct any of the evils of our day.

FORGIVENESS.

"If he repent, forgive him." This particular scripture does not deal with injuries not repented of. The attitude of Jesus Christ in forgiving his enemies is an example for the disciple. The marvel of divine Grace is that Jesus died for unrepentent sinners. One of his last words on the cross was a plea for the pardon of his malicious, relentless and heartless enemies. We are dealing here, however, with those who are consciously wrong and seek to right it by true repentence. In it there is involved a further desire that amicable relations should be established and a willingness to make restitution so far as restitution can be made for the injury done. An appeal for forgiveness is spurious, useless and empty which does not confess the wrong and promise to use every means to right it. No restitution is possible unto God, because nothing we can do goes beyond the fulfilment of the obligation of the moment. In our relations with out fellow-men restitution is often possible. The forgiveness demanded means a restoration, if possible, of previous friendly relationships. It means the erasure of the debt which was created by the offense. Forgiveness is not merely the matter of dismissing an injury as unworthy of consideration. We can very easily lessen the apparent wickedness of vice and sin by our attitude toward it. What Jesus insists upon is an attitude of readiness to perform the act of forgiveness whenever that act is safe. Without repentance it is not safe. It is safe as an attitude, but not as an act. God's attitude is one of infinite tenderness and the great sacrifice through Jesus which makes forgiveness safe and possible is eternal. But the outward manifestation of this act of forgiveness and its direct expression to the human heart come as a result of confession and repentance. In the words of Jesus, "Until seventy times seven," we have declared the limitlessness of divine mercy and the importance of unchanging brotherliness in men. Good is greater than evil. Mercy reaches beyond the farthest limits of justice. "While sin abounded grace did much more abound." Love outdoes hate. Righteousness outreaches evil. We must therefore never permit ourselves to be defeated by the evil doing of men. However many times sin begins, we must prove the efficacy of the divine life in the soul by matching it with an even greater spirit—the spirit of forgiveness.

CONSCIOUS INABILITY.

"Lord, increase our faith." This was a pathetic appeal for power. At no point is human helplessness more apparent than in the requirements and exactions of forgiveness. Love makes tremendous demands upon faith. Our natural inability to manifest the spirit of Jesus under great aggravation is perfectly evident to everyone who has tried it. The call of the disciples was for such a relation to God as would make possible this expression of love which Jesus was exhibiting. Faith is more than an intellectual acceptance of any truth. Faith in a scriptural sense is belief permeated with love. It is the point of contact between ourselves and the dynamo of heaven. It is hindered wherever self-sufficiency asserts and shows itself; wherever difficulties are unduly magnified, and wherever disposition declines obedience to God's law. It can be increased only when we are determined to obey the truth which is revealed through it and to employ the power which is imparted by it. A disposition to obedience is the primary requisite to the inflow of God into the soul. All faith must have a rational basis.

AN ACHIEVING FAITH.

The response of Jesus to this petition was immediate. He gave at once a mighty assurance and a declaration of the achieving qualities of Faith. Indeed, he indicated that the qualitative feature of faith is far more important than the quantitative. Not so much the amount of faith as the actuality of it and the reality of it, were to be considered. It is the actuality of contact, not the area of it, which insures the flow of the electric current. Jesus was less concerned about the measure of it than about the vitality of it. He indicated clearly that the actual contact of a soul with God will insure adequacy of power, wisdom and all other attributes essential to meet any emergency of life. "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed ye would say unto this sycamine tree, 'Be thou rooted up and be thou planted in the sea,' and it would have obeyed you." This is only another way of saying that anything that is necessary to be done in the interests of the kingdom of God can be done through faith. The absoluteness of divine control could hardly be stated more confidently. The inevitableness of whatever God commends finds strongest emphasis here and in connection with all this is the fact of the appropriableness of divine power and wisdom.

THE CONGRESS AT INDIANAPOLIS.

He is the organized sum of all the influences that have played upon him. Home influence, school influence, work influence, friendship influence, political influence, book influence, newspaper influence—all these are the stuff out of which individuality is made. The task of the Gospel is to Christianize this vast matrix in which the soul lives and out of which it creatively builds its character. Dr. Lumley testified to his appreciation of the message of Dr. Mathews and confessed on behalf of himself and other Disciples of Christ to the sin of disproportion in teaching the gospel of Christ. He pointed out that what was regarded as Christ's command to baptize had been so urgently insisted upon as of the very essence of obedience that the great social commandments of Jesus had been more or less obscured.

MISSIONS AND THE SOCIAL GOSPEL.

Mr. Abram E. Cory, of China, leader of the Men and Millions Movement, followed Prof. Lumley. He voiced his sense of expansion of mind while listening to the great message of the evening. In China, he said, mission work is rapidly adding to its direct work for individuals the task of Christianizing the social order. He, too, confessed to the smallness and negligibleness of many things which Christians insist on making first things, in the light of the great world-extensive task of which Dr. Mathews had given the Congress a vision.

Other speakers followed, among them Dr. Jabez Hall of Butler College, who felt that the generous response accorded such an address betokened the progressive character of the Disciples' mind and their breadth of view and interest. Dr. Powell thought there was food for thought, if not ground for humor, in the fact that a Divinity School, noted the world over for its freedom of thinking and teaching, and supposed by many to be a source of much heresy, should have sent its dean to a Disciples Congress with counsels of conservatism and orthodoxy and with profound messages of faith!

It was a great evening, closing a great day.

THE PROGRESS OF UNITY.

Thursday morning's session was opened with a devotional service led by Rev. Carey E. Morgan, whom Dr. Powell, at the close of the devotions, characterized as "the St. John of the Disciples of Christ." Rev. B. A. Abbott then read a paper on "The Present Status of the Christian Union Movement." Mr. Abbott made a careful and comprehensive survey of the various fields in which the Christian union spirit is at work—in various denominations, in various non-denominational fields, on the mission field, in the field of social service and among the Disciples of Christ. It was admirably conceived, and written in an irenic and tolerant vein, partaking of the chaste and elevated quality of thought that is characteristic of the gracious pastor of Union Avenue Church, St. Louis.

Dr. Sharpe followed in review. He said that the Disciples of Christ have yet to produce an indigenous theology, a theology whose constructive principle is the idea of unity. Mr. Abbott had affirmed that Christian unity was an end in itself, not a mere means to an end. Dr. Sharpe, therefore, declared that such an ultimate should determine our theological thinking. He outlined what he called a theology built upon the principle of unity. Many who heard this short speech felt that Dr. Sharpe had marked out a path for himself and his Disciple brethren which, if it were followed, would bring us all to a fairer field than the all too literalistic and legalistic theology with which many have identified the Disciples movement.

HIGHER COLLEGE STANDARDS.

Mr. Abram E. Cory read a statesmanly paper on "Lifting Up Our Educational Institutions." Representing the Business Men's Commission in charge of the educational section of the Men and Millions Movement, Mr. Cory interpreted their hopes for a new day among us, educationally, as a result of the new standard they have set up for our colleges. His full-packed paper can hardly be reported, and luckily needs no report for its sum and substance is to be brought to the hearts of our church people throughout the land by Mr. Cory and his Men and Millions team.

Rev. C. H. Winders, the efficient and genial host of the 1914 Congress.

Dean H. L. Willett, of the Disciples Divinity House, was called on by many voices from the floor to discuss Mr. Cory's theme. He insisted that our colleges should be conceived not merely as conventionally Christian, but as bearers of our testimony to the great ideal that has inspired the Disciples of Christ for more than a century. Pres. Thos. C. Howe of Butler College, Pres. Miner Lee Bates of Hiram, Pres. H. O. Pritchard of Eureka and others were called out and spoke to this subject.

From all sides there were heard voices of optimism with reference to our educational situation.

WHO IS ORTHODOX?

Rev. L. J. Marshall, pastor of Wabash Avenue Church, Kansas City, opened the afternoon session with a symmetrically prepared paper on "Christ's Standard of Orthodoxy." It proved to be a rich and comprehensive treatment of the thought of Jesus on the leading themes which the Master seemed to make normative. These themes were The Fatherhood of God, The Kingdom of God, The Relation of Men as Brothers, and the Infinite Worth of Life. Such an analysis of the "mind of Christ" showed that ethical considerations alone entered into the standard by which Christ judged men.

The address was an impressive illustration of the present power of Christ's own words, for it would be safe to say that 75 per cent of the paper was made up of quotations from the four gospels. Yet every hearer bent his attention upon it with such eagerness as if the words of Christ were being heard for the first time.

Rev. Graham Frank interpreted the paper in an impromptu speech which for clearness and cogency was not matched by another impromptu talk during the Congress. He declared that while he listened there had been growing in his soul the thought that he and many of his brethren had been guilty of what he called "the heresy of silence." These great ideas of Jesus are the only great ideas, he said, yet we go on preaching so much conventional orthodoxy and remain silent on these spiritual and moral truths which Jesus taught and which fit close up to human life.

DISCUSSION DRIVEN INTO CORNER.

Other approving voices were heard, among them Rev. W. J. Wright of Franklin, Ind., who expressed a desire to hear the disapproving voices. Rev. Mathew Small and Rev. M. B. Ingle, both of Indianapolis, spoke, each insisting that the epistles of the New Testament, as well as the four gospels, must be taken into account in determining Christ's standard of orthodoxy. Various quotations were made intended to show that the test of orthodoxy and fellowship in the apostolic church was quite unlike that set forth in Mr. Marshall's paper. Pres. H. O. Pritchard said that the trouble with such reasoning was that it failed to distinguish between the Church and the Kingdom. Jesus talked of the Kingdom; the Epistles and Acts treat, for the most part, of the Church. The terms of admittance to one are not the same as the terms of admittance to the other, and baptism, to which reference had been made by the critics, belonged to the Church rather than to the Kingdom.

Whereupon Mr. Ingle arose and quoted Jesus' saying: "Except a man be born of water and the spirit he cannot enter the Kingdom of God."

Into this corner was the discussion driven when the chairman announced the next paper.

MR. TODD'S PAPER TO BE PUBLISHED.

Of this paper on the subject, "Mysticism and Modern Preaching," by Rev. Earle M. Todd of Canton, Mo., and its review by Dr. E. S. Ames of Hyde Park Church, Chicago, we shall have to forego at this time any report or word of appreciation. Both these writers have been asked for their productions for publication in The Christian Century. We believe it is safe to promise our readers that they will appear in our next issue. They made a profound impression on the Congress. Their publication will add yet another to the long list of outstanding features which have brought distinction to The Christian Century.

The officers elected for next year are: President, Rev. J. H. Goldner, Cleveland; vice-president, Rev. Finis Idleman, Des Moines; secretary, Dr. F. E. Lumley, of the College of Missions, Indianapolis. Upon Dr. Lumley will fall the main burden of preparation for the next meeting of the Congress.

PEACE.

Lord! ev'n as Thou all-present art.
Oh! may we still with heedful heart
Thy presence know and find!
Then come what will of weal or woe,
Joy's blossom-spring shall steady flow:
For though 'tis heaven Thyself to see,
Where but Thy shadow falls, grief cannot be!

TOPIC FOR MAY 20.

The Flower of a Meek Spirit. Is. 42:1-4; Matt. 5:5, 43-45; 20:26-29.

Meekness, like the other words of the vocabulary of Christianity, often passes for less than it is worth. There is always present the tendency to bring the meaning of the words of faith down to the level of our practice. We soothe the conscience by explaining away the virtues. "Meekness cannot be counterfeited. It is not insensibility, or unmanliness, or servility; it does not cringe, or whine. It is benevolence imitating Christ in patience, forbearance, and quietness. It feels keenly, but not malignantly; it abounds in good will, and bears all things."

AGGRESSIVENESS.

Meekness is always and everywhere aggressive. Moses, who was very meek, never stood aside to allow idolatry and shamelessness the use of the main road. He held his ground. He boldly set out to overthrow evil. Tame submission to the demands of arrogant wickedness is cowardice and bears no likeness to meekness. But the meek man's aggressiveness is not that of the wild beast and the savage. It is for this reason that he is accused of being pliant. He knows the difference between what only seems to be a victory and what is really a victory. He looks ahead and sees what is to be, and while others are boasting of their courage in meeting the enemy in the open, he is laying in the hearts of men the foundation of a new social and religious order.

CONSERVATION.

"A bruised reed he will not break, and a dimly burning wick he will not quench." Many of the world's heroes have been ruthless. They have been destroyers. "You are ambitious," wrote President Lincoln to General Hooker, "which, within reasonable bounds, does good rather than harm; but I think that during General Burnside's command of the army you have taken counsel of your ambition and thwarted him as much as you could, in which you did a great wrong to the country and to a most meritorious and honorable brother officer." Meekness in General Hooker would not have detracted from his fighting qualities; it would have kept him from substituting personal ambition for patriotism.

SUCCESS.

"He will not fail nor be discouraged." "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." The meek spirit is the spirit of success. It is not the possession of those who fail. Kindness, courtesy, and insistence upon what is right contribute to success. In the stores where men buy they demand politeness, that is, they demand to be treated as men whose desires are to be respected. Boorishness, contemptuousness, and snobbishness are bars to success. The wise man shows his superiority by his good manners; the fool tries to exhibit a superiority he does not have by being ill-mannered. The wise man wins the approval of the wise and of fools; the fool remains in the class of fools in the opinion of everybody. Kingdoms built up by aggressive injustice cannot stand.

A PRESENT DUTY.

"And the Lord's servant must not strive, but be gentle toward all, apt to teach, forbearing, in meekness correcting them that oppose themselves." There is a present duty of learning the ways of aggressive meekness. The church must attack evils. But must it use without discrimination the methods of the prize ring? Shall it listen without protest while the none too scrupulous business man tells how to manage religious enterprises? The church may learn from many kinds of persons methods of fighting sin, but she must have her own mind and know what comports with the truth she teaches.

Ps. 22:26; 37:11; Prov. 14:29; 16:32; 19:11; 25:15; Is. 11:4; Matt. 5:38:42; Rom. 14:19; I Cor. 10:32; Gal. 6:1; Phil. 2:14; Thess. 5:14; I Tim. 6:11.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

* * *

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

* * *

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

God and the Landscape

The vision of God carries with it some vision of His domain. The larger our thought of God, the greater our thought of His Kingdom. Whether our widening view of creation begins at one end or at the other, whether it comes from our study of God or our conception of human life, our thought of God and His world must grow together. That genial New England poet, Sam Walter Foss, one time let his thought of creation expand but attempted no corresponding enlargement of his thought of God, and he lost God out of his reckoning; but another man, as he saw God's world created, defined greater thoughts of God to go with it.

"A boy was born 'mid little things,
  Between a little world and sky,
And dreamed not of the cosmic rings
  Round which the circling planets fly.
He lived in little works and thoughts,
  Where his little ventures grow and plod,
And paced, and plowed his little plots
  And prayed unto his little God.
But as the mighty system grew,
  His faith grew faint with many scars;
The cosmos widened in his view—
  But God was lost among his stars.

Another boy in lowly days,
  As he, to lowly things was born,
But gathered lore in woodland ways,
  And from the glory of the morn.
As wider skies broke on his view,
  God greatened in his growing mind:
Each year he dreamed his God anew,
  And left his older God behind.
He saw the boundless scheme dilate,
  In star and blossom, sky and clod;
And as the universe grew great,
  He dreamed it for a greater God.

Whether our widening study be of religion or of life, this process must go on. The greater God involves the greater universe, and the greater universe compels the greater God. We cannot widen one and limit the other. The same eyes that see the king in greater glory must behold also a farther stretching land. We are mistaken if we suppose we are to look in opposite directions for God and man. The vision of the King carries with it also a vision of the landscape. It is a bifocal text. "Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty: they shall behold a far-stretching land."

It is just here we meet the wrong interpretation of some people who think themselves very practical. They suppose that the landscape is the all-important, that we do not need to bother ourselves much about God, but there are times when our very path on earth depends upon some vision of what is overhead.

Someone has written a charming little poem about the path through the deep pine woods, and how the driver finds his way through the dark, not by staring at the black road, which he cannot hope to see, but by looking upward where the stars appear through the treetops.

The woods were dark and the night was black,
And only an owl could see the track:
Yet the cheery driver made his way
Through the great pine woods as if 'twere day.

I asked him, "How to you manage to see?
The road and the forest are one to me."
"To me as well," he replied, "and I Can only drive by the path in the sky."

I looked above, where the treetops tall
Rose from the road like an ebon wall,
And lo! a beautiful starry lane
Wound as the road wound and made it plain.

And since, when the path of my life is drear
And all is blackness and doubt and fear,
When the horrors of midnight are here below,
And I see not a step of the way to go,
Then, ah! then I can look on high,
And walk on earth by the path in the sky.

Never doubt for a moment that he who sees the King in His beauty sees also the landscape. It is not the man who insists that one world at a time is enough who has the best interpretation for even this present world. Thousands of men shut up in jail have seen the four walls of their prison, but John Bunyan, who, confined in jail, had a vision of the progress of Pilgrim to the city of the great king, had also the truer interpretation of present human life. Many a man has been banished from home and looked out upon the ocean which separated him from that which he loved in this world. But the man who most truly interprets even the best of this present life is he who sees, as John from the Isle of Patmos saw, the Holy City, the new Jerusalem sent down from God out of heaven.

The two visions go together, the vision of God and the vision of human life. Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty, and behold the far-stretching land of life and hope now and forevermore.

This is the promise of this bifocal text. The King and the country, Christ and the world, God and the landscape of the centuries, we are to see with our illumined vision.

President Wilson's Mexican Policy

BY FREDERICK STARR.

In this article Professor Starr, of the University of Chicago, himself an advocate of peace and of non-intervention, takes sharp issue with President Wilson's policy toward Mexico. Considering the way the United States has treated Huerta and his government, he contends that Huerta has been admirably forbearing and discreet, and that there was no warrant for the beginning of hostilities and the seizure of Vera Cruz. The article is part of a chapter in Professor Starr's new book on "The United States and Mexico," published by the Bible House, Chicago. No man in the United States possesses so intimate an understanding of Mexican life on its human side as has been given by the fifteen years' study of the Mexican people to which this distinguished anthropologist has devoted himself.

THINGS have moved on in Mexico as might have been expected; are moving. President Wilson lifted the embargo on arms and war munitions February 3. The effect was immediate. Not only were the forces of the constitutionalists materially assisted; the moral support they gained was great. It was now recognized by them and by outsiders that the Government of the United States was fighting with them against the old Indian—and the de facto government of Mexico. We were actively allied with rebels.

The first company to move forward; the skirmish.

CAPTURE OF TORREON.

For a long time the constitutionalists had announced their purpose of advancing on Torreon to capture it. It is a place of importance as the junction point of two great railroads from the United States and as a point of further operations for the advance upon the capital city. General Villa himself led the rebel forces. They met with unexpected opposition. Although surpassed in numbers the federal forces made a vigorous defence. The struggle was continued through several days, the fighting on both sides being of exceptional bravery. Losses in dead and wounded were numerous; finally, on April 3 the federal forces evacuated the city and the rebels were in possession. It was a notable victory, but the escape of the bulk of the federal army robbed it of much of its effect.

ADVANCE TO TAMPICO.

After the battle and victory at Torreon the constitutionalist advance on Tampico began. The possession of a gulf port of consequence would be a great advantage to the rebel leaders. It may be remembered, too, that Tampico is in the region of oil wells, and oil wells undoubtedly have had significance in the aid and sympathy which the constitutionalists have been able to command on this side of the Rio Grande. The federal forces in Tampico are scarcely adequate to the protection of the town against the constitutionalists, although the presence of Mexican gunboats is an advantage to them.

Not only, however, were Mexican gunboats in the Gulf before Tampico. United States men-of-war and warships of other nations were lingering in the vicinity and on April 9 occurred an incident which, in itself insignificant, has had results of serious consequence. The whaleboat of the Dolphin landed at a dock in Tampico. The paymaster and a crew of seven men went on shore. Having purchased some gasoline they were engaged in loading the cases into the boat, when they were arrested by an officer and squad of men of the Mexican military forces. They were marched through the streets of Tampico under arrest. It is claimed that some of the men arrested were on the boat at the time the arrest was made, and were forced to go with the others. Admiral Mayo, immediately on learning of this insult, issued a communication to General Zaragoza in which he demanded that members of the general staff should call upon him with formal disavowal and apology for the act, and a promise that severe punishment should be visited upon the officer responsible for the arrest. He also demanded that the United States flag should be hoisted in a prominent place on shore and be saluted with twenty-one guns. He set a limit of twenty-four hours, within which the salute should be fired.

QUESTION OF SALUTE.

Is it possible that Admiral Mayo did not realize the meaning which would be attributed by Mexicans generally to the raising of an American flag upon Mexican soil? The demand was in reality extraordinary, and the setting of a period unwise.

In the excitement which ensued upon the issue of this order and the failure of the Mexican soldiery to respond to it within the time limit, American newspapers sought eagerly for precedents for such salutes. It was seriously discussed in prominent newspapers the following day. We were assured that twice the United States itself has fired such salutes to the flags of offended nations. Thus, in the Civil War, American gunboats had fired upon a Confederate vessel in Brazilian waters. The Brazilian government complained, legitimately; our Government finally saluted the Brazilian flag. It will be noticed that this flag was on Brazilian soil,—where it belonged, —or on a Brazilian war vessel. Again, it seems that once in California a French Consul was arrested by American authorities. The French government objected, as was its right. The next time that a French government vessel appeared within the harbor the flag upon it was saluted. It will be noticed that here again the flag was raised upon the national soil,—a French vessel. What Admiral Mayo demanded was in no way similar to these precedents. It is a very different thing to raise an American flag in the centre of the city of Tampico on Mexican soil, and salute it, from either of the precedential cases. A serious question might arise in these circumstances, as to whether a right of sovereignty was sacrificed in meeting the demand which Mayo made. At all events the salute was not fired in accordance with his orders. It is said that Secretary Daniels states that Admiral Mayo modified his demand after making it, and said that he would be satisfied if the salute was to the flag raised on the Dolphin, or upon a Mexican gunboat. If he really made such modification it is plain that he realized the injustice of his original order.

While the salute was not fired the Mexican government took prompt action in the matter. An apology was made, and the officer responsible for the insult was punished.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S STAND.

As might have been expected a great excitement resulted in the United States. President Wilson stood behind Admiral Mayo. He demanded that a salute of twenty-one guns should be fired to the American flag. While the matter was under consideration and in debate it appeared that a return of the salute was necessary. This caused some surprise and much hard feeling in the United States. Again the order made upon the Mexican government was an ultimatum with a time limit. If the salute were not fired by a given hour, President Wilson would lay the whole matter before Congress with an address upon the Mexican situation. Here again our diplomacy did not shine. Huerta's foreign office at present is under charge of a wise and prudent man, José Lopez Portillo y Rojas. His discussion was dignified, and would make a strong appeal to any disinterested party. Senor Portillo claimed that the Mexican government had inflicted no insult on the American nation; that no flag was flying from the launch sent by the Dolphin to the landing; that the American marines had been set free even before an investigation, and that the officer responsible had been arrested, and would be tried; he proposed that both flags should be saluted alternately, the American flag first, and then the Mexican flag. This proposition was refused absolutely by the United States, and an unconditional salute was demanded. This Mexico refused, saying that she had yielded all that her dignity would permit, and appealed to the fair-mindedness and spirit of justice of the American people.

THE MESSAGE TO CONGRESS.

As a matter of fact, the Tampico incident was not deserving of such serious consideration and bluster. In reality it was recognized by President Wilson himself as inadequate. In his report to Congress, delivered in fulfillment of his threat to Huerta, our President querulously complains that the Huerta government had selected the United States from all other nations as the object upon which to vent its spleen and insults. He says: "It cannot but strike anyone who has watched the course of events in Mexico as significant that untoward incidents such as these have not occurred in any case where representatives of other governments were concerned, but only in dealings with representatives of the United States, and that there has been no occasion for other governments to call attention to such matters, or to ask for apologies."

This is petty. No other nation has attempted to dictate the internal affairs of Mexico; no other nation has cut off the supplies necessary for conducting the Mexican government; no other nation has attempted to assist the revolution in the north, and to supply arms to rebels in the field; no other nation has fought a war through months against the de facto government of Mexico. The wonder is not that, from time to time, trifling offences have occurred with reference to us. It was to be expected that many and flag- It was to be expected that many and flagrant outrages should have been practised case. As a matter of fact, Huerta has shown remarkable control. His conduct in his dealings with the United States and Mr. Wilson since August of 1913 have been characterized by a courtesy and a forbearance remarkable and praiseworthy.

THE UNDERLYING MOTIVES.

No, the fact is that the flag incident of Tampico was not the real cause of our severe demand and of our attitude. Nor were the petty discriminations and disadvantages to which Americans had been subjected. Two things and two things only precipitated the crisis. The first was that Huerta had succeeded in raising 60,000,000 pesos in Mexico for the conduct of his government and for the re-establishment of peace in the republic; and, secondly, because President Wilson, and his representative, John Lind, were smarting, and had been smarting for eight months, under the sense of defeat. For eight months Mr. Wilson, and John Lind, backed by the resources of the United States, had been fighting an unsuccessful battle against one old Indian, —"a little drunkard,"—with no result.

By his message President Wilson stated that he wished to be assured that Congress stood behind him in the steps which he had taken and in those which he proposed to take. This approval was given,—with some reservations, and criticisms,—but in full measure, and our President, announcing that we ought not to interfere in the internal affairs of another nation, that we ought not to intervene, that we had no quarrel against the Mexican people, proceeded to extremities. The army was set in motion to the border; war ships were started; and talk of establishing a peaceful blockade indulged; the whole country was swept by a blaze of war enthusiasm. Our people and the nations of the world believed that war was imminent,—indeed, that war existed. Vera Cruz was seized; the customs house was taken over; martial law and then a civil government of American organization were declared; men were killed on both sides; and yet we were assured that war did not exist.

Whether war existed or not, preparations for war were pushed with vigor. Newspapers blazed with outrageous telegraph reports and editorials. Our hysterical people were inflamed by unwarranted and hideous misrepresentation. It was announced that O'Shaughnessy had disappeared and that his fate was uncertain; that Consul-General Shanklin had been murdered; that outbreaks involving loss of American lives had taken place, even in the capital city itself. Stories of horrors emanating from and surrounding Consul Hanna and Carrothers were sent out. Everything that could be done to arouse hatred and a desire for blood was done.

HUERTA'S ATTITUDE.

It is true that Huerta suspended the relations between the two nations. He did not, however, declare war. Let no one make mistake. Neither Huerta nor his people believe for an instant that Mexico can wage successful war against us. They know that they are poor and weak, reduced and distracted by internal dissension, but the Mexican character prefers to lose life itself and nationality rather than not to make a final stand for dignity and self-respect. At a time when American newspapers were inflaming our minds to war by false stories Huerta was guaranteeing the security of Americans in the capital city; he was sending O'Shaughnessy and Shanklin by special train under the protection of his body guard to Vera Cruz. The old man may be Indian, may be a drunkard,—I do not know,—but there are few things in his year of office which indicate that he is either weak or a fool.

American Red Cross Corps at Vera Cruz.

And in the crisis, when it looked as if two nations were to go to war; when it seemed as if the Colossus of the North was again about to play the bully, there came a plea of mediation. It was—it is —the only hope. Three South American republics, Argentina, Brazil, Chile, approached our government with the offer of mediating between the United States and Mexico, in the hope of reaching an adjustment whereby with honor to both parties, war with all its horrors might be avoided. It is impossible to forecast results. There is danger that President Wilson will demand that all the yielding come from Mexico. If he does, the offered mediation will fail. If he insists on continuing the personal quarrel between himself and Huerta, if he still demands that "Huerta go," the proffered service may be in vain. Huerta ought not to go and, as the President of our republic himself says, we ought not to interfere or dictate in the affairs of Mexico. All just men must hope that something will be accomplished by this peaceful effort. Should the mediation succeed, it might be the beginning of a united effort of all the American republics on a basis of equality, to build up a policy which shall supplant the famous policy of James Monroe, which has long outlived its usefulness. If Argentina, Brazil and Chile can bring about a peace and friendship honorable to Mexico and the United States, it will be the beginning of an American policy, which might command the admiration and respect of all the world.

Mysticism the Essence of Religion

BY EARLE MARION TODD.

The climax of the Congress of Disciples was reached at the very last session when Rev. Earle M. Todd, Disciple pastor in the college town of Canton, Mo., read his paper on "Mysticism," and Dr. E. S. Ames, professor of the Psychology of Religion in the University of Chicago, reviewed it. We have been compelled by the limitations of space to omit a considerable portion of Mr. Todd's paper. A large section dealt with Maeterlinck's mysticism. Of this and of another section dealing with the philosophic basis of mysticism we have been able to retain but a small share. For the rest, however, the paper is virtually intact. Doctor Ames' review is given in full. In our next issue will appear an editorial opinion as to the merits of Mr. Todd's thesis and Doctor Ames' critique. Meantime we would like to publish our readers' opinions also—if they are expressed in about 300 words.

IN the heart of the city of London, on the busiest of her thronged thoroughfares, where the roar of the traffic never ceases, and the patter of hurrying human feet rises and falls in cadences as musical as the murmur of a shell, and laden with a pathos as deep as eternity, stands a stately church. Here, on Thursdays, at noon, snatching hastily their lunch at the neighboring teashops lest they be late and miss somewhat of the coveted treasure, come multitudes of men from the offices, shops and warehouses of the neighborhood, old and young, from every class in society, crowding the church and galleries and overflowing into the aisles, to listen to a man who helps them to be sure of God.

I used, in the old days, to drop in to hear this wonderful preacher. He was a slight man, with a frail body and a frail voice, with a dense mass of white hair—not white with years,—with kindly eyes set in dark circles that seemed to look out of eternity, and with a bearing as simple and free from self-consciousness as that of a child. A hush of expectancy settles over the congregation as the preacher ascends the pulpit, and when he rises to announce his text every form is motionless and every face turned eagerly towards him.

Thou openest Thine hand and satisfiest the desire of every living thing.

From the first word, he is en rapport with his audience. The tone is conversational and proceeds without the slightest effort at oratory, though with much animation.

"Fullness of life and joy," he is saying, "is the indefeasible right of every human soul, and as such must be realized and entered upon soon or late. . . . The highest and best in us is a protest against acquiescence in the belief that life cannot be other than disappointment and tragedy. We somehow feel, and cannot help feeling, that the soul's native air, so to speak, is not pain but joy, not poverty but abundance, not disease but health, not ignorance and sin but wisdom, purity and love. We belong to the eternal, and the eternal belongs to us, and this eternal is the fullness, the all-abundance, of which we are now in search. However we may explain our present experience of unideal conditions and the terrible and tragical elements in our lot, our deepest affinities are with blessedness and perfection of being. We are constituted for it, have come forth from it—for it is God Himself—and though we have to wander far and wait long before we find it, it is our home, and we shall not be allowed to be exiled permanently from it. . . . I think one might boldly say without falsehood or exaggeration you will get everything you have ever wanted or ever shall want; you will get it all; for the measure of your wants is the measure of your soul, and here or hereafter the soul must come to its own.

'I stay my haste, I make delays:
For what avails this eager pace?
I stand amid the eternal ways.
And what is mine shall see my face.'"

The service over, the crowd disperses—as silently and reverently as it assembled; hardly a word is spoken. They have what they came for—that "firmer hold upon religious realities" that stimulates the soul to high endeavor or fortifies it for the endurance of the monotonous and the commonplace. Thus the City Temple becomes a spiritual oasis in the midst of the wide waste of London's dense materialism, and its waters, troubled betimes by angel hands, flow forth in streams of health and healing. This wonderful ministry of helpfulness shows up all the more brightly against the dark background of fierce fanaticism and implacable hate of the evangelical reactionaries of Britain, who rest not day or night in their effort to discredit the minister and bring to an end his work. One Sunday morning a fanatical religionist brought a step-ladder, "very early in the morning, while it was yet dark," and posted up across the front of the church in large white letters the word, ICHABOD. But he put them on the wrong church, for the 'glory' is still there.

Rev. Earle M. Todd.

WHAT IS HIS SECRET?

What is the secret of this beautiful, gentle, quiet, but patient ministry which descends on the city like the gentle and refreshing rain? An American preacher, who recently visited London and attended a service at the City Temple, put it in one phrase: R. J. Campbell, said he, is "very sure of God" He has, to be sure, extraordinary intellectual and temperamental gifts, but no one who knows the man or his work would dream of attributing to these his power as a preacher. R. J. Campbell speaks with the same kind of authority as that with which Jesus spoke—the authority of one who is in immediate contact with reality, to whom God is no mere hypothesis, no mere logical conclusion from questionable premises, no mere tradition from the fathers, but a living, present, companionable reality.

ALL RELIGION IS MYSTICAL.

To be sure of God, that is the preacher's supreme qualification; to make others sure of God, that his supreme function. There is only one way to be sure of God, and that is the mystic's way: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." All religion is mystical. When it ceases to be mystical it ceases to be religion, and becomes ethics, philosophy, science, anything you like. It is the mystical element that places religion in a category all by itself. All religion begins with the vision of God by the pure in heart. The result of that vision we call faith. All true faith is mystical,—it is independent of reasons; it can only give reasons for its being, it cannot be brought into being by reasons. The faith comes first, not the reasons. Faith is a phenomenon for which the intellect has to account. The faculty which gives rise to it is also a faculty which the intellect has to guide, otherwise faith becomes superstition. Other than these, the intellect has no function in regard to faith.

Religion is primarily and essentially not a matter of institutions and ceremonials and beliefs,—it is not even a matter of deeds, however benevolent and disinterested, such as "visiting the fatherless and the widows in their affliction,"—but a matter of communion with the Highest. The deeds follow, as do also the forms of worship and the institutions through which it expresses itself and the rules of conduct which we call beliefs. But religion itself, in its essential nature, is a fellowship between kindred souls. Friendship, at its highest, is almost a religion. It is a sacrament.

RELIGION AND FRIENDSHIP.

Religion is simply friendship raised to the 'nth power. When we are told of Abraham that he was the "friend of God," we have set before us the highest ideal of the religious life. Everything that is in friendship and comes out of it is in religion and comes out of it, and all the elements of religion are in friendship. There is no better definition of religion in its higher manifestations than that which defines it in terms of the relation between a man and his friend. Abraham and God, St. Francis and God, John Wesley and God—these expressions carry essentially the same connotation as David and Jonathan, Ruth and Naomi. Whatever of the mystical there is in friendship there is in religion, and whatever of the mystical there is in religion there is, in some measure at least, in friendship.

The thesis of this paper is, that there is a mysticism that is at once real and consonant with reason; that meets all the requirements of true mysticism and is at the same time possible to men of the modern mind; and that this mysticism is evermore the secret of pulpit power,—that preaching never rises to its highest levels until it becomes mystical, and that supreme power in the pulpit is denied to all but the mystic.

It would be necessary, first, to differentiate between mysticism and some other things that bear very different and less attractive names. There seems some danger lest it should be confused with mystery, or even, perhaps, with agnosticism.

THE MYSTICISM OF MAETERLINCK.

Much is being said in our day about the mysticism of Maurice Maeterlinck. There are some who seem to see in the Belgian playwright a prophet of a "new mysticism" which they think destined to take the place of the old. I am unable to see any light in this direction. I have searched the writings of Maeterlinck in vain for any trace of genuine mysticism. I grant that there are "mystical passages" in Maeterlinck—he is always feeling after a mystical interpretation of phenomena. But he never finds such interpretation. How, then, can he be a mystic? For a mystic is one who FINDS. The nearest approach to mysticism that I can find is this passage from his "Life of the Bee." Speaking of the means by which certain plants propagate themselves, he says:

> It would be difficult not to admit that acts which bear all the appearance of acts of intelligence and prudence produce and support these fortunate chances. Whence do they issue,—from the being itself, or from the force whence that being draws life? I will not say 'it matters but little,' for, on the contrary, to know the answer were of supreme importance to us. But in the meantime a multitude of semblances invite us to believe that something equal to our loftiest thoughts issues at times from a common source, that we are compelled to admire without knowing where it resides.

This might easily be mistaken for mysticism. And if this were Maeterlinck's prevailing mood, he might almost qualify as a mystic. And yet, there is a great gulf between this and true mysticism. Maeterlinck, even here, is tied down, as mysticism is not, to the creeping processes of the intellect. It is "a multitude of semblances" that invite us to believe in this "something equal to our loftiest thoughts" that "issues at times from a common source." But true mysticism, paying but little attention to the "semblances" which as often hinder as help, rises on the wings of the intuition and makes the strong affirmation of faith.

NIGHT SHOT THROUGH WITH LIGHT.

There are four words that seem to require more accurate definition and differentiation: Ignorance, Agnosticism, Mysticism and Mystery. Ignorance is night—night unrelieved, unoppressive, acquiesced in; the night that does not know that it is night, and hence has no longing for the day; the night of the unawakened soul. Agnosticism, too, is night, the night of the intellect, night impenetrable and sublime. But it is a night of which the soul is conscious, and which it has valiantly striven to penetrate, and which is acquiesced in only because it seems impenetrable. Mysticism, on the other hand, is this night of the intellect shot through with the light of a higher intelligence. Mysticism is not the synonym of mystery—it is mystery solved. Mysticism is vision, it is night interpenetrated with light, it is light shining in the darkness. In the absence of the sun the mystic walks by the light of the stars. No doubt there is a place for religious agnosticism, but it must not be confounded with mysticism. Religious agnosticism is the darkness in which the light shines, mysticism is the light that shines in the darkness.

THE MYSTICISM OF THOREAU.

Some years ago, during a brief stay in Boston, I took the trolley car westward through Lexington to the beautiful little town of Concord. It is the most attractive literary pilgrimage in America, for here, at one time, lived Emerson and Thoreau, the Alcotts and Hawthorne. On the afternoon of that day, taking the road that runs southeast under the hill, and turning to the right a hundred yards short of the Emerson home, I crossed the sluggish little river that meanders through the valley, and followed the road that leads up among the hills to the south. After pursuing this road for some twenty minutes, I turned off to the right along a well-worn footpath—for there are many who make this pilgrimage—which presently brought me to the edge of a quiet pond, surrounded by lofty pine and forest trees which it reflected on its unruffled surface. It was Walden Pond. The woodman had been busy in the neighborhood, but still the solitude of the place was scarcely less than when, in 1845, Henry D. Thoreau came here, fleeing from society, and erected the rude hut which served as his dwelling for more than two years. Sitting down there beside the pile of stones which pilgrims have heaped up to mark the site of Thoreau's hut, and taking from my pocket a copy of "Walden" I read the following from his chapter on "Solitude":

> I have never felt lonesome, or in the least oppressed by a sense of solitude, but once, and that was for a few weeks after I came to the woods, when for an hour I doubted if the near neighborhood of man was not essential to a serene and healthy life. To be alone was something unpleasant. But I was at the same time conscious of a slight insanity in my mood, and seemed to foresee my recovery. In the midst of a gentle rain, while these thoughts prevailed, I was suddenly sensible of such sweet and beneficent society in nature, in the very pattering of the drops, and in every sight and sound around my house, an intimate and unaccountable friendliness all at once, like an atmosphere surrounding me, as made the fancied advantages of human neighborhood insignificant, and I have never thought of them since. Every little pine-needle expanded and swelled with sympathy and befriended me. I was so distinctly made aware of the presence of something kindred to me, even in scenes which we are accustomed to call dreary, and also that the nearest of blood to me and the humanest was not a person nor a villager, that I thought no place could ever be strange to me again.

This, as far as it goes, is real mysticism. It is not merely the perception of outward beauty, which would be art; not of a mystery, which would be science; nor of a problem, which would be philosophy; but the perception, back of the beauty and back of the mystery and back of the problem, and back of the material, of a companionable personality. I grant that it does not carry us all the way, but it has cleared the gulf—it is real religious mysticism.

Analyze the experience: He became conscious of something in nature of kin to himself; it was a friendly presence; it was something with which he could hold communion, a companionable presence that kept him from the sense of loneliness; he did not reason himself into this frame of mind, he became "sensible" of a companionship. And, finally, he was certain of it; it was not a far away conjecture that might turn out to be a delusion. This, I repeat, as far as it goes, is true mysticism. Between this experience of Thoreau and the "multitude of semblances" of the sophisticated Maeterlinck there is all the difference between religion and metaphysics.

WAS NOT CHRIST A MYSTIC?

Does it, in an infinitely small way, reflect the experience of that other Mystic, centuries before, which Sidney Lanier has described in wonderful verse:

Into the woods my Master went,
Clean forspent, forspent.
Into the woods my Master came,
Forspent with love and shame.
But the olives they were not blind to Him;
The little grey leaves were kind to Him;
The thorn-tree had a mind to Him.
When into the woods He came.

Out of the woods my Master went,
And He was well content.
Out of the woods my Master came,
Content with death and shame.
When death and shame would woo Him last,
From under the trees they drew Him last;
'Twas on a tree they slew Him—last,
When out of the woods He came.

This, now, is the more general aspect of mysticism—the mysticism which looks outward, which sees in the material world but the garment in which God clothes Himself. "The mystic," says G. H. Morrison, of Glasgow, "has no quarrel with the man of science, but he holds that reality has many aspects of which the scientific aspect is but one; and he claims for all the other aspects, which appeal to feeling rather than intelligence, a place in the interpretation of the whole. The everlasting hills are not so real to him as the mysterious peace of God which they convey."

THE SOUL ITSELF: HOSEA.

But true Christian mysticism does not stop with the outward look; it looks within and finds God in the depths of the soul. The mysticism which looks outward only will be arrested in its development, it will never fully arrive at the goal. It is likely to end in mere wonderment of life, and sad-eyed astonishment at its disharmonies, its cold-blooded cruelties, its base treacheries. One never attains to the rank of a mystic until he looks within.

As the exponent of this more intimate mysticism, passing by the greatest name, I cite you to the prophet Hosea. "One of the first," says James Strahan, in the Expository Times, "he was also one of the noblest of the not very large family of mystics, who dare to make their own thoughts, feelings and actions the norm of divinity." Hosea was one of the greatest religious geniuses which the world has ever produced. It was he who first among men sounded that deepest note in the Christian revelation, God is Love. Hosea recognized this, says Cornill, because he bore love in his own heart, because it was alive in him. Hosea believed that God was love because he was loving. He argued that because his love, once bestowed, put him under eternal obligation, so that he had no option but to forgive and reinstate his erring wife, God, who must be subject to the same holy law, must be equally kind and forgiving. The passion which surged so strong in his own breast could be none other than the divine life in his soul. It did not seem to have an origin within himself. It was of a different quality from the other passions by which his life was controlled. It seemed to be an interruption into his life from another sphere, and in its luminous purity and its fierce intensity he knew it could be none other than God. He judged God by what he found of Him in his own heart, and pronounced Him kind and patient and forgiving. This was the experience to which Jesus referred when He said, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Purity of heart is a positive, not a negative, quality, it is not the mere absence of guile, but a passion for holiness. The soul, in the experience of this passion, recognizes the near approach of the Divine.

FAITH FIRST; REASONS AFTERWARD.

Translated into terms of the intellect, the mystic's position might be stated somewhat as follows: The universe means well because I mean well; the universe is as good as I; it is not only as good as I am, it is as good as I can imagine, and not only as good as I can imagine, but, since my ideals are capable of indefinite, perhaps infinite, growth and development, the universe is infinitely good. That is, God is infinitely good. I am quite prepared to be told that that kind of reasoning does not get us anywhere. I freely grant it; it isn't intended to get us anywhere. It is simply a clumsy attempt to account for the fact that we are already there. The mystic does not reason this out: the faith comes first, the reasons follow.

Huxley's method of reading the universe was similar in method, but stressed a different set of facts. For him, the category of "nature" did not include the thoughts, feelings and impulses of his own inner world. These were of nature, but they were a by-product, so to speak; or they were incidental to the general scheme of things, a mere temporary expedient arising out of the infinite resourcefulness of nature, by which she sought to secure her ends, but which throw no light upon her inner meaning. Red in tooth and claw, nature seemed to him wholly indifferent to moral considerations—not moral nor immoral, but non-moral. The world was a vast shambles; the supreme and only law was the struggle for existence with the survival of the fittest—those fittest to survive in such a struggle—and the inevitable crowding to the wall of the weak. It was a brutal thing, and had no more regard for moral and spiritual values than the frosts of autumn for the flowers. Morality is a fictitious law that man is attempting to impose upon nature in order to guard himself against her brutality. To acquiesce in this cosmic law of struggle for existence and the crushing of the weak is to connive at his own destruction; to run away from it would be worse; his only hope was in combating it. He saw no alternative but to pit the microcosmos against the macrocosmos, hopeless as the outcome might seem. There was hope that, by battling against the universe, man might, for a time, wring from it, unwilling, some morsels of good. It is worth while to note that Maeterlinck, in a striking passage, seems to sympathize somewhat with this view, but with some slight leaning to a more optimistic view.

UNIVERSE ON THE SIDE OF THE HEART.

To the mystic, on the other hand, man's only hope lies in battling WITH the universe. The universe, contrary to all seeming, is on the side of the heart. The law of love, service and sacrifice which asserts itself so imperiously in his own life and which increasingly asserts itself in human society is no mere incident in the cosmic process, no mere expedient, no mere decoy; it is of the very essence of the process itself, and the goal towards which it tends. His inner world is for him the revelation of the inner meaning of the universe. Putting these two readings of the universe side by side, we might say that, to Huxley, the universe means: Every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost! But that to the mystic it means: Every man for the hindmost and the devil take the man that is for himself! Or, putting it another way, we might ask, What are we to take as the moral exponent of the world—the spider sucking the life blood of a fly? the cat wild with joy over the paroxysms of a mouse? Or the mother suffering for her child? or Socrates drinking the hemlock? or Jesus on the rood? Huxley chose the former—for him the heart of the spider was the heart of the universe. To the mystic, his own heart, with all its benevolent impulses, is the heart of the universe. The heart of Jesus is the moral exponent of the universe!

NOT A LOGICAL PROOF.

This conclusion is not arrived at by logical processes; there are no premises from which such a conclusion can be deduced. It is MYSTICAL KNOWLEDGE. The mystic simply knows that it cannot be otherwise in a universe that has produced HIM. Your scientist and your philosopher may characterize this as naive egoism, but the mystic will continue to be a mystic.

Was not this Jesus' way? His doctrine of God was simply transcribed out of his own heart. He found God, not in the struggle for existence and the pitiless crushing of the weak, but in his own heart's pity for the weak and erring. He knew that his compassion for the lost struck a chord that vibrated throughout the universe, and his sensitive ear caught the music of her sympathetic response. MEN might fail to sympathize with him in this passion, but the UNIVERSE did not fail—there is joy in heaven, at least, over the finding of a lost soul! That, Bruce tells us, was Jesus' apology for loving the lost. That compassion which he found in his own soul was for him the very innermost meaning of things. We do not have to fight against the stars, but with them—the stars are on our side. And so he taught us the mystical way of solving the "riddle of the universe"—"If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask Him?"

AN INNER VOICE.

Mysticism is thus seen to be a voice, silent, clear, unobtrusive, final, speaking in the depths of the soul, and saying, I AM THY GOD!

But the question will be asked, "Is there a philosophical basis for mysticism?" Mysticism has existed in the past without giving reasons for itself. Light is one of the oldest of the phenomena of the universe, but it is only recently that it has been able to give any scientific account of itself. Yet no one ever thought of doubting or denying light. Mysticism is not only possible today to men of the modern mind, it is inevitable. The mystical aspect of life simply refuses to be ignored. Philosophy has at last abandoned its opposition. Science is beginning to recognize its own limitations and to concede the possibility of existences which give no reaction to the laboratory test: science and mysticism are found to represent opposite sides of truth; they are complimentary and mutually corrective. Our knowledge is not all mediated by the intellect. This has always been known, but its deep significance is only beginning to be recognized. The recognition of the validity of mystical knowledge is simply a matter of a better psychology.

BERGSON'S CONTRIBUTION.

The most notable contribution to the subject in our day has been made by Henri Bergson, of Paris, who in differentiating between the various forms of consciousness and defining their respective functions and limitations, has prepared the way for a new science of mysticism, and the bringing to an end of the long warfare between the intellect and the heart. The intellect, he tells us,—and he is here uttering a commonplace of philosophy—is but one of, perhaps, many forms of consciousness, and it has its distinct function and its definite limitations. It has to do only with the world of matter; it is the instrument by which man is to conquer the physical forces of the world. It is quite at home in geometry, and in logic which is so closely allied to geometry. The instinct is another and essentially different form of consciousness, with, likewise, a distinct function and definite limitations. As the intellect can only "think matter," so the instinct can only "think life." The instinct has the higher function. The intuition has its basis in instinct.

INTUITION AND INSTINCT.

Bergson defines the intuition as instinct enlarged and purified, instinct that has become disinterested, self-conscious, capable of reflecting upon its object and of enlarging it indefinitely. But this faculty in man is but little developed: Consciousness, in man, is preeminently intellect. And again, intuition in man is almost completely sacrificed to intellect. Again he remarks, intuition is there, however, but vague, and, above all, discontinuous. It is a lamp almost extinguished, which only glimmers now and then, for a few moments at most. In these circumstances the intellect has sought to discharge the function of the intuition, and here is where all our difficulty has arisen: The intellect, regarding itself as competent in every field, and failing to find in man a soul or in the universe a God, proceeds forthwith to deny the existence of those entities, and to declare that we must be agnostic! On these matters the intuition alone is competent to speak.

On our personality, on our liberty, on the place we occupy in the whole of nature, on our origin, and perhaps also on our destiny, it throws a light feeble and vacillating, but

Mysticism Not the Essence of Religion

A Review and Critique of Mr. Todd's Article

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES.

MR. TODD'S paper is well written and expresses an earnest, yearning search after the nature of mysticism and its bearing upon the message of the pulpit. One hesitates to criticize a paper of this spirit and practical import. Everyone will agree that the pulpit needs new vitality and a new grip upon man's conscience and conduct. It will be understood, therefore, that any criticisms here presented are accompanied by genuine appreciation of the author's attitude and a real sympathy with the endeavor to find the sources of greater vitality for the work of the preacher.

I cannot agree with the paper that mysticism is the essence of religion, nor that the power of great preachers, like R. J. Campbell, is due to it. I shall first point out some of the difficulties and inconsistencies in mysticism and then endeavor to show where the power of such preachers lies.

SOME INCONSISTENCIES NOTED.

The paper itself bears the marks of the indefiniteness characteristic of the term mysticism. This word is one of the vaguest and most shifting in our language. For example, the paper asserts that all religion is mystical, yet admits that some of the best men in the world are incapable of the mystical experience. The inference would be, that since all religion is mystical, and some men are incapable of mystical experience, these men are incapable of being religious. It is doubtful whether the author of the paper meant to commit himself to such a conclusion. Again, having said in one connection that all religion is mystical, he says in another that the amount of mystical preaching is almost infinitesimal. This also is a strange predicament. It appears to mean that of all the preaching which the world endures, scarcely any of it is religious. One wonders what it really is, then. Such a judgment would seem to question the sanity of the vast majority of preachers, or else to make religion an exceedingly elusive thing. For myself, I am unable to accept either alternative.

Another favorite plea for mysticism is that it rests upon the inner, subjective experience of the soul. The mystic looks within. As the writer says: "One never attains to the rank of the mystic until he looks within," but in another connection he says: "Let a man throw himself heart and soul into some great task of human uplift and he does not need to be told by the poet that there is a power not ourselves that makes for righteousness. He finds himself gripped by that power, and borne along by it and made its instrument."

IS THE MYSTIC "ASSURED" OF GOD?

I should quite agree that this participation in some great task of human uplift is the proper means of gaining a deep and vital experience of religion, but this is not mysticism. The same inconsistency appears in the identification of friendship with the mystical experience. The very essence of friendship is its social attitude, its objectification of one's interests. The satisfaction of friendship lies precisely in the fact that one is forgetting himself in the activity of other people, and in his devotion to their interests and needs. While it does bring one to a clearer consciousness of one's self, the focus of interest is not subjective, but objective, and external to the self.

Another set of statements concerns the mystic's assurance of God. It is the common claim of the mystic, which our paper reiterates, that he of all persons is sure of God. While others waver and doubt, speculate and aspire, the mystic alone lays hold upon the divine reality. A study of the literature of mysticism, however, reveals the fact that this is only partially true. As a matter of fact, this sense of complete union with God is attained only occasionally and then for a brief interval by the mystic. A far greater portion of his time and energy is expended in the struggle to attain this communion. There is usually a pathetic, even tragic, effort to find peace in the presence of God. The most devout of the mystics are constantly liable to doubts, bewilderments and disappointments. They wander in what they themselves call the dark night of the soul. They sink into the abysmal depths. They torture themselves in hair-shirts and on beds of spikes with fastings and vigils to remove the last element of carnality and self-interest. Or if actual ascetic practices are not employed, devotional exercises, meditation, and spiritual flagellations are cultivated.

LITTLE REAL HELP FROM BERGSON.

The writer of the paper makes much of this alleged certainty of God. He says there is only one way to be sure of God and that is the mystic's way. But later on, after the fashion of our time, he attempts to gain support for the mystical view of life from the philosopher, Bergson. He cites Bergson's distinction between intellect and instinct. Bergson holds that the intellect gives us scientific explanation in terms of external, spatial relations. But this he regards as only one expression of reality and a very partial and limited expression. In contrast to this, instinct, in its highest form rising to intuition, yields a more immediate and direct experience of reality. Much has been made of this distinction of the great French philosopher, especially by those who feel that science is inimical, or at least foreign, to religion. Many have seized upon this distinction to reassert the claims of mysticism and to insist that there are more direct and efficacious means of finding God than those of our ordinary, intelligible experience. This our writer evidently also attempts to do.

It must, however, have been rather disappointing to him to find such poor comfort as that contained in the quotations which he makes. The most of which he is able to quote from Bergson is that intuition in man is but vague, and above all discontinuous. It is a lamp almost extinguished, which only glimmers now and then for a few moments at most. The exact words quoted from Bergson are following:

> On our personality, on our liberty, on the place we occupy in the whole of nature, on our origin, and perhaps also on our destiny, it throws a light feeble and vacillating, but which none the less pierces the darkness of the night in which the intellect leaves us.

Strangely enough, Mr. Todd considers this slight admission as almost a complete justification for the claim of mysticism. He says, after quoting this reference to the feeble and vacillating light: "Here, then, by one of the greatest of living thinkers, we have laid, broad and sure, the philosophical basis of mysticism." So far as Bergson's quoted words would indicate, there is here no basis of of any kind, much less one "broad and sure."

The attitude of mysticism in its assertion of the direct knowledge of God apart from all ordinary experience is subject to a common and deadly fallacy. It is the fallacy of assuming that the universal may be known apart from the particulars. It is the attempt to get the whole without the parts. It is like trying to think of society aside from persons, or of a class apart from pupils. Hegel illustrated this fallacy of trying to grasp a universal apart from particulars by saying that it was as if a man at table declined all offers of oranges, grapes, figs, and the rest, insisting that what he wanted was fruit.

WHERE IS GOD TO BE FOUND?

In the writings of the mystics this fallacy appears in their attempts to find God apart from all concrete experience. It is their constant contention that he is not to be found in the world of our intelligible relations. We cannot employ our intellects nor any form of scientific knowledge. We must deny these and transcend them by the use of some other "faculty." Psychology, however, has never been able to locate such a faculty. The tendency among more cautious writers, such as the author of the paper under consideration, is to use the term "feeling" or "intuition." There is, however, no psychological justification for the use of instinct or intuition or feeling as if it were something psychologically distinct from knowledge. The only advantage for the mystic in the use of these terms is their vagueness and his disposition to use them without careful psychological analysis or definition.

The fact is that no man has seen God at any time apart from the world of nature and of human society. It is probable that those who have asserted their direct experience of God apart from society and natural phenomena have really experienced communion with their own subconscious, ideal self. Such an experience is nothing to be discredited but neither is it anything to be treated as a unique mystery or a special revelation of God. Many modern works on the subconscious and on mysticism could be cited in support of this position.

It is my profound conviction that all the phenomena which go under the name of mysticism may be much more adequately explained from quite another point of view. This other point of view makes the whole process of religion much more easily understood and therefore much more susceptible of cultivation and development. It is utterly hopeless to expect to enhance the power of the ministry in our practical and scientific age by a resort to anything which smacks of occultism or of sheer mystery. I think it can be shown that those half-truths which appear to give support to mysticism are much more consistent with quite a different interpretation of life. I shall even venture to take from the paper under review various propositions which it employs and to show that they are better suited to a system very different from that in whose behalf they are there employed. Such a statement may be regarded as an attempt to present a constructive criticism of the paper by means of another and, to me, more adequate conception of religion. I hope it will become more apparent, also, how the alleged mystical experiences occur, and how any values which they possess may be made available for every earnest preacher and religious worker.

THE DEEPEST FACT IN RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE

I. The author of the paper in a sentence which I have already quoted, says: "Let a man throw himself heart and soul into some great task of human uplift and he does not need to be told by the poet that there is a power not ourselves that makes for righteousness. He finds himself gripped by that power and borne along by it and made its instrument." Now this I regard as an expression of the deepest and most determining fact in religious experience. All religion in its vital expression is devotion to some great task. It is the attempt to build the kingdom of God, to create an ideal social order, to make of one family all the people of the earth. That was the dream of the ancient prophets, that was the mission of Jesus, that has been the ideal of all Christian reformers and missionaries. It is in this sense that the author is justified in saying that religion is a matter of will. It is an act, a deed, an achievement.

RELIGION A SOCIAL TASK.

II. In the nature of the case, this task of religion which challenges our wills is a social task. It involves the co-operation of many minds and hearts. In its actual development, persons are associated together in local groups or churches and in larger organizations in order to combine their strength, to provide mutual help for one another, and to prosecute, by every resource of their combined talents and power, the common cause. This actual companionship in service not only furthers the general institutional enterprise, but it reacts upon and fashions the minds of the individuals participating. And when a cause like Christianity extends over many centuries, the sense of companionship includes men and women of the distant past as well as of the immediate present. The associations of our imaginations include Jesus and Peter and Paul and Augustine and Luther and a host of others known to us only through the imagination. When, therefore, we sit together in our places of worship, we are conscious of a great cloud of encompassing witnesses. There is a sense of presence immediate and pervasive. It is, indeed, quite indescribable, but we feel it to be persuasive, elevating and comforting. Highly socialized persons, as all deeply religious persons are, easily extend this social attitude even to nature.

THOREAU AT WALDEN POND.

This is the real secret of the experience at Walden Pond. It was a highly socialized mind which sought that solitude. The seemingly lonely dweller in the forest really had the companionship of the people and society out of which he had come. Lacking their actual presence, the trees and stones and various objects of nature took the place of actual human beings in his feeling. It was on this account that he could say: "Every little pine needle expanded and swelled with sympathy and befriended me." Mr. Todd is quite right in taking this to be a characteristic occurrence in what he calls mysticism. Truly, as he says: "It is the perception of a companionable personality." My contention is, however, that this companionable personality can be accounted for in terms of the organized social consciousness of Thoreau. It has, indeed, for Thoreau, all the value which the paper assigns to it. It was a friendly presence with which he could commune, which kept him from loneliness, and toward which he had a sense of certainty and assurance.

This sense of presence is naturally still more real in the City Temple, under the leadership of the fascinating personality of R. J. Campbell. I have sat there myself and felt the spell of it. I have also had the same experience during the observances of the communion service in a little village chapel in the hills of Texas. There is, of course, a richer environment in the great city congregation with its refinement of form and speech, but there is no greater sincerity and urgency and consciousness of God. In both situations it is really the great historic enterprise of the church in its effort to redeem humanity and the consciousness of the endeavor to be comrades with Christ in His spiritual kingdom which enable one to transcend the things of the moment and of mere outward conditions in the sense of an infinite task and of union with the Eternal.

PIETY DEVELOPED BY WORKS.

III. The sources of power for the minister are not so far to seek when one regards the whole matter in this way. What he really needs is an intimate acquaintance with the efforts which have been made to build this kingdom of God upon the earth. He needs the guidance and inspiration of the great souls who have wrought at it. This takes him into a study of the Scriptures, and of history and of the social sciences. He needs also to realize the particular problems which are involved in making this heavenly kingdom, this divine social order, actual among the flesh-and-blood human beings of his church and neighborhood. These are matters in which the modern scientist may help him amazingly. They are not matters in which any degree of pious devotion can help him much without learning and practical wisdom.

But any minister who conscientiously endeavors to direct the energies of his congregation toward fulfillment of this ideal of the kingdom of God upon earth will find his own and his people's piety and faith and good works greatly developed. Often the great difficulty with churches is that they do not succeed in making themselves conscious of the relation between the great historic spiritual kingdom of God and their immediate activities. If they could perceive more clearly that the care of the fatherless and the widows is a definite means of fulfilling the kingdom of God, they would not doubt that such work is religious. They would be able to see that the teaching of little children in the public school as well as in the Sunday-school is a means of bringing the vast, incalculable values of life into the definite experience of these little ones. Many people are best able to realize this essential task of religion most clearly through foreign missionary activities. When a man goes into the heart of Africa or China, to establish a Christian church, it is obvious that he must embody his mighty ideal purpose in very concrete and often menial acts. Neither he nor the churches at home have any doubt that the cure of the sick, the establishment of schools, or even the introduction of scientific agriculture, are thoroughly religious and Christian. Moreover, it is in doing precisely these things that the missionary has a sense of the presence of God and of communion with the Infinite.

AN OVERSOUL IN A CHURCH DINNER!

It is also exceedingly desirable that religious workers at home in their familiar round of churchly and community enterprises should realize that they also serve God and help to bring in His kingdom. They, too, may have this sense of presence, and they may achieve it through what may seem to be very simple and matter-of-fact activities. It is not drawing entirely upon one's imagination or upon false sentiment, to say that when a church undertakes to build a new house of worship, it is apt to find itself awakened to a new interest, to a quicker sense of comradeship, and to a play of the imagination with reference to the new and greater things which the church will be able to accomplish with its better equipment. Something of this sense of an oversoul and of a mysterious horizon may even be found in connection with a church dinner. The persons present may not talk of it or think of it in specific relation to religious ideals, but there is a sense of this larger meaning derived from the atmosphere of the place itself and from the co-operation of the particular persons engaged in it. The slightest reflection or inquiry brings to the surface the general purpose of the society or institution under whose auspices the event occurs. Some individuals are more conscious of this larger reference than others, and they are more capable of expressing it. In those who are most sensitive and responsive, what is called the mystical experience is most common and easily attained.

THE PREACHER'S WAY TO POWER.

The power of the preacher depends upon his ability to direct the activities of the

An Interview With Count Okuma

A Visit to the Home of Japan's Oldest Statesman and Latest Premier.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

REPORTS that have come during the week from Japan to the effect that a new ministry has been formed, with the veteran statesman, Count Okuma, at its head, recall an interesting visit made to the city residence of this most interesting Japanese leader during our stay in Tokyo last year. The Count is almost eighty years of age, about as old as was Mr. Gladstone when he became Prime Minister for the third and last time. He has for several years kept himself out of active politics, preferring to occupy the position of an official leader of the more progressive elements of the nation. He has therefore maintained an active correspondence with men of affairs in Europe and America, and has written continually for his own journals, Shin Nihon (New Japan), and Tai Yo (The Sun Magazine). He is always glad to meet men of other nations and discuss with them modern questions.

THE PREMIER'S HOME.

When he learned that we were in Tokyo he was kind enough to send an invitation through Prof. A. W. Place, of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, asking our party to visit him at his home in the suburbs of the city. It is situated close to the campus of Waseda University, an institution over which the Count has watched with a paternal care as devoted as that which Jefferson gave to the University of Virginia. We took 'rikshas accordingly one afternoon, and after a long ride through interesting parts of the city we reached the grounds and were received by one of the members of Count Okuma's household. The residence is a combination of palace and country villa, set in spacious and beautifully ornate grounds. Trees, hedges, flowering plants and a great variety of flowers in bloom gave it typical Japanese attractiveness.

We were ushered in through a wide hall to a large reception room and perceived that this part of the house was arranged in European style. We learned later that the living apartments are planned and furnished on the Japanese order. The servants who received us bade us make ourselves at home, and we had a little time to look about the handsome apartment with its substantial occidental furniture and its paintings, banners and other decorations on the wall, particularly the kakimonos or painted scrolls which are so common a feature of Japanese household decoration.

Presently Count Okuma came in, walking with some difficulty, which reminded us that his leg was shattered by a dynamite bomb flung by a misguided native during the excitement about treaty revision while the Count was foreign minister in 1889. He wore the native Japanese costume, which as belonging to an older generation he prefers. Count Okuma is taller than the average of his countrymen. He has a large, clean shaven face and high forehead. His close-cropped hair is very white. His features are strong and determined, yet kindly. He welcomed us with cordiality as we rose to meet him on his entrance, and shook hands with every one of the party. Beside the members of our own Mission Study Travel Class, numbering seven at that time, we had with us Mr. and Mrs. Place and Professor Benninghoff, of the Baptist educational mission in Tokyo. After each member of the party was introduced, the Count asked us to be seated and refreshments consisting of tea and cakes were served.

IN TOUCH WITH THE TIMES.

The conversation that followed was interpreted by Count Okuma's secretary, a Japanese gentleman of exceptionally scholarly bearing and abilities. The Count is a good talker, and knowing that some of his visitors were acquainted with the Japanese language, he felt more free to talk at length upon a number of matters on which his opinion was asked. But the secretary, with unfailing accuracy and apparently deep personal interest, followed his words and turned them into almost classic English.

We asked him how it was that one whose active political life lay so far in the past should exert himself so eagerly to keep informed regarding all the events of the times and their bearing on public affairs. We assured him that we felt that this was the only reason we had been invited to visit a man on whose interest we had no personal claim.

A REMARKABLE CAREER.

He replied that he regarded himself as a representative of the Meiji era, the reign of the late emperor, but that he felt that it was a public duty to watch with attention the current events, both in Japan and in the rest of the world, in order to be able to render at any time such assistance to his countrymen as he might be able to do.

We asked him if he thought it likely that he would resume active public life again. He responded with a whimsical smile that he was not especially in favor any longer, belonging to neither of the rival clans of Satsuma or Chosiu, and that perhaps it was of as much service to the state for him to remain an independent commentator upon, and critic of, public policies.

We could understand the force of this remark, though it was difficult to realize that the political life of the Count extended over so many years. He was already minister of finance in 1869, holding that office for the following twelve years. At the time he came into office the country was just emerging from the civil war which decided the triumph of the Mikado over the Shogun. In his official capacity he was compelled, with his colleagues, to meet the cost of the civil war, the expenses of a new system of government, the necessary outlay for schools and colleges, the budget for a new army and navy, and the debts incurred by the extravagance of the Shoguns and the misgovernment of the Daimios, or feudal lords of several of the provinces. It was chiefly due to Count Okuma's financial statesmanship that these problems were successfully solved.

LEADS PROGRESSIVE PARTY.

Again in 1889 he was minister of foreign affairs. It was at this time that he suffered the injury already mentioned. He was the inaugurator of party government in Japan, and it was as leader of the Progressive party that he again joined the ministry in 1896, and was Prime Minister for a few months in 1898. For the last sixteen years he has not held office, though he continued to lead the Progressives until 1907.

One of the most interesting features of Count Okuma's career is the cleanness and dignity of his personal life. In a time when most of the Japanese leaders have practiced concubinage and worse forms of immorality, Count Okuma's domestic life has been exemplary and above reproach. Beyond all other factors in his present recall to high office will be the moral influence of his character upon the life of young Japan. The missionaries have found it difficult to enforce the principles of the clean life among the youth of Japan in the face of evil examples in high official circles. If Count Okuma is permitted to hold his office for a considerable period, the significance

EDITORIAL

TO THE MINORITY.

A FEW of our readers will open their Christian Century this week and say to themselves: Those two long articles by Rev. Mr. Todd and Professor Ames may be good, but they're too long for me to hope to master them."

Do not let yourself believe that! The editor is aware that an unusually large proportion of space has been given to the treatment of one subject, but this one subject is a little bit the most vital that has found treatment on our pages in many a day.

And what is more, there are no two men in America more capable of representing the two points of view involved in the discussion than Mr. Todd and Doctor Ames. The latter has become perhaps the most authoritative interpreter of religion in terms of modern scientific method among American scholars. The former brings to his subject just the appropriate temperament and quality of soul, and a mind richly laden with poetry, philosophy, and the love of mysticism. From the standpoint of its composition and subject-matter, quite aside from the validity of its argument, The Christian Century considers Mr. Todd's paper the most significant single contribution ever presented to a congress of Disciples.

And Doctor Ames' criticism is so frontal, so direct and so manifestly conscious of having talked on this subject before, that merely as a piece of sword-play between giants it is fascinating.

But it is not sword-play. It is the clash of two conceptions of religion and of God. The majority of our readers will sense the importance of the articles and take license to read and reread them. This word is written for the minority who may be tempted not to do so.

THERE WAS NO WOMAN IN IT.

WE have recently observed Mothers' Day. We wish to present a thought that may be new to you. This is a bi-sexual world, and not a little of the trouble of the world is due to that fact. There are those who assume that this fact accounts for pretty nearly everything; and there are those who blame one or the other sex for considerably more than half of the mischief which this division has brought into life. For the most part, we have no slightest sympathy with this tendency, for we hold that while either sex can degrade the other, it can do so only by its own degradation, and that whatever is done by way of elevating the morals of the world must apply justly and reasonably to both sexes.

If there were no sex there would be no motherhood, and we should not be wearing white carnations on Mothers' Day. Since Mothers' Day is just past, we are disposed to say some things that may justly be said in praise of good women. Let us say one thing that is not only true in itself, but something which gives the lie to at least one time honored slander, and something highly to the honor of womanhood.

The greatest crime of the centuries was the murder of Jesus Christ, and no woman had any share in it. It was a crime that involved so many men and so many motives that it has been referred to as embracing in itself every other crime and sin, and many a sermon has shown how pride, avarice, religious bigotry, political dishonesty, cowardice, treachery and a multitude of other sins had their complete disclosure and example in this great crime. Yes, and from beginning to end there was not a woman in it.

Think how different it was with the murder of John the Baptist. There were adultery and divorce and feminine spite, and wounded vanity, and stealth, and cat-like revenge, and in the end a prophet's head on a charger presented by a king to a dancing girl and a harlot. But when the sin of the centuries gathered itself into one mighty and world-memorable act, there was no woman in it, nor any motive growing out of sex. It was wholly and exclusively an affair of men. Pilate, the wicked ruler, and Caiaphas, the priest, and Judas, the traitor, and Peter, the coward, all were men, and so were the soldiers who crucified Him and the mob that derided Him. Mary, his mother, and Mary of Magdala, and the sisters of Lazarus and the women from Galilee, and the women of Jerusalem who followed him weeping, and even Pilate's wife, were all on his side.

Men murdered Jesus, the Son of God.

In the tragedy of the centuries every woman whose name appears comes out with signal honor.

This greatest of all human crimes is one that men alone must bear.

The story is of the very highest value to our analysis of the motives which underlie good and evil.

It shows us that the novelists and the actors and the moralists and the cheap wits have been only partly right.

There may be a great wrong with no question of sex involved. Jesus died on the cross, and no woman drove a nail into His cross or put a thorn into His crown.

For this, at least, let us hold womanhood in honor. The sin of the world is pretty evenly divided between the sexes. But this thing happened, and there was no woman in it.

The sin, the shame, the stubbornness, the cruelty, the blunder of the crucifixion, belong wholly to men.

May God have mercy on them.

Something wonderfully good in woman kept her wholly out of that awful tragedy.

THE DEATH OF SYLVESTER HORNE.

THE news of the instantaneous death of Rev. Sylvester Horne, who dropped dead at his wife's feet in Toronto last Sunday week, will sadden both Britain and America. He was one of the ablest and noblest of the world's preachers, loved and honored in America almost as much as in England. He was one of the most noted of the speakers at the Anglo-American Conference on Christian unity, and has occasionally visited America. His recent addresses in Yale have made a profound impression. For several years he has been a member of Parliament, there representing at its best the nonconformist conscience. Faithfully he did that work as a citizen, but his great work, and his heart, were in the ministry. A great man has fallen in Israel.

THE SLAUGHTER OF THOSE LESS INNOCENT.

WE easily rouse ourselves to action against the needless destruction of child life from preventable diseases. But there is one department of life where murder goes on increasingly, and with very little to check it. Men in middle life are dying of preventable causes. Diseases of the kidneys and arteries and of the heart aren't diminishing, and they owe the excess of their prevalence among men largely to smoking and over-eating. We do not always agree with Senator Tillman, but it was a word worth heeding which he spoke in the Senate chamber in requesting that the use of tobacco be lessened there. He said:

"I owe what degree of recovery I have made (and I am constantly being told that I look a great deal better, and I know it is so) to will power and self-control in eating: the will power to exercise my muscles and nerves sufficiently to give them tone and to keep the rust out of the joints. But the greatest help to my health arises from self-control, which enables me to keep from eating things I should not eat.

"No wonder, as I look around the chamber and see the changes that have come and miss the many old familiar faces of friends who are dead, that I feel as though I were serving with ghosts as well as with living men. There is no doubt in the world in my mind that this great mortality among us is due to the way in which we live in Washington. There is a continuous succession of banquets, dinners, and receptions

Automobiles and street cars are used by Senators instead of walking, and pure air and sunshine are things of which we get too little. A fitting epitaph for most of the Senators who have died in service would be, 'He lived not wisely but too well, and killed himself eating.' ''

A good word, Mr. Tillman. Go at them again with your pitchfork.

DO WE WANT MORE TERRITORY?

WE SAY we do not, and are sincere. So were we sincere when we went into the war with Spain, and we lifted clean hands to heaven and declared that we did not want a foot of Spanish territory. All the time we were thinking about Cuba, and we kept our promises there. But the Philippines came, too, and we have them, and with them we have bought innumerable problems to vex us for a hundred years, and we are not yet done with Cuba. Kipling wrote prophetic words when he admonished us to "take up the white man's burden." We have it, and we grow less and less confident about when we can set any part of it down. We say with pride that our wars have not been wars of conquest, nor for the acquisition of territory; but how did we get Texas and California? If we get into Mexico with a conquering army we shall not easily get out. We shall be in the position of the hunter who needed help to let go of the bear. And the help will not be forthcoming. There will be no one to help us. We shall have a task of conquest on our hands that will cost us blood and heartache. Let us be careful about war talk, and pray for an honorable peace. Let us be sure that we are not egged on by loud-mouthed politicians or by covetous capitalists, and that no hunger for the horizon lies behind our patriotism.

DON'T FIGHT YOUR OWN SIDE.

IN the great Civil War it happened more than once that destructive volleys were fired not against the enemy, but against bodies of troops on the same side.

The losses of war are so increased by this pitiful and profitless slaughter from the rear. For it is often the men in the very front thus slain by detachments so far behind that they looked only for the enemy in front of them, and so slew the bravest of their friends. Thus Stonewall Jackson fell at the hands of those who had most to lose by his death. There are extant autograph letters of Earl Percy more than hinting that the disproportionate loss of officers on the British side at Bunker Hill was not wholly due to the bullets of the embattled farmers behind the rail fence and hastily constructed parapet. If we must needs fight, let us fight bad men, and bad measures; not good men, even though misguided. Surely there can be nothing that could cause more glee to Satan than to see Christians fighting each other. Let those who hate righteousness fight and contend, but not the servants of Christ.

THE PERVERSION OF CHARITY.

IT BECOMES increasingly necessary to distinguish between charities and so-called charities. An investigation now in progress in Chicago reveals the fact that not a few alleged charitable organizations are really institutions of graft. The concern undergoing investigation by a committee of the Illinois legislature is known as the Samaritan Army, and it is one of several societies with a quasi military organization and a door-to-door begging method.

"Generals," "colonels," "majors" and "captains"—chieftains of innumerable "armies"—attended the sessions of the joint committee.

The dignitaries did not go for conquest nor for the joy of going. They went in response to subpoenas.

The following examination is typical of the verbal warfare which characterized the sessions:

The Committeeman asked: "What is the total, general, of your organization's collections for charity?"

General Edward Collins replied: "Five hundred and ninety-seven dollars for nineteen weeks."

Committeeman: "How much of that went to charity and how much represented salaries, maintenance and other expense?"

General Collins: "Eight dollars and forty-five cents went to charity."

"General" Collins' "army" was one of many charitable organizations whose methods have been under the scrutiny of investigators for the committee. Among the others were the Gospel Army, the Redeemers' Army, the Lord's Army and the Volunteer Slum Army.

The purpose of the hearings, according to Representative Charles Curran, chairman, is to determine the extent of crimes committed in the name of charity.

Testimony revealed three failings which, according to members of the committee, the majority of organizations investigated held in common:

Laxity in keeping of records.

Administrative expense out of proportion to the actual charity administered.

Irresponsibility of officials.

Give, but investigate your charities.

ONE REASON THE DANCE IS POPULAR.

WE CLIP the following from a syndicated account of a children's ball. If it has value as a news item, we are glad to be abreast of the times; but that is not the chief reason for our printing it: "Next to the costumes the most poignant impression was the fact that games were not played. The mothers and the hostess were spared this trouble. The height or the depth to which the dancing mania has gone was well evidenced here. And oh, the endless mental fatigue it saves a mother; and to judge from the bored and sleepy expressions on the faces of the children who are being led around in the intricacies of games, they are not partial either to this traditional form of amusement. So, on with the dance, is the cry of the mother.

"Many of the youngsters danced admirably; others knew nothing of it, but the mere tumbling around with each other delighted them. There were a few who were such adepts, children of eight years old, that they danced alone on a square of carpet to amuse the guests."

Here, all unconsciously, is one reason given why the dance is now so popular. It saves shallow-minded hostesses and mothers who are fatigued because of having too little to do from any necessity of vexing their rather feeble minds with the invention of games for guests. These games for children have stimulated them to mental ingenuity and alertness of mind. The education of their heels will save the heads of their mothers, but will it permanently benefit the children? Or will they be as easily fatigued as these idle and pleasure-loving women who hail the dance with relief because it puts on them no mental strain?

THE POET'S PRAYER.

Almighty Father! let thy lowly child,
Strong in his love of truth, be wisely bold,—
A patriot bard, by sycophants reviled,
Let him live, usefully, and not die old!
Let poor men's children, pleased to read his lays,
Love, for his sake, the scenes where he hath been,
And when he ends his pilgrimage of days,
Let him be buried where the grass is green,
Where daisies, blooming earliest, linger late
To hear the bee his busy note prolong,
There let him slumber, and in peace await
The dawning morning, far from the sensual throng,
Who scorn the windflower's blush, the redbreast's lonely song.

The Larger Christian World

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Dr. Mathews Flays Church's Methods.

"Frivolous," "hysterical," "cheap" and "vulgar" are the terms applied to the crowd-gathering methods of many Christian ministers, in an editorial entitled "Entertaining People Into the Kingdom of God" in the current number of the Biblical World. It was written by Dean Shailer Mathews of the University of Chicago. Doctor Mathews concedes that amusement is legitimate, and that a church must furnish rational amusements to offset the baser forms which are being exploited especially in the larger cities, for purely commercial purposes. "But is entertainment the real function of the church?" asks Dr. Mathews. "If such were the case the church already is outgrown. It cannot compete with commercialized amusements or with municipal playgrounds. It will be outgrown rightfully, for it will have ceased to do the thing which as a church it ought to do: bring men and God together for the salvation of men. Truth need not be deadened in order that it may find one's conscience, but a church crowded with people who want to be entertained is a poor recruiting ground for the army of the Lord. Better twelve men who are ready to die for their Master than four thousand who come to Him for free lunches. Seriousness and gentleness, candor and fraternity, solace and inspiration —these are some of the characteristics of a genuine religion. To doubt their power and to seek crowds by cajolery, by appeal to that which is frivolous, hysterical, cheap and vulgar, is to publish a lack of faith in the gospel of the kingdom—love, joy and peace in the Holy Spirit."

Reform Body Fights Mormonism.

In company with Dr. Robert F. Coyle of Denver and former Senator Frank J. Cannon, James S. Martin, superintendent of the National Reform Association, has been holding a successful series of mass meetings in fifty of the larger cities of the eastern half of the country. These meetings have been attended by more than fifty thousand people, many thousands of others having been reached through the attendant publicity in the daily press. The crusade is directed against the teaching and practice of polygamy of the Mormon church and the criminal and treasonable teachings of this Mohammedan Empire, and has for its immediate object the securing of the passage of the Gillett Anti-Polygamy amendment now pending in Congress, to bring back the Mormon hierarchy under federal control and compel it as hitherto to obey the laws of the country.

Irish Evangelist Asks Dry Chicago.

Mayor Harrison was urged to take a stand for a "dry Chicago" in a resolution adopted at the farewell meeting of "Catch-My-Pal" Patterson last week in the First Methodist Church, Chicago. Rev. Philip Yarrow, president of the Young People's Civic League, under whose auspices the meeting was held, announced that 3,000 men and women had pledged themselves to become workers for temperance at the meetings conducted in Chicago by Mr. Patterson. The resolution adopted was as follows: Whereas, if the present Mayor of Chicago will step out on the side of a saloonless city and use his great influence to make Chicago dry his city would become the most remarkable one in the world; we therefore, in mass meeting assembled at the First Methodist Episcopal Church, do hereby unanimously request his honor, the mayor, to consider seriously the proposition of taking his stand for a dry Chicago, believing that in thus allying himself with this movement he will prove himself to be one of the greatest benefactors Chicago has seen.

Brooklyn Pushes City Missions.

The Undenominational City Mission Society of Brooklyn, N. Y., is undertaking a special work for the sailors, 390,000 of whom come ashore in Brooklyn every year. It will conduct a reform department, which will provide chaplains for all courts, jails, prisons, and reformatories; a rescue department through which a thoroughgoing work will be carried on for the "down and outs" and for the submerged tenth. A cosmopolitan department will provide church settlements for the foreigners. Another department will provide outdoor preaching in all parts of Brooklyn, establish homes for working girls, fresh-air homes for children, provide nurses for the indigent sick, conduct shop and other sorts of meetings for the unchurched. The society will also conduct a civic morals department and an educational department and publish a magazine.

The Way to Unity.

In a recent number of the Constructive Quarterly, Charles E. Jefferson, of New York, has something to say concerning the way by which Christian work may be brought about. We quote in part: "Men are saved from many a littleness and traditional slavery by looking away from themselves. So long as they fix their attention on themselves, they accentuate the distempers from which they suffer. If two men are estranged, the surest road to reconciliation is not through a patient investigation of all the quarrels of the past, but along the highway of a common enterprise which lays hold on the future. The binding power of responsibility is one of the factors ordained of God in the development of human-kind. Getting under a common load is a sure way of keeping step with those who carry it. Why should we not expect just such results if the various branches of the universal church should some day agree to enter upon a world-wide campaign for the overthrow of one colossal world-evil, or for the coronation of some particular Christian principle in the policies of the nations of the world?"

From the Watchman-Examiner:

"Can your pastor live decently on the salary that he gets? There is a psychology in this matter. How can you expect your pastor to be a 'radiant' man when he lacks what is essential to a man of culture and refinement? He must have a comfortable home, plenty of books, clothes of good quality, and a dollar or two in his pocket if he is to be at his best. Force a man to look 'seedy' and he will soon feel 'seedy.' See to it that your pastor gets as much from the church of which you are a member as you spend on your chauffeur and the upkeep of your automobile, and you know envy is a sin."

Church Losing, Congregationalists Say.

Stronger support from members of Congregational churches of Chicago was asked last month by speakers at the annual meeting of the Chicago Congregational Association. Several pastors gave illustrations of the way the Congregational church is losing ground in Chicago and asked for stronger support, financially and otherwise. "We are not keeping up with the growth of Chicago," Rev. J. R. Nichols, pastor of the Rogers Park Congregational church, said, "and our membership is decreasing instead of gaining. The City Missionary society had to aid thirty-two churches, while forty-one were self-supporting, during the last year. The society received 58 per cent of its money from outlying churches, and the other 42 per cent came from the rest of the churches. We cannot make further progress if we neglect our churches in the city. Why, we had to combine two into one recently to cover the expense of one." It was reported that other churches, Catholics, Presbyterians, Methodist, and others were gaining.

New York Church Refuses Money.

A short time ago one Henry A. Gesheidt, of New York, in his will left $150,000 to Trinity Church Corporation for the establishment of a "bread line" which would give loaves of bread to the city's poor. The odd condition was named that every loaf of bread should bear Gesheidt's name in raised letters. Mr. Gesheidt stated before his death that he thought that the only immortality of which a man can be sure is to perpetuate his name in some material fashion. The rector and vestry of Trinity, after considering the will for several weeks, have declined to accept the bequest.

Indiana Town Practices Federation.

Winimac, Ind., a town of two thousand inhabitants, is working under a practical form of church federation, according to the Northwestern Christian Advocate.

Congregations representing the Christian, Presbyterian, and Methodist Episcopal churches have ratified an agreement of federation to be known as the "Interdenominational Federation of the Churches of Winimac," the object of the Federation being to encourage co-operation in all religious activities, to foster closer fellowship among all citizens, and to promote the highest ideals of citizenship. The governing body is a council consisting of the pastors of the churches and six representatives from each church. The following standing committees have been constituted: Executive, finance, comity, public morals, social service, censorship, amusements, music, and publicity. The federation has in mind to exercise an influence over the entire life of the town. All property acquired by the council is to be held and administered in the interest of the federated churches.

James Stalker Visits America.

Prof. James Stalker of Aberdeen University is now in America, and fulfilled many lecture appointments during April. One of his errands on this present trip has been to deliver a course of lectures at Union Seminary in Richmond, Va. He has also been heard at Auburn Seminary and at Princeton. From the latter point he came to New England to meet several engagements in and around Boston. While in Boston he spoke to a large gathering at the Congregational Club, his subject being The Psalms of King David and the Songs of Robert Burns. Doctor Stalker is accompanied by his wife.

Roman Catholics Use Printed Page.

The Roman Catholics believe in the power of the printed page in promoting ideas. This church has 317 periodicals printed in this country alone. They have thirteen dailies and 115 weeklies printed in foreign languages—Polish, French, Bohemian, Italian, Slavonic, Magyar, Dutch, Croatian, Spanish, German, Indian. There is as yet no daily printed in English which is definitely Roman Catholic.

Minister Preaches "Drama Sermon."

Rev. A. T. Kempton, a Baptist minister of Cambridge, Mass., began a series of drama sermons at his church last December. The first sermon attracted an audience of 200. The fourth brought out 1,000. Mr. Kempton has just delivered the last of the series—the ninth. In these sermons he converts the platform of the church into a partial representation of a stage set for the scene of the story. The topics are carefully selected, and Mr. Kempton presents a simple but dramatic original story such as might be taken from real life and having the elements that touch the lives and appeal to the hearts of all classes of people. He has at least three characters in each story, and he impersonates each character.

Roman Catholics Burn Bibles.

A remarkable bonfire occurred recently in northern Luzon in the Philippines. Twenty-five hundred Bibles were publicly burned in the plaza of Vigan, the largest and most important city of that section. These Bibles had been distributed by Mr. McLaughlin of the American Bible Society, in connection with a cinematograph exhibit of scriptural films. The Roman Catholic authorities in turn gave a cinematograph exhibit, exacting as an admission fee one of the thousands of Bibles that had been distributed. Some 2,000 gave this strange fee, and then the Bibles were publicly burned on the plaza by the Catholic authorities. The result, however, was that on the day after the bonfire 3,000 additional Bibles were disposed of by the representatives of the Bible Society. This unique advertising of the Bible will doubtless make for the furtherance of the gospel in the Philippines, as wide attention has been attracted to the event.

Presbyterians Win Immigrants.

The Immigration department of the Presbyterian Church has just given out the figures of Presbyterian organizations which use a language other than English. The Germans come first in number of churches, there being 139 congregations. The Italians report 81 organizations, Bohemians 40, Hungarians 36, Slavic 22, French 6, Japanese 5, Armenians 5, Chinese 4, Koreans 4, Welsh 3, Syrians 3, Persians 1.

New Y. M. C. A. Building for Manila.

L. Wilbur Messer, secretary of the Chicago Y. M. C. A., who is now touring the world inspecting association work, reports that business men in Manila have subscribed $50,000 for an association building there. The American army officers and soldiers in the Philippines are making large use of association opportunities. Mr. Messer states that the educated Buddhists, Hindus and Mohammedans of India and Ceylon intermingle freely in the social and religious activities of the Y. M. C. A. there.

Dr. G. Campbell Morgan of London, who has recently finished his tour through America.

Australia's Religious Census.

In the last census in Australia of various religious denominations, the Church of England led with 1,710,443 members; Roman Catholics following with 621,425; Presbyterians were 558,236; Methodists have 547,806, with a decline of infidelity and agnostics, at least as they are willing to express their preferences in the census tables. According to these figures, there were 593 of infidel tendency, or a decrease of 305, as compared with former figures. Of agnostics there were 3,084, a decrease of 2,113. This shows that in Australia this propaganda is not making remarkable headway.

World Endeavor Gathering at Chicago.

The publicity committee in charge of preliminary arrangements for the world's Christian Endeavor convention in Chicago, July 7 to 12, 1915, has issued literature and begun a publicity campaign, looking forward to the convention.

G. Campbell Morgan's Tour Closed.

In the recent seven-weeks' tour of G. Campbell Morgan, of London, in this country, covering a series of Bible Conferences, the following cities, among others, were visited: Washington, Columbus, Nashville, Atlanta and Milwaukee. Twenty preachers of distinction took part in these conferences, including such men as Rev. J. H. Jowett, of New York, and Rev. John McNeill, of Toronto. During the tour of seven weeks, thirty-five meetings were visited and 487 meetings were held. Dr. Morgan himself delivered ninety-two addresses.

Moody Schools Receive Gift.

In order to maintain unimpaired his father's original purpose of educating boys and girls with but meager financial resources, William R. Moody has for years borne the burden of collecting $100,000 annually for current deficits rather than raise the fees of the students. It is reported that an anonymous gift of $100,000 has recently been pledged to him as a beginning toward a million-dollar monument for the Northfield and Mount Hermon schools, in Massachusetts.

Winona Lake Suffers Loss.

Winona Lake, the big Presbyterian Assembly site in Indiana, has just been visited with misfortune in the form of a $100,000 conflagration. Many of the cottages were destroyed.

"Presbyterian Fortnight" at Baltimore.

The Presbyterian Churches of Baltimore are holding what they call a "Presbyterian Fortnight." Under the inspiration of this special campaign of institutes and money-raising canvasses, it is hoped to arouse greater interest in local religious activities. An exhibit of the forty-two Presbyterian Churches and Missions of Baltimore is being made. A sum of $60,000 is being asked for from the churches.

Peace Prizes for Ministers.

The Church Peace Union, recently endowed with $2,000,000 by Andrew Carnegie, offers a prize of $1,000 to the minister of any denomination who will write the best argument for international peace in the space of 15,000 words. The production must contain at least 10,000 and not more than 20,000 words. Three prizes of $500, $300, and $200, respectively, are offered to theological students for the best contributions on the same general subject, the dissertations not exceeding 5,000 words.

No "Dead Line" for Conwell.

Russell H. Conwell, for thirty years pastor of the Baptist Temple in Philadelphia, has just received a call from the Calvary Baptist Church, New York, at a salary of $15,000. Dr. Conwell is seventy-two years of age.

Salvationists House Working Women.

A new annex to the Salvation Army's Boarding Home for Young Women has just been opened in Chicago, the principal speakers, at the opening exercises, being Commissioner and Mrs. Estill, the Army directors of Social Work in the West, and Miss Jane Addams of Hull House. The new annex, says the War Cry, is a four-story brick building containing seventy-four rooms, and provided with every modern convenience—steam heat, electric lights, comfortable bedrooms and parlors. Here young women may have room and board, including all the privileges of the Home, for prices ranging from $3.50 to $6.50 a week.

Of Human Interest

A "Friendly Glimpse" of Huerta.

Huerta struck me as a man with an affable manner, writes Robert Burton in the Outlook. His features show strength and force of character, while his face lights up with evident good humor. I met him in the city of Mexico last month. I sat with him for some time in his automobile, and he discussed the conditions of the country and the army and his plans for the future in a pleasant voice and with great moderation. Never once was there any insinuation against President Wilson or his policy, or any intimation that he held any grievance against the United States. On the contrary, he said explicitly that he would welcome any and all Americans who came to Mexico to find out the true state of affairs, and would give them every aid and assistance to see and find out whatever they wanted.

I asked his secretary: "Who killed Madero?" but I might as well have asked "Who killed Cock Robin?" He replied that he did not know, that nobody knew—perhaps General Mondragon, perhaps Felix Diaz. Indeed, the friends of General Bernardo Reyes might have killed him to avenge the death of Reyes, who had lost his life in the ten days' fight. At any rate, Huerta had no hand in it, he said, though there was no reason for Huerta to have any good feelings for Madero, who was a traitor to his country, who had bankrupted the national treasury and had played false to Huerta in particular.

A Witty Bishop.

David H. Greer, Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of New York, is a man possessed of fertile suggestions, but he always likes to find out the ideas of other men. Upon one occasion the Bishop was attending a meeting of a board of Sunday-school managers, when one of the members made a very novel proposal, narrates Lippincott's.

Turning quickly to a very successful superintendent who happened to be present, Bishop Greer asked:

"What do you think about that?"

"I think it a most excellent idea, Bishop, and I must say that we have been aiming to do that very thing for two years," replied the superintendent.

"Is that so?" queried the bishop. "Then, don't you think it is about time you fired?"

One on Burton Holmes' Manager.

Louis Francis Brown, manager of the Burton Holmes travelogues, is telling a good one on himself.

"Mr. Holmes, upon his return from the Philippines, brought a few samples of Filipino money with him," he says, "and thinking I might make some use of it in advertising, I had a board lettered: 'You can make money in the Philippines.' Under this line I pasted several Philippine greenbacks, a $20 bill, a $10, a $5 and a $2, with sundry silver and copper coins of various denominations, ranging the amount up to about $38 Mexican or $19 in United States money. Under the money the sign further read: For further information attend the Burton Holmes travelogues,' and so on, giving dates, etc.

"This sign, displayed in front of the hall where our season opened in Chicago, proved attractive. There was always a crowd and I was congratulating myself that it was a fine ad when one morning my phone rang wildly and a voice from the box office of the hall said: 'Say, you'd better come down here; your money's gone.'

"Needless to say, I went. It was gone, but the polite and thoughtful thief had left this note just where the $20 bill had been, which read: 'Why go to the Philippines? What's the matter with Chicago?'"

A Carnegie Story.

Andrew Carnegie, at one of his peace dinners in his superb red brick mansion in Fifth avenue, said of the Mexican policy of the government:

"It is a wise and Christian policy. It will establish a precedent that the world will hereafter observe.

"To have peace," Mr. Carnegie added, "we must bear and forbear. Hatreds and vengeances destroy all hope of peace.

"If you try to get even, in a word, you remain at odds."

A Gladstone Story.

One day Mrs. Gladstone was discussing with some ladies a knotty problem, while her husband was busy in his study upstairs.

As the discussion proceeded one of the ladies exclaimed with a sigh: "Well, there is One above who knows it all."

"Yes," responded Mrs. Gladstone, "William will be down directly and he will tell us about it."

Mayor Brand Whitlock Talks.

Apropos of the numerous influential malefactors whose prison terms are either annulled or cut down to nearly nothing, Mayor Brand Whitlock of Toledo is reported by Lippincott's to have told a story:

"Is it a good thing for the public to let these men out so soon?" asked the Mayor.

"I was sympathizing one afternoon with a poor woman whose husband had just been sent to jail. She was weeping bitterly, and I said to her:

"'Now, don't take it so hard. Two years is a long sentence, I know; but he may not have to serve it all. Convicts who behave themselves oftentimes get out months before their appointed time.'

"'That's just it,' she replied, still sobbing. 'Henry can be an angel when he likes.'"

The World is Growing Better

Steel Corporation Demands Sobriety.

Following close upon the now famous order of Secretary Daniels of the Navy and Secretary Burleson of the Postoffice Department affecting the appointment of postmasters, the following order has just been promulgated by the officials of the Youngstown (O.) district United States Steel Corporation affecting the standing of employes who use liquor.

Here is the order:

"To the employes of the United States steel mills in the Youngstown district: Hereafter all promotions of whatever character will be made only from the ranks of those who do not indulge in the use of intoxicating drinks. The heads of departments and their foremen will be expected to observe this rule in advancing their men."

The steel corporation's determination is said to be due to the belief that the use of liquor by employes is one of the most prolific causes of accidents. The action also is believed to presage a similar move affecting all the plants of the corporation, employing many thousands of men.

Nation's Social Workers Meet.

The largest convention of social workers ever assembled in America is now meeting at Memphis, Tenn. Twelve national organizations are represented. These societies constitute the convention: American Red Cross, National Conference of Charities and Correction, Southern Sociological Congress, American Association of Officials of Charities and Correction, American Association of Societies for Organized Charities, Commission on the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council of Churches, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, National Conference on the Education of Dependent, Truant, Backward and Delinquent Children, National Conference of Jewish Charities, National Federation of Settlements, National League on Urban Conditions Among Negroes, National Probation Association.

"A national crusade for social health and righteousness" is the object of the convention. Particularly to be discussed will be: "The Church and Social Service" and "Race Problems." Other questions to be taken up are: "Social Hygiene," "Public Health," "Care and Treatment of Defectives," "Associated Charities," "Child Welfare," "Neighborhood Development" and "Standards of Living and Labor."

Juvenile Courts Save Thousands.

Judge Pinckney of Chicago in his testimony before the Curran legislative committee said that 80 per cent of the delinquent children of Cook County are being saved by the juvenile court. The jurist said that 50,614 cases of delinquent children have been taken care of by his court since its organization in July, 1899. Out of 1,600 dependent children in the court last year 1,200 were orphans, or children whose parents were either divorced or not living together. The system of sending bad boys to farms has worked out well and saved many boys.

Nebraska Court Fights Saloons.

The United States Supreme Court in a decision handed down last week upholds the Nebraska law making saloonkeepers liable for damages resulting from their sale of liquor. Thus, by the highest court of the land, the saloon is stamped as directly responsible for deterioration of the home due to drink.

Minnesota Loses 1,500 Saloons.

It is claimed that 1,500 drink emporiums were put out of business by the spring elections in Minnesota. There are said to be 255 towns in the state without saloons and six counties from which the saloons are banished. The temperance forces are enthusiastic for the passage of a county option law.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by
Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

Woman Suffrage Day in Two Cities

Woman's Suffrage Day, May 2, was a success throughout the country if reports are to be credited. It was not without its picturesque features, as would naturally follow from the fact that women were behind the celebration. Chicago records even a "near-quarrel" on the part of the suffrage forces.

The plans for this display of suffrage strength to the public and to Congress had been begun by the Congressional Union in Washington and concurred in by the National Woman Suffrage Association and other organizations some time before the resolution for a Federal constitutional amendment for woman suffrage was defeated in the Senate on March 19, and had been continued despite that adverse vote and the disagreement between the suffrage organizations over the two suffrage amendment resolutions immediately thereafter introduced—the Shafroth and the Bristow resolutions.

IN NEW YORK.

In New York City there was a general mass meeting with local meetings in various outlying sections during the day, and in the evening Mayor Mitchel, Miss Katharine B. Davis and Senator Shafroth addressed a great audience in Carnegie Hall. Sixty-five other cities and towns in New York State celebrated, too. Boston had a parade of thousands, Philadelphia, a parade and mass meeting. Pittsburgh, St. Paul, St. Louis and many hundreds of other cities and towns held similar demonstrations—all to culminate on May 9, in the big parade in Washington and the mass-meeting on the steps of the Capitol from which one delegate was to be sent to each Senator and Congressman to ask his vote for woman suffrage.

IN CHICAGO.

In Chicago 3,100 women wearing the suffrage cap and carrying the American flag marched two miles along Michigan Boulevard and past the reviewing stand in Grant Park, where, besides the mayor and many local officials, were Governor Dunne, who signed the Illinois suffrage bill, and many of the legislators who helped its passage. The women leaders of Chicago, old and young, were in the procession, some just behind the grand marshal, others commanding divisions and more stepping along in the ranks, which were arranged according to wards, clubs, and political parties and offered each marcher her choice of affiliation. No mass meeting was held in Chicago and no official resolution indorsing either of the woman suffrage amendments to the Federal Constitution now before Congress was passed.

The executive board of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association, which is the State branch of the National Woman Suffrage Association, had voted not to pass the resolution of the National Association—worded in favor of Federal legislation but noncommittal as to which amendment—and had forwarded to National headquarters the following statement:

"Resolved, On account of the misunderstanding between the Congressional Committee of the National American Woman Suffrage Association and the Congressional Union and in the interest of the whole suffrage movement, as well as in the interest of fair play for which we all stand, the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association cannot indorse any resolutions to be sent to Congress on May 2, but will co-operate in the great national demonstration on that day."

Because of this action, Miss Jane Addams—who in the absence of Dr. Shaw in Europe is acting President of the National Association—and Mrs. Joseph T. Bowen, also an officer of the National Association, did not march in the Chicago parade. On the evening of the parade, without offical action of the State Board, the President and the chairman of the press committee of the Illinois State Association sent a telegram to Congress urging the passage of legislation "that will bring complete liberty to the women." This message was apparently accepted as an olive branch by all factions.

MR. TODD ON MYSTICISM.

which none the less pierces the darkness of the night in which the intellect leaves us.

Here, then, by one of the greatest of living thinkers, we have laid broad and sure the philosophical basis of mysticism.

A word, in conclusion, about the relation of mysticism to pulpit power. The word "preaching" among us covers a wide range of public address. We are told of the tens of thousands of sermons preached by tens of thousands of preachers in tens of thousands of pulpits every Sunday. But statistics are not always impressive. What do we mean by preaching — an address, given at a church, at a public gathering on Sunday, an address intended to lead men to amend their lives, or to convert them to Christianity? Such addresses may be preaching—and they may not. But if they are preaching, it will be because of an element not catalogued above. There is just one thing that lifts public address to the rank of preaching, and that differentiates preaching from every other form of public address—THE CONSCIOUSNESS OF GOD.

Amidst the endless clatter and prating and orating of pulpiteers in our day it is an open question whether the amount of preaching is not almost infinitesimal. Some of it is mere empty talk, paid for at so much a thousand words; some of it is good entertainment; some of it is good moralizing and some of it is good philosophy; sometimes it is good sociology or good politics; and sometimes it almost rises to the level of good literature. And this is all well and good. But how much of it is permeated with that subtle sense of the Divine that lifts it to the rank of preaching? Many who occupy our pulpits are fine orators, scholars, teachers, good "mixers," good business managers; and they can be all this without being preachers. The churches are insistent in their demand for men possessing the qualities above mentioned, but how many of them ask for a man that knows God, that walks with God, that has the life of God in his soul and is able to impart it to others? I am inclined to think that any community served by a dozen churches may think itself fortunate if among them all there is one man whose life and labor make God a living reality to the people. And yet, THAT, and not ethics nor sociology nor philosophy nor Bible history nor entertainment nor anything else, is the preacher's specialty.

All things seek for rest:
A home above, a home beneath the sod.
The sun will seek the west,
The bird will seek its nest,
The heart another breast
Whereon to lean; the spirit seeks its God.

"Thou madest us for Thyself," cried Augustine, "and our heart is restless until it repose in Thee." The preacher must be a mediator of God to men. If he isn't that, he is nothing, for others can do everything else better than he. He must be interested in social betterment and must work for it, but he can best do this by striving to get eternity into men's little souls. The only hope for social amelioration lies in the spiritualizing of our common life; and the only hope for spiritualizing our common life lies in a God-filled ministry. Hence it is that only the mystic can meet the supreme need of men and of the age. God is to him not a tradition from the mists of the long-ago, nor a hypothesis, necessary to give some semblance of coherence to the universe, but a present experience. He stands in the apostolic succession of those who can say, "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you also, that you may have fellowship with us; yea, and our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son, Jesus Christ."

Horace Bushnell was such a man. Near the end of his life, suffering from an incurable disease and seeking what comfort he might in the higher altitudes and cooler airs of the White Mountains, he was visited by Joseph Twitchell. The two men sat together one night under the starry sky. Presently Bushnell said, "One of us ought to pray." Twitchell asked Bushnell to do so, and Bushnell began his prayer with the words, "I have remembered all the way Thou my God hast led me," and then, burying his face in the earth, he poured out his heart, "until," said Twitchell, in recalling the incident, "I was afraid to stretch out my hand in the dark lest I touch God!"

church into fruitful channels and at the same time give these activities their ideal interpretation and to employ adequate symbols, such as the arts afford, for the support of the faith and courage of his people. He will be able through this sense of a living Christian experience to renew the zeal of those who have become indifferent, or who have lost their vision of what the church is really trying to do. He will be able to comfort those in any distress by throwing around them the divine sympathy which springs up among those devoted to the common faith. He will be able to challenge the heroism of youth with a big and vital task. And through it all he will be able, by the very character of the society he is helping to create, to mediate to every individual a deep and genuine consciousness of God.

Disciples Table Talk

Speaker Clark's Tribute to Bible.

Declaring that he inherited his religion as he did his politics and expected to die without changing either, Speaker Champ Clark outlined the religious trend of the day, and pronounced it good, in a speech at the cornerstone laying exercises of the H Street Christian Church, Washington, D. C. Speaker Clark is a member of Vermont Avenue Christian Church. "There are many kinds of religions," said Mr. Clark, "but I thank God that the end of the controversial sort has come, and that we have reached a day of practical religion. A generation or so ago each denomination kept jealously to itself, but now we have reached a hearty tolerance that is reflected in the union meetings seen on all sides. I think that religion is as necessary to the human soul as bread is to the body. I firmly believe that if all religious influences were banished the world would be a pandemonium in a twelvemonth. When I get brain fag I read St. Paul's Epistles and the Proverbs of Solomon. When I was a boy I wouldn't read the Bible. I began to read it as a youth almost by accident, and I have been at it ever since. I found it a mine of wonderful thoughts and inspirations wonderfully expressed." Speaker Clark was introduced by Rev. Henry F. Lutz, pastor of H. Street Church, and by Earle Wilfley, pastor of Vermont Avenue Christian Church. Addresses were also made by George A. Miller, pastor of Ninth Street Church; Walter F. Smith, pastor of Whitney Avenue Church, and Andrew Gottschall, pastor of Benning Christian Church.

Richmond Ave., Buffalo, in Special Work.

An every member canvass for missions and church support was conducted Sunday afternoon, April 26, under the direction of Pastor R. H. Miller of Richmond avenue, Buffalo, N. Y. Dinner was served in the dining room of the church by the ladies. After dinner twenty teams of two men each started out to visit all the members of the church. The men returned at six o'clock for tea and to report results. The reports showed an increase of over $400 a year for missions and nearly $800 for church support. The returns are not all in to date but considerable more money is yet to be reported. A series of sermons preached by the minister on Sunday nights during April on the Development of the Church drew great congregations of people. Nineteen additions are reported, also an increase of 110 per Sunday in the Sunday-school.

Denver Churches Observe Special Days.

G. B. Van Arsdall, pastor at Central, Denver, also serves as president of the Ministerial Alliance of Denver, comprising 100 churches. He reports that campaigns have been carried out on the principle of "doing things about the wisdom of which there would be no question, that we might thus get closer together and know each other on the basis of things we hold in common." Mr. Van Arsdall writes of the plans which have been successfuly carried out: "We decided upon a series of monthly days to be observed simultaneously by the churches of the city. The first was Church Attendance Day, November 2. By the way, ours was the original Church Attendance Day, for I have not been able to learn of any city that had such a day prior to November 2. Joliet had one November 9, which was the earliest of which I have heard. Many have followed since then. This was the most hearty and unanimous thing I have ever known the churches of a city to do. Over 100,000 invitations were sent out the week before. Fifty girls stood on the street corners November 1, and gave out 50,000 cards inviting the people to go to church; the street cars carried signs and the dailies were full of it. Even the movies took notice and took pictures of the people leaving the churches and ran them throughout the country. Every church in the city was crowded to its limit. We had every attendant sign a card giving name and church affiliation. Here was the most valuable and surprising bit of information that we received from that. On an average, every tenth person that worshiped here that day was a member of some church elsewhere and living in Denver unaffiliated with any church. The number was larger in some churches but the average was one in ten. About 750 people attended my church and exactly seventy-five of them were members of the Christian Church elsewhere and living in Denver. Our next day was Sunday-school day, in December. Then came a day of special prayer in January. Young People's Day in February. Then came the City-Wide Easter Mission which was participated in by ninety-four churches, all of them observing Holy Week with services each evening and some of them holding meetings for two and three weeks." That the Christian churches of Denver are prospering is indicated by the fact that since Easter Sunday eighty-five persons have united with the four churches. Seventy have united with Central since January 1, and 652 since the beginning of Mr. Van Arsdall's work there, four years ago. By a new financial system Central has increased its pledges to current expenses 50 per cent, and to missions 180 per cent.

Rev. W. G. Winn, called to Irving Park Church, Chicago.

Somerset, Pa., Church Grows.

The church at Somerset, Pa., where S. G. Buckner ministers, reports a movement under way to reduce the indebtedness on the church property by several thousand dollars. That this church is not becoming purely commercial in its efforts, is evidenced by the fact that 42 additions are reported for April. In the school a chief feature is the great Brotherhood Class of 100, taught by Mr. Buckner. The teacher of this class, by the way, thinks there is nothing so good for a men's class as the "Gospel of the Kingdom" courses, the work of Josiah Strong.

Metropolitan, Chicago, in Institutional Work.

The institutional features of the work at Metropolitan Church, Chicago, where C. R. Mr. Buckner. The teacher of this class, by veloped. The first of May, thirty-six dormitory rooms were opened for young men. One young man has a large class of boys whose ages are about 14 years. The development at Metropolitan, in the difficult downtown district, has been an interesting one. The great theater auditorium, which seats 2,000 people, for a long time used for every form of amusement, is now used only for the preaching of the Gospel. The saloon which was in the corner room was glad to relinquish its lease. The wine room was quickly turned into a place of worship, and likewise the old dance hall.

Bible Class Evangelizes County.

The work at Nelsonville, O., is outgrowing its accommodations and the church is now erecting a large auditorium to accommodate the increasing Sunday-school and church attendance. It is an addition to the present property, and will accommodate about 1,000. The great class conducted by R. A. Doan, known as the "Berean Class," is one of the most remarkable in the brotherhood. Members of this class go out by "teams" on Sunday afternoons and evangelize in the smaller towns and villages and country districts. Their work has led to much religious interest and a number of conversions.

First Church, St. Louis, to Build.

It falls to the lot of few churches to do the important work that has been done during the years by First Church, St. Louis, the old "Mother Church" of the seventeen St. Louis organizations. On May 3, the First celebrated its 77th anniversary. Plans were discussed for the new plant to be erected soon farther west. This church, during its long life, has had 10,000 members, having sent out 35 preachers and missionaries. The First has had some of the most noted men in Disciple history among its pastors. Dr. J. L. Brandt, who is at the helm now, is in his second pastorate there, having served there for the last three years, and having had a previous pastorate of seven years. Dr. Brandt seems especially adapted to the sort of work to be done in this downtown field. The congregation at First is a continually changing one, but is remarkably devoted to the church, consisting largely of young people.

Go. Clarke Addresses Des Moines Union.

Governor Clarke, of Iowa, was the principal speaker at a meeting of the Disciples' union of Des Moines, April 30, at the Central Church. Two hundred persons were present at the meeting. Governor Clarke urged on his audience the same cooperation between members of a church and between the churches as exists in a successful business enterprise. The Disciples' union, he said, seemed to him significant of the possibilities of cooperation among the churches. Dr. Charles S. Medbury, pastor of University church, spoke on the Disciples' part in the coming Billy Sunday campaign. Dr. Finis Idleman of Central church spoke on the international convention of Disciples in Atlanta next October. B. W. Garrett, president of the Iowa state board, talked in behalf of the state encampment of Disciples at Colfax July 13-19. Preceding these talks reports were made by representatives from the nine churches and four missions of the city, detailing their growth and progress. A dinner was served by the women of the Central church and music by the Central church male quartet.

Clyde Darsie Closes Jacksonville Work.

April 26 was the last day of service of Clyde Darsie, at Jacksonville, Ill., Mr. Darsie having resigned to take the work at Mt. Sterling, Ky. In reviewing his work in the Illinois town during the last two and one-half years, Mr. Darsie presented the following facts: During that period the additions to the church have numbered between 150 and 175. The Sunday-school has organized its beginners' department, has introduced the graded lessons in the first three departments of the school and has built up its boys' department until it is the best in any Christian church in the state of Illinois. The indebtedness on the church building, on the assessment for paving and on the mission house on Park place has all been paid, aggregating $2,500. This leaves the church entirely free from debt with the exception of a small current indebtedness that is never permitted to run to exceed a few months. Last year the church gave more to the cause of missions than in any previous year of its history. The general sum contributed by the different departments amounted in all to $2,800 which was increased by private gifts to more than $5,000. The C. W. B. M. of the church in this city has assumed the support of Prof. C. T. Paul of the College of Missions in Indianapolis. This makes the third living link which the church now has with the mission field. Mr. Darsie, discussing his reasons for leaving Jacksonville, stated that he believed it best for the work there for him to leave, and said also that he considered the work he is now undertaking the greatest opportunity in Kentucky.

J. R. Perkins on "War."

"The gospel of the iron shard and of the reeking tube have no warrant in the teaching of Jesus," asserted J. R. Perkins, pastor at First Church, Sioux City, Ia., in a recent sermon. "A militant clergyman is a contradiction in terms. You have heard the prayer—or heard of it—'Lord, give success to our armies; crown their efforts with victory.' But why not be plain? Why not pray: 'Lord, help the soldiers to shoot straight. May our cannon disembowel men, sever their heads from their bodies, scatter their brains over the rocks, maul to a pulp the armies of the aliens.' For this is what we mean, anyhow! It is commercialized Christianity that gives comfort to Jingoism. The voice of the pulpit should be a cry for peace. It is the duty of the Christian pulpit to pull against the current of popular feeling and not drift with the tide. Let us not glorify war." Mr. Perkins declared that much of the Mexican war talk was created by American capitalists for the purpose of diverting public attention from social and industrial crises which confront us at home.

Dr. H. J. Hall Resigns.

Dr. H. J. Hall, who has served our American Temperance Board faithfully for some years, has resigned and accepted service with the "Flying Squadron" under the direction of ex-Governor Hanly of Indiana. His successor with the Temperance Board has not yet been chosen but it is expected that one of the foremost preachers amongst us will be prevailed upon to take the work.

E. E. Violett Supplies at Kansas City.

While Burris A. Jenkins is absent from his pulpit on account of the trouble with his knee, E. E. Violett, the evangelist, is supplying the pulpit at the Linwood Church, Kansas City, Mo. Mr. Violett has opened an office at 707 Sharpe Building, Kansas City, for the purpose of handling his tour business.

Looking Atlanta-ward.

The arrangements for getting to and from the Atlanta Convention are in the hands of E. E. Elliott, executive secretary, elected by the last convention. A very low rate of fare has been obtained, $21.40 from St. Louis, $15 from Cincinnati, $13.80 from Louisville, and proportionate rates from all points south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi Rivers. Ten special trains will be needed to carry our people to the Atlanta Convention, and arrangements for this number have been made. The equipment will be "All steel" coaches, and sleeping cars. Receptions en route to Atlanta will be given by the citizens of Lexington, Kentucky, Cincinnati, Ohio, and Nashville, Tennessee, with automobile trips, and sightseeing.

National Convention Minutes Printed.

Graham Frank, Corresponding Secretary of the General Convention of Churches of Christ, reports that, by order of the Toronto Convention, the minutes of the Louisville Mass Meeting and of the sessions of the General Convention in Toronto have been printed, and that he will gladly mail a copy of same to anyone making application to him, at Liberty, Mo.

Edgar D. Jones Discusses War.

As the sixth of the fiction series being discussed by Edgar DeWitt Jones, at First Church, Bloomington, Ill., Mr. Jones considered a war story, Baroness von Suttner's "Ground Arms." This book received one of the awards of the Nobel peace prize and stirred all Europe. The speaker made a strong appeal to his hearers for peace and commended the administration in the highest of terms for the attitude that had been assumed.

American Society in Patmont Resolutions.

The American Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati, passed the following resolutions at the April meeting of the Board: "Resolved, that in view of the mysterious disappearance of our Brother Patmont from Danville, Illinois, and of the serious loss that the brotherhood sustains in his disappearance, it is the sense of this Board that we deeply deplore, even with sad hearts, the fact of his disappearance and condemn with no uncertain sound the foul means which we are led to believe were used in ending his useful life, and that we express our deepest sympathy and condolence to his bereaved family as well as to the interests which he represented and to the great brotherhood that shall miss him from its ranks and shall keenly feel the loss it sustains in his death. With our prayers for his family, our pledge to endeavor to carry out his work, and our honor to his name for faithful service performed, we commend his loved ones to our merciful Father who doeth all things well."

Charleroi Church in Good Work.

E. N. Duty, pastor at Charleroi, Pa., reports that the C. W. B. M. auxiliary of the church there has undertaken, to the extent of $200 yearly expense, the education of D. R. LaRue at Bethany College, in preparation for foreign work among the French people. Mr. LaRue is a young man, with wife and children, and has been making a desperate effort to equip himself for this service. Mr. Duty is right in believing that this direct contribution to missions will give his people a greater missionary vision.

First Church, Kansas City, Burns.

A telegram from W. F. Richardson brings the information that the old First Church building, Kansas City, Mo., burned to the ground Saturday morning, May 9. The new building, which was erected for Sunday-school and social work, was to have been dedicated about July 1. The congregation worshiped on May 10 in the Y. M. C. A. Building, with fine interest. Mr. Richardson writes that the people are full of courage and faith, and plan to rebuild at once. This faithful pastor asks for the prayers of the brotherhood that his flock "may not falter in the work of this needy field."

Feature at Missouri Convention.

Dr. W. J. Williamson, a Baptist preacher of note and ability, pastor of the Second Baptist Church at St. Louis, will speak on Christian Union at the Missouri Convention of Christian Church at Moberly in June.

California Town Practices Unity.

The Methodist, Congregationalist, Baptist and Christian churches of Calistoga, Cal., have formed a combine. All meet together as one family, have one service, one preacher, one prayer-meeting, one Sunday-school and one Endeavor Society. The regular pastor is a Methodist, but L. C. Martin, of the Christian church, sometimes preaches.

Indiana's Bible Chair Prospers.

J. C. Todd, of the Bible Chair at the University of Indiana, reports that although the work is constantly hindered by lack of facilities and funds, some quite worthy re-tives attended the Student Volunteer Convention at Kansas City January 1. During the past two months there have been a number of committments of Christian church students for the mission field and the ministry. There are others who could be claimed if the proper tools to work with and the proper support of the work were at hand. The university pastor is still under the necessity of spending most of his Sundays in the field.

L. N. D. Wells Lauds Akron Singers.

L. N. D. Wells, pastor of First Church, Akron, O., writes enthusiastically of the abilities of two Disciples evangelistic singers who make their home in Akron. William Leigh who is a member of the High Street Church, Akron, is unsurpassed as a song leader, according to Mr. Wells. Mrs. Grace Powell, also at Akron, is referred to as unsurpassed as a convention leader of song.

Teaching Foreigners at Canton, O.

Under the auspices of the young people of the Christian Endeavor Societies and the Young People's Missionary Circle of First Church, Canton, Ohio, a Christian Mission has been opened in the foreign section of that city. Oscar Patmont and M. Baron, students in Phillips Bible Institute, who speak several languages, have charge of the teaching and preaching in the mission. Night classes in English are taught four nights a week. About fifty young people of the church alternate in teaching in the English classes. The average attendance of these classes is ninety-three per night. One hundred and thirty-eight foreigners attended the religious services of a recent Lord's day. Mr. Welshimer, pastor at Canton, delivered an address March 27, at a banquet given by the men of the Philadelphia Sunday-school Association. He has been asked to return next fall for an address. He spoke also at Alabama State Sunday School Convention, at Mobile, recently.

Some State Conventions.

The following are some of the state convention dates and places: Indiana at Terre Haute, May 11-14; West Virginia, at Clarksburg, June 15, 16; Washington, D. C., and Maryland, at Washington, May 19-21; Ohio, at Bowling Green, June 2-4; Georgia, at Valdosta, May 5-7; Arizona, at Tempe, May 23-25; Missouri, at Moberly, June 15-18; North Dakota, at Minot, June 25-28.

Social Center at Sioux City, Iowa.

A social center may be established by the congregation of First Church, Sioux City, Ia. At the twenty-fifth annual meeting of the church membership it was decided that the present church plant is too small to properly care for the growing Sunday-school. As the membership is not strong enough to erect a new church building, the present problem will probably be solved by the building of a structure on the lots west of the church to be used for the Sunday-school. If the present plans materialize this building will also serve as a social center to the people of the community. All of the various organizations of the church will use this building as a meeting place. A reading and game room will be maintained and a gymnasium for the children will probably be a feature of the plant. J. R. Perkins, pastor of the church, is an earnest advocate of the social center. He claims that it is more essential to the life of the church that a social center be established than that a new church auditorium be built. Officers of the church will take the proposition under advisement and it is probable that immediate steps will be taken toward the erection of such a building.

Montgomery, Ala., Church Honored.

One of the Montgomery dailies is presenting to its readers a series of sketches of the city's leading churches. In a late issue a half-page is given to the history of the First Christian Church, of which C. E. Holt is pastor. The Montgomery work was begun in 1881, with J. M. Barnes, preacher and educator, as pioneer mover, with Samuel Jordan and W. J. Haynes assisting. The work of John E. Dunn came later. The success of the church, however, was made possible largely through the indefatigable and unselfish efforts of C. A. Allen. He put his money into the work, thus proving his great interest therein. The whole church honors and reveres his memory. From a mere handful the membership has increased until it now reaches into the hundreds. The personnel of the membership is fine, embracing some of the best people of Montgomery. The present minister has been in Montgomery since 1912.

John W. Mounce Given Another Honor.

John W. Mounce, of Hannibal, Mo., whose record of faithfulness in church and Sunday-school attendance received wide publicity a few weeks ago, not only in the religious press but also in the daily newspapers, has again been honored. His friends of First Church, Hannibal, Mo., have published a booklet of "Appreciations" of Mr. Mounce's personality and career. The booklet contains words of appreciation of Mr. Mounce as a man, as a Sunday-school worker, as a friend, as "a friend to the C. W. B. M." There are also letters of congratulation from former pastors and others, and a character sketch written by the pastor at Hannibal, George A. Campbell. Mr. Campbell speaks of Mr. Mounce as "Treasurer, Teacher, Philanthropist, Man, Christian." The fact of greatest interest regarding Mr. Mounce, as recorded in the recent widely scattered articles, was that during a period of sixty-two years he missed only nineteen Sundays from the Sunday-school and but three from the church services.

Irving S. Chenoweth in Successful Work.

First Church, Philadelphia, has seen a marked increase in its attendance this year. At Easter, sixteen new members were received, eleven by baptism. Irving S. Chenoweth ministers there, and to show its loyalty, the congregation, at its annual meeting, voted a two-hundred dollar increase in his salary. This church supports Miss Eleanor Bateman, a teacher in the C. W. B. M. school at Beckley, W. Va.

In little more than a year since the organization of Central Church, Richmond, Ind., the congregation has built a temporary tabernacle, with a seating capacity of 1,200, which was dedicated by Charles Reign Scoville, April 22, L. E. Murray, pastor at First, Richmond, assisting. R. C. Leonard is pastor at the Central.

At the quarterly union meeting, held at the Third Church, April 22, plans were adopted for the organization of the Philadelphia Christian Missionary Society, looking to aggressive work in and around Philadelphia. Dr. Mary Longdon was the chief speaker; short addresses were made by very welcome visitors—A. C. Smither, Robert M. Hopkins and E. W. Thornton. Allen A. Moats is secretary of this organization.

The Washington, D. C., and Maryland convention will be held at Washington, May 19 to 21. John H. Booth, A. McLean and Mrs. E. K. Payne will represent the National Societies.

PERSONAL AND OTHERWISE.

H. Maxwell Hall began his work as pastor of the First Christian Church of Portland, Oregon, on Easter Sunday, with the largest morning audience which the church has had for years. W. F. Reagor, the former pastor, was compelled to close his work on account of ill health on January 1, and S. M. Connor, of Spokane, Washington, has occupied the position as supply pastor in a very able manner. The church is said to be in the most prosperous condition at the present time in its history and the prospects for a great church in this flourishing city of the northwest are exceedingly bright.

Within the last year, isolated members of the Christian Church living in Washington, Iowa, banded themselves together and constructed a modern house of worship. About three months ago they called an evangelist, held a meeting, organized with a membership of 170, dedicated their building with $2,000 to spare, which has been applied on a modern parsonage. This is the story of the church which has just called L. C. Kopp to its pastorate.

The Missionary Education Movement is making strenuous efforts to secure attendance of missionary leaders at conferences to be held throughout the country this summer. The points to be most easily reached by our people are Silver Bay, New York; Pacific Grove, Cal.; Estes Park, Colorado, and Lake Geneva, Wisconsin. For dates, communicate with S. J. Corey, Box 884 Cincinnati, Ohio.

The "Flying Squadron" of National Prohibition, headed by Ex-Governor Hanly, of Indiana, is about ready to start "flying," according to letters being sent out from the Indianapolis headquarters. Oliver W. Stewart, of Chicago, is one of the squadron's fighting men.

The Christian church at Ottawa, Kan., was packed almost to standing room at both services when J. T. Shreve, the new pastor, delivered his first sermons. He took for his theme in the morning "The Importance of Putting on the Whole Armor of God."

Stephen J. Corey is to go abroad in the interests of the foreign society during July, returning in September via San Francisco, while A. E. Cory is to spend August in Russia visiting among the Disciples there.

J. M. Vawter occupied the pulpit of Memorial M. E. Church, Louisville, Ky., in a recent general exchange of pulpits there. This plan carried so well that it is proposed to repeat it.

H. Gordon Bennett, who is holding a meeting at Eureka, Mont., writes that the church there desires a pastor, and asks that correspondence be addressed to him, at Eureka.

Men's Day in the Bible-school will be observed May 24. A special program has been arranged by the Brotherhood national office.

Nelson H. Trimble, of Columbia, Mo., gives his time during the week to the secretaryship of the Men's Commercial Club.

The Men of all four churches at Exline, Iowa, where J. Wesley preaches, have organized a Union Men's Movement.

RESCUED!

One of yesterday's letters brought such good news that it must be shared.

After more than twenty years of self-forgetting labor one of our preachers broke down so completely that his friends despaired of his recovery. He was promptly given the maximum pension of $30 per month as an expression of the brotherhood's appreciation and affection.

Now, after only two payments, he has so fully regained his strength that he has taken up full work in a less exacting field than his old one.

It is easily seen that one of the chief factors in his speedy recovery was the sense of having his brethren back of him in prompt and practical fashion. Ten or a hundred times the amount of money, at another time or from another source, would not have meant so much.

Educational Talks on Bonds

INVESTMENT

Do bonds furnish the proper amount of safety for the principal? Sometimes they do, and sometimes not.

And—when they are safe, they usually pay very little more than the average saving bank interest. Their only virtue is in being safe SOMETIMES.

Therefore—you don't want them, unless nothing safer and more appealing shows up.

Do you want Bank Interest? NO. The disadvantages of this type of investment are seen in Talk No. 6—Next week.

Golden Text.—Were there none found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger?—Luke 17:18.

(11) And it came to pass, as they were on the way to Jerusalem, that he was passing along the borders of Samaria and Galilee. (12) And as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten men that were lepers, who stood afar off: (13) and they lifted up their voices, saying, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us. (14) And when he saw them, he said unto them, Go and show yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass, as they went, they were cleansed. (15) And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, with a loud voice glorifying God; (16) and he fell upon his face at his feet, giving him thanks: and he was a Samaritan. (17) And Jesus answering said, Were not the ten cleansed? but where are the nine? (18) Were there none found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger? (19) And he said unto him, Arise, and go thy way: thy faith hath made thee whole.

Verse by Verse.

BY C. C. BUCKNER

vi 11. He was passing along the borders of: Another version puts it, through the midst of.

v. 12. There met him ten men that were lepers: This most loathsome disease is prevalent in Egypt and Syria today. The joints of the hands and feet lose their power, the limbs fall together, and the entire system assumes an unsightly appearance. Stood afar off: The first law for the leper ran, "In whom the plague is he shall dwell alone; without the camp shall his habitation be." The distance which the leper was required to keep from the unafflicted was debated. Some rabbis thought five cubits, others fifty cubits.

v. 13. Jesus, Master: This form of address is indicative of their faith.

v. 14. Show yourselves to the priests: Jesus asked them to do this in order that the priests might declare them to be clean.

v. 15. Turned back: Only this one was grateful. The others were conscious only of the benefaction; they had no thought of the benefactor.

v. 16. And he was a Samaritan: It seems strange that the Samaritan was to be found in the company of the Jews. Indeed, under no other circumstances could it be so. But when a Jew became a leper he practically lost his social identity and so became a member of the leper family which included all races.

v. 17. Where are the nine? It is no wonder that Jesus, a man of so fine fibre, should be sensitive to the little courtesies. It is a great lesson to our age. In the bustle of our rapid living we are entirely too prone to neglect the acknowledgment of the courtesies and benefactions of life.

v. 18. Glory to God: God is the source of all blessings. Men are the channels of blessings.

v. 19. Arise, and go thy way: Here was a man who could be trusted to go his way for his way would be the right way.

At the Heart of the Lesson.

BY REV. A. Z. CONRAD, PH.D.

The bracketed sentence is often necessary to the understanding of the whole page. Arrival is important, but its glory is determined by the events on the way. There are no unimportant passages in the symphony. Not a phrase may be neglected, else the whole may be marred. The climax to an oration is made possible by the high character of the sentences leading to it. The successful issue of a campaign requires that no feature of it may be treated indifferently. A single inadvertance will lose the game of chess. The crew in training counts every day before the final event important.

Jerusalem was the objective of Jesus, but the incident on the way has immortality. Graduation as the goal will be affected by the seemingly trifling experiences of the whole college course. Not some far off event, but today, and now, is weighted with eternity. Nothing which transpired in Jerusalem, save the Cross, was more instructive and suggestive than the healing of the ten. The whole trend of life is often determined by a salutation, a suggestion, an expression of opinion, an exhortation, to which we had attached little importance.

MEETING MISERY.

How shall we deal with the disagreeable? Scarcely a step is taken without meeting misery. Our song is hushed by the sigh of the sufferer. Our exultations are scarcely expressed before our attention is arrested by the wail of woe. To ignore human misery is not only un-Christian, it is inhuman. The admiration and devotion of apostolic associates one moment, and then next the ten lepers, ten representatives of human affliction. We may meet misery with a frown of dismissal or a smile of welcome. We may treat it as a disagreeable interference or a God sent opportunity. The avoidance of overwhelmed people is wickedly selfish. Jesus never denied audience to an overwhelmed soul. He never met the appeal for help by the palsied, the blind and the deaf with an absurd and irrational denial of the reality of their malady. "Assistance" is the watchword of Christian discipleship and not avoidance. We are not to shrink from misery but meet it and master it. The power is delegated. The discipline is demanded by our very disposition to ease and self-indulgence. We need sometimes to confront discomfort in order to develop gratitude.

THE PLEA THAT PREVAILS.

"They lifted up their voices saying, 'Master, have mercy on us.'" We are not in a position to make a demand upon God. The ills we suffer, to be sure, are not always of our own making. The saintliest feel the touch of the flame. The most devout are sometimes called to endure defamation and disaster. Out of great tribulation the white robed throng came. Leprosy was a type of sin, but no evidence of it, in the sufferer. The innocent suffer for the sins of the fathers. Nevertheless it is of grace and not of debt that we are helped and healed. Mercy is the unmerited expression of divine love. Every immortal soul has sinned sufficiently to bar him from a plea for justice only. We can plead for much which we may not demand. As a type of sin leprosy revealed its loathsomeness and its ultimate fatality. There was only one issue before the leper; that was death. It began insidiously, worked stealthily, and when it appeared it repelled. Death was inevitable. How complete its type of sin. Unforgiven sin begins insidiously and works stealthily. It, too, dismembers and destroys, deforms and defaces. Every living soul carries enough death germs in his own system to destroy him until they have been eradicated by the grace of God. Health is not secured by environment nor envelopment. If gained, it begins at the heart center and works out. Not a new cloak or a new coating is necessary, but a new constitution. God's gifts of healing are of grace and not of debt. We may be sure that all that love can do will be done and we need not spend time upon discoursing upon God's obligation to his children. It is the attitude of hearts which call for mercy which makes possible the inflow of the health forces of the Infinite.

DISAPPOINTING ANSWERS TO PRAYER.

Why not an immediate demonstration of divine power with healing at once? Why are not our prayers answered in the way we desire? Solely because God has a better way. The ten lepers were wiser in their appeal then most of us are in our prayers. Their request was an all comprehensive one. "Mercy" meant such an application of divine power and love as would meet any and every need. To be sure, they expect and hoped for healing, at once and unconditionally. Their calls for mercy specifically meant a prayer to be healed of leprosy then and there. Jesus desired to give them more than they asked. This is usually why our prayers are not answered in the way we expect. Instead of some spectacular expression of supernatural power, Jesus uttered a command. "Go and show yourselves unto the priests." They must do something before they could receive anything. An obedient spirit is the precursor of Divine compassion. The thing they were commanded to do was the last thing they were supposed to do in their present condition. It seemed at first it would invite censure and scorn. For a spotted and uncured leper to go to the priest seemed like an affront to the priesthood. God's providences often compel the course which least recommends itself to our favor. We have prayed, and then the only open doors looked like the doors of further trouble. We are compelled to answer our own prayers in the way we would be least likely to choose. Why? For the development of faith and the manifestation of our real attitude toward God. We are often ignorant of our spiritual disposition and tendency. God asks for implicit obedience. But how can we have health? If we spent the time which we now ocupy in asking why? in doing what God directs by his grace we would the sooner see the results we long for. The lepers had to assume health before they could receive it. We have to assume that the thing we ask for will be granted or else we will be doomed to disappointment.

GOD'S HIGHWAY TO HEALTH.

"As they went they were cleansed." The unaccomplished challenges us. We must fight as though victory already perched on our banners. We call the physician in vain if we do not assume health in his prescription. Not to start until the spots had begun to disappear would have been to wait until death released the lepers from their physical suffering. The demonstrated is urged as a foundation. Faith rests on a sure basis, but leaves the base to make its flight. The aeroplant starts from the ground but soon moves freely above the clouds. Not a spot had faded when the lepers started. They had not completed the first step until health forces began to master malady and they felt the change.

CLEANSED.

No man is destined by the Almighty to defeat and failure. Defeat means defect. Sin is sediment. Disobedience to God's law corrupts the soul. The life is stained that is sensuous and selfish. The natural tendency of the heart is to mix with muck. Disease is unclean. A body free from all impurities is healthful. "As they went they were cleansed." This is a strong, stirring word. Points which carry electric fire in the combustion chamber of the engine must be clean. The more soot the less spark. Each soul must be first and foremost a cleansed soul. Foul language and foul thoughts are forced out. The saints before the throne are represented as clad in clean linen pure and white. The cleansed life is the conquering life. The athlete is compeled to live sanely or lose rank. The prayer the Christian needs most to offer is "Create in me a clean heart."

LOVE'S LAMENT.

"Where are the nine?" How many children forget to give thanks to parents until it is too late. Parental love, protection and provision are forgotten in the very enjoyments which they procure. When we enumerate our mercies we spontaneously pour forth our thanks. Every stream followed straight to its source looks finally upon the fountain of salvation. The fountain of all blessing is the Throne of God. The best we look for is far less than God's bounty will provide. A more venturesome faith will result in a more virile constitution. God leads us through spiritual impressions and when we follow them we find ourselves upon heaven's highway to perfect holiness. Obedience is the first step to consecration, and consecration means reconstruction. Perfecting processes wait on the prayer of faith. The highest privilege of a disciple of Christ is to gear his life into the omnipotence and omniscience of God.

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

TOPIC FOR MAY 27.

The Sacrificial Life. Rom. 12:1-2; Phil. 5:11.

The sacrificial life is the abundant life. The notion that sacrifice is the rejection of life is false. The medieval painters with their emaciated Christ helped to spread abroad this notion and their pictures are doing much to keep it alive. To sacrifice is to choose the good in preference to the bad, the better instead of the good, and the best instead of the better. The tendencies of a life may seem to run in one direction and duty may call for the choosing of the opposite. But when life is understood, it will be seen that no tendency reaches its fulfillment until it finds a place in a life in which all interests are fulfilled. David Livingstone was not pleased when sacrifice was mentioned in connection with his labors. The best was so clearly understood by him and so thoroughly enjoyed that it was easy for him to give up all else.

THE LIVING SACRIFICE.

The work of the kingdom is being done by men and women whose bodies are strong. Dyspepsia and nervousness are bad—there is nothing Christian in them. Good disciples may have them and they may manifest a heroic spirit in doing their work in spite of them. Bodily infirmity and true piety are not altogether incompatible. Much of the good that we see has been done by workers whose bodies were below the standard of good health. But let us not make the mistake of thinking that there is a causal relation between infirmity of body and goodness. Jesus was not an invalid. His apostles were men able to endure hard usage. No weakling could have lived many days under the treatment Paul received. The body free from disease, disciplined for social uses, habituated to the right, is what every Christian needs.

THE RENEWED MIND.

"Not many wise, not many noble" were among the first disciples of Jesus. Of course not. If the world is wrong religiously, those who are accounted wise will be the last to accept a new faith. They profit by the old. All that is best in it they enjoy. It requires clearness of thought and a high degree of courage for a few men to stand out against the wise and noble. But one whose mind has been renewed so that he sees the weakness of the old system and its certain collapse will not hesitate to stand alone in the promulgation of the larger truth. We waver when we are not sure of our ground.

THE DAILY GRIND.

Not every one that says, "Lord, Lord," will receive the highest honors of the kingdom. It is easier to promise than it is to perform. Thousands of men in the United States who say we ought to use the big stick on Mexico would keep as far as possible from the line of battle if it should become necessary to subdue the Mexicans through the use of the army and navy. The hunger and thirst and wounds and death of war they would not endure. They see one aspect of the situation. In the fight of truth against falsehood there is much that is unpleasant. It is a glorious thing to proclaim with the tongue of an orator the unsearchable riches of Christ. But to live these riches every day, to be kind, to be patient, to follow the weary round of duty—this is more than many are willing to do. They like the poetry of life—its drudgery they shun. But there is no true poetry where there is no exacting task. The self-restraint that characterizes all who keep at their work and reject the offers of those who promise success to idlers is the kind of sacrifice that builds churches and establishes righteousness in the earth.

Matt. 7:21-23; Rev. 7:13-17; Phil. 3:7, 8; 4:18; Hos. 14:2; Heb. 13:15; 1 Sam. 15:22; Ps. 51:16-17; Prov. 21:3; Jer. 7:21-23; Hos. 6:6; Amos 5:21-23; Mic. 6:6-8.

VISITING COUNT OKUMA.

of his personal character will be felt throughout the nation.

We asked him many questions regarding the religious life of the Japanese. He spoke with appreciation of the best elements in the native religion, Shinto, and in the Confucian ethics and the Buddhist religion which had come in earlier ages from China. But in the most positive manner he declared that he welcomed the coming of Christianity among his people because it brought the widening of vision which was essential to the highest type of national life, and also provided a force to inspire to new vigor the moral ideals of humanity. This seemed a notable statement as implying his belief that Christianity alone provides the stimulus to the right ethical standard of living. Count Okuma is not a Christian, but seems very close to the line of Christian confession as he speaks about his people and his hopes for the future. Of the missionaries he spoke in the highest terms, and his appreciative references to Mr. Place and Mr. Benninghoff, as well as to others of the missionary group in Japan, made clear his sense of indebtedness to their efforts.

After perhaps two hours of conversation the Count conducted us through the farther portion of the house into the conservatory, and from there into the garden, where he summoned one of his servants to bring the photographic apparatus and take a picture of the party. Later on the Count sent us copies of this photograph, and one of them is reproduced herewith. We wandered through the extensive grounds, laid out everywhere with that attention to landscape gardening and to the details of floriculture which is the astonishment of travelers in Japan. Most wonderful of all, it seemed to us, was the dwarfing of trees, which reduced oaks, cedars and firs to the dimensions of potted trees. Nothing more astonishing and weird could be imagined than this elfish style of forestry.

We left Count Okuma's with the highest appreciation of his leader-like and scholarly qualities, as well as his dignified and charming courtesy. That afternoon's visit will long remain vivid in the memory of our group. Nor can we fail to congratulate Japan upon the restoration of this veteran statesman to power. He will not please the jingoes nor the clamorers for military and naval expansion. He will practice the arts of retrenchment and economy so much needed by the over-burdened people of the empire. He will be the friend of Christian institutions of every sort. And if he is permitted to follow out the principles for which he has so consistently and eloquently contended, Japan has before it an era of constructive progress unequaled in its history.

MEXICO AND THE UNITED STATES
A STORY OF REVOLUTION INTERVENTION AND WAR
By FREDERICK STARR
ILLUSTRATED
MEXICO AND THE UNITED STATES
by FREDERICK STARR of The University of Chicago.

Shall the United States Intervene?

Shall American Blood be Shed?

Professor Starr, of the University of Chicago, is the highest American Authority on Mexico, and her relations to the United States, Japan and other Nations.

Professor Starr knows Mexico intimately. He has made more than a score of journeys to that Republic and has met most of the men who have played a part in her later history. Through a period of four years, he made journeys into the villages of the remote Indian tribes in the mountains of Southern Mexico—studying life and customs, making measurements, photographs, and life-masks among twenty-three of the least-known populations. He has visited most of the ruins and has made original contributions to Mexican archaeology. He has been much interested in Mexican policies and has closely observed the movement of events of the last fifteen years. He had repeated interviews with President Diaz and was personally acquainted with members of his cabinet and many of his governors. In September, 1910, he spent a month in Mexico to see the celebration of the Centennary of Mexican Independence. He was there again from January to April, 1911, to study Mexico in revolution. In December, 1912, he had an interview with President Madero and met Vice-President Pino Suarez, both of whom met their death only a few days later in the Diaz-Reyes-Huerta revolution. Professor Starr's Mexican exhibits brought him medals from the Atlanta, Buffalo and Nashville expositions. In recognition of his work in that country he received the palms of an officer of public instruction from the government of France and the cross of a chevalier of the Order of the Crown of Italy from King Victor Emanuel III. That Mexicans appreciate his studies is shown by the fact that he has been elected to corresponding or honorary membership in their three most important scientific societies.

To be fully informed on this very vital question one must read this book. Nearly 400 large octavo pages. Fine super paper. Over 100 great photographs, maps and portraits. The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

* * *

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

* * *

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

Saving the Boys of Chicago

You have never seen this young American, but there are many of them just like him in our cities' streets. It is for such as these that the Chicago Boys' Club is working. Instead of trying to reform boys after they have been "formed" into bad men, it is taking hold of them while their characters are yet to be made and forming them into upright and useful citizens. That this kind of work is needed in Chicago is evidenced by the astounding number of crimes committed here by boys. You will be interested in the story of the remarkable work of this Club, written by its capable Superintendent, Mr. John H. Witter.

This is from the front cover of a recent issue of "The Conquest." This issue has an excellent feature story by the superintendent of the Chicago Boys' Club. It is vital. It is helpful. By the way, have you compared "The Conquest" with other papers? Have you noticed that it deals with things and facts that count? There's nothing put into "The Conquest" for padding. Next week we shall announce another special feature, and each week thereafter for a while. "The Conquest" is growing. Watch it, and help it grow by putting it into your school. Send for free copy to

The Insufficiency of Environment

Ever since Buckle wrote his "History of Civilization," the scholars of the world have given increased attention to environment. Up to that time, character had been considered almost wholly in its personal aspects. Since then it has been studied largely as a matter of environment. So sure was Buckle of his conclusions on this subject that he affirmed that with knowledge of a nation's climate, food, altitude and other physical surroundings, an accurate statement could be made of their mental traits and moral character. Although the index of his work does not contain the word "environment," it was he who brought the idea into modern sociology and caused it to be a guiding factor in the interpretation of history. Since then the word "environment" has bulked large in literature.

The net result of this study has been a great gain in human progress. We have come to see how necessary it is to provide wholesome surroundings for the development of the life of a people. Neither the isolation of the wilderness nor the congestion of the over-crowded tenement affords the best environment for physical or moral life. Lovers of their fellow men are feeling as never before a burning passion and a mighty conviction of duty. Better roads and better facilities of communication have well-nigh destroyed the isolation of rural life, but there still remains the problem of making our cities fit places for human habitation.

Still, when all has been said that may be said concerning the importance of environment, it is well for us to remember that environment itself is not sufficient. The oak and the pine have the same environment, so has the weed and the tares. The rattlesnake and prairie dog are said to live in the same hole—how peacefully we do not know—but the same environment seems to be suited to both. It is said to be a favorite trick of the cuckoo to lay her eggs in a pigeon's nest, thus shirking her own maternal responsibility. But neither the nest nor the companionship of young pigeons, nor the sheltering breast of the pigeon-mother transforms the young cuckoo into a dove. Out of the same home and with the same surroundings go forth good boys and bad boys—boys who bring honor to their fathers and boys who break their mothers' hearts. A good home, a good name, a good education are all desirable, but none of these things in itself can make a life what it ought to be.

If anything, we are doing too much proportionately in the way of environment. We are deluging our children with books and toys and things that belong to that which is external. We need to discipline our young people in habits of self-forgetfulness, courtesy and resisting power. We need to strengthen all holy impulses and to train young life in those powers within, which alone can make character that is competent, forceful and effective.

Just here is where much of our modern effort breaks down. We are buying our daughters pianos and our sons automobiles, and sending both of them to college. We are mistaken in thinking these things are other than environment, so long as they are provided by the parents and merely appropriated by the children. In many cases these elements of environment are merely stage scenery, expensive and elaborate, to decorate the tragic scene of moral failure. What we should be doing is to give them power of moral resistance; to establish them in power to stand alone; to root and ground them in the fundamental virtues. School and college will not save them; music and gasoline will not hold them true to their faith. Nothing can save them if it be merely put upon them from without, or accepted by them without effort of their own. Your children may be angels, and you may surround them with an earthly paradise. Environment is not enough. What is needed above all else is character, strength of will, heroism and devotion to duty. These alone can give safety to us and to our children after us.

Environment changes. No man can provide forever a favorable environment for his son. Today he is in the shelter of the home, but who knows where he is to be tomorrow. The only safe thing is to make character so independent of environment that wherever a man may be placed it shall be known and recognized that he can be trusted to do a man's whole duty.

Let us do our very best to provide a good environment for our own children and for other people's children; but let us, above all that we put around them, seek to put into their lives stability of moral purpose, high ideals, and right motives that will be true to God and duty in any environment. Otherwise the story of the fall of the angels, the story of the Garden of Eden, will come in for endless repetition. The real garden of God is within the soul. Heaven, the heaven from which no angel can be cast down, is the heaven within.

Present Conditions in Mexico

BY IRVING HERR.

Editor's Note: Mr. Herr, who occupies a responsible position with a large mining establishment in Mexico, has just arrived with his family, at his home in the United States, the household leaving its baggage in Mexico. The mines owned by Americans are still in operation under supervision of Mexican overseers.

IN discussing this question, the first fact to be considered is that Mexico is a large country and that conditions in any particular part of it may be decidedly different from those in other parts.

The writer, although he has lived in Mexico for the past twelve years, feels that he is really competent to judge only those conditions existing among the mining population—a not inconsiderable portion of Mexico's laboring class, since mining forms one of Mexico's formost industries.

The state of Guanajuato, although largely agricultural, is also a great mining state, and the principal mines are located in the vicinity of the city of Guanajuato, which is the state capital.

Institute Corona, Guadalajara, Mexico.

The mines of Guanajuato really support the city and employ thousands of laborers. Throughout the past three years, the state has been practically free of revolutionary troubles and the laboring class has remained steadily at work, apparently taking no interest in political questions. They have been content to have Huerta for their president, and in so far as they are able to think at all upon large questions, have wondered what the trouble is between Huerta and the United States, and why their countrymen of the North are fighting and killing their brothers of the South.

THREE CLASSES IN MEXICO.

By this time everyone knows that Mexico has three social classes. The largest in number is the laboring class, often called the peon, numbering probably from 75 per cent to 80 per cent of the total.

Following this is a large middle class, comprising the small shopkeepers, skilled laborers, business and professional men.

Finally the top layer, the wealthy land owners and leisure class.

It is with this peon class that the writer is most familiar. In Guanajuato, at least, these are not the down-trodden, exploited, suffering people that they are often painted, especially in the United States.

They possess little, as a rule living in adobe huts with mud floors, their principal earthly possessions consisting of a blanket and sombrero, a few cooking utensils and a happy, carefree disposition. They have no care or thought beyond the present and provide nothing for tomorrow. They are very much like children and we treat them as we would children.

By nature they are docile and obedient, and as a rule have an inborn politeness and graciousness in their dealings with each other and with their superiors.

This trait, however, seems to be on the decline, especially since the revolutionary troubles began.

The greatest handicap to the material and moral advance of this large class of people is not their political condition, nor the dictatorial form of government under which they live and suffer. Liquor and the Catholic church are in the writer's opinion far more responsible for their low condition. Include the church, because this makes no attempt to discourage the use of liquor among the peons, and also fails to encourage thrift and steady labor. Innumerable fiestas or holy days are observed in Mexico and the laborers warned not to work on those days by the priests, whereas in civilized countries they are not observed by the Catholic church by direction of the Pope.

On these days, after an early attendance at mass, the balance of the day is usually devoted to drinking, and in addition a day's wages are lost.

The wages paid by the mining companies are good, and many a peon could have his little plot of land and a small home of his own if he saved his earnings, instead of squandering them in drink and gambling.

GOVERNMENT BY AN IRON HAND.

Of self government they have no idea whatever. They are used to being governed by the iron hand, and in fact admire and respect that kind of government. If they have any idea of liberty, it is that liberty means license and the right to do as they please.

The peon does not hate the foreigners. I am quite sure that as a rule he would rather work for a foreigner than for a Mexican, because with all his ignorance, he has a shrewd mind and realizes that the foreigner treats him much more justly than a native Christian master.

He is, however, very easily influenced, and one or two labor agitators, or political agitators, can work havoc in a well ordered community, if allowed free rein. Unfortunately he will believe for a time at least anything he hears, especially anything that gives promise of a better future for him, or an easier living.

It is for this reason that it is so easy to recruit forces for a revolution. A few promises on the part of an unscrupulous leader, the prospect of loot and an easy free life is enough to make a patriot fighting for his country out of a great many of the lower class.

Of real patriotism there is practically none in Mexico, and I speak now of this nation as a whole.

The press talks in high flown language of the beloved fatherland, the love of country that fills to overflowing the loyal hearts of Mexico's valiant sons, urging them to shed their last drop of blood to repel the hated Yankee, the Colossus of the North, etc. But it is all talk.

Patriotism there is not.

The anti-foreign feeling is excited artificially by the lying press of Mexico. Lies so gross, so palpable as are unimaginable by an American are printed and are believed not only by the laboring class, but but by many of the middle class as well.

That Mexico contains within herself the elements necessary to establish and maintain a democratic form of government I do not believe. The very men most strongly supporting Madero during his candidacy, for president turned against him as soon as it became apparent that they could not have all their personal desires satisfied. It is the old question of the outs wishing to be in and the ins to stay in, and any means to gain their ends are used even though it may mean the killing and wounding of thousands of their fellows.

For such a people democratic governernment is not possible, except they grow up to it; and this means a matter of years, and of struggle. The beginning should be made at the bottom, and not at the top.

Let the small community first learn to elect the jefe politico, or local policemayor, and to abide by the rules of the election. In time the state could elect its governor. In this way during the course of years the meaning of democracy would be learned.

In the meantime the central government should remain a military one, for it is the only one that can maintain order, and there must be order.

Christianity at Mecca's Gates

BY J. C. ARCHER.

Editor's Note: Mr. J. C. Archer is one of the Disciples now studying at Yale University. He is especially qualified to write of the work among the Mohammedans because of the fact that he faced Mohammedanism while located at Jubblepore, India, as a missionary. Harlan P. Beach writes enthusiastically of Mr. Archer's fitness to discuss this problem, not only on account of his experience in the field but also by reason of his study of their mighty religion, its language and its scriptures, since his return to study at Yale. The current campaign of Mohammedan education being carried on by Dr. Zwemer, the prophet of Moslem missions, in this country, and the selection by the Zurich convention of Moslem missions as a theme for special study in the Sunday-school, make this article of Mr. Archer's especially timely.

THIS article is suggested by an occasion and an observation. One of the few great students of Mohammedanism, Prof. Snouck Hurgronje, of the University of Leiden, is now in America delivering a series of lectures on topics within his field. During his recent visit to Yale, it was the great privilege of the writer to spend a delightful hour in conversation with him.

The visit the Holland professor is making gives opportunity for observing that among Americans there is a general lack of acquaintance with and interest in the history, life and problems of Islam. Many of our people think of the founder of Islam in the terms in which Carlyle idealized him. Others think of him as merely a gross sensualist, the type of a sensual and fanatical race. Many judge Islam as Islam usually judges Christianity—by its worst features. It is plain history that these two religions have most often met with their worst feet forward. Our prevalent opinion of Islam is likely a heritage from the time the Saracens were a terror to our ancestors and all Europe. Their dominant thought of Christianity has come in large measure from their contact with very unrepresentative sects, and from the unholy wars waged by Christendom for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre. The Cross and Crescent have had unfortunate dealings with each other. It is time for both to avoid all further occasions of offense and misunderstanding and adopt an attitude of sympathy and appreciation. Of all the important religious systems of the day Christianity and Islam are nearest akin. Each looks upon the world as its field. Each has already made tremendous conquests and is still advancing rapidly.

A GIGANTIC STRUGGLE.

The struggle between Christianity and Islam for the ultimate supremacy is one of gigantic proportions. The Moslem advance is that of an enemy that gives no quarter. That is not the method of Christianity. And yet there is a way of firm opposition to further Moslem conquest and a way of entrance into the very heart of traditional Islam. No final success, however, can be gained by Christianity unless it be hoped for on the basis of intelligent and enthusiastic campaigning, unless the whole Christian Church become aroused to its opportunity.

One very unique thing about Professor Hurgronje is that he was once a resident of the city of Mecca. He was there six months—a Christian in the Holy City of Islam—and yet he is alive to tell the story. A wide reader and far traveler expressed much surprise lately when told that Mecca is a city sealed to non-Moslems, that a Christian especially risks his life in going there. It has been thus for a thousand years, and yet he did not know it! How little the ordinary man must know of the Mohammedan world!

Mr. J. C. Archer, of Yale University.

The professor did not go to Mecca as a Moslem, but he took other precautions. For example, he lived many months in an Arab tent in Africa in order to acquire the "smell" that would allow him to go, even among dogs, unmarked as a stranger. He even changed the color of his skin. He had long before mastered the Arabic tongue. But no precautions would have availed had the Meccans suspected his real religion. Surely a Christian should be able to go to Mecca just as freely and as openly as a Mohammedan may go to Paris or Berlin. But Mecca is closed. And the attitude of the religious capital of Islam is typical of that which thoroughgoing Islamism takes toward all other systems of faith. The exclusiveness and the intolerance of Islam seem so much out of harmony with the best interests of the world.

But Islam is changing. She has suffered in war, and some fair parts of her political empire have been torn from her. The Balkan wars were for a time almost as much a shock to the Islamic consciousness as was Tours. Albania, free from Turkish civil control, is sitting in judgment on Turkey's religion—she is planning to become free of Mohammedanism also and to become a Protestant Christian state. These political changes may have added something to Moslem bitterness, but they have also caused an appreciable readjustment from within. Many leading Moslems themselves see that former policies are quite unfit for present general conditions.

A CHANGING ORDER.

Islam was a changing order even before she felt the pressure of armed force. The voice of the Turkish Constitutionalists had been heard and the old Sultanate had been done away. In India and Egypt especially more intimate contact with the culture of the West had begun to stir the social and intellectual life of Moslems.

This inner and somewhat voluntary readjustment is the significant thing today in Mohammedanism. Liberalism in education is coming to prominence. A new type of Islam is issuing from Aligarh in India and from the new university in Egypt. Faint departures are noticeable even in old Al Azhar, and several orthodox doctors of the law have already betaken themselves to Mecca, there to live and teach in quiet. Historic criticism has found its way (at Aligarh) to the Koran and the Traditions of the Prophet. Mohammedanism in the face of the best types of Christianity is becoming slightly aware of the need of apology. It is seen that Moslem ethics theory must accommodate itself to the newer social demands. Here and there Moslem women are protesting against the veil and the harem. The traditional Islam must fall: it cannot stand the strain of its own exclusiveness nor the pressure of the new world's demands. Conservatism will make its last stand in Mecca. But there will be in the end a second capture of the sacred city, with the destruction then of the idols of unrestricted concubinage, slavery and polygamy, and the dissipation of false conceptions of God and his Christ.

Changing Islam lends emphasis to the fact of Christian opportunity. Direct conversions of Mohammedans have been few, though not negligible. The gains of Christianity in Mohammedan Sumatra are reasons for sound hope. Some notable individual conversions have been made in various lands. But hope for the final success of the religion of Christ must be based on a change of policy. The plan of "converting" the "heathen" or the Mohammedan—in the old sense of the term—must be abandoned. The task of Christian missions and other Christian agencies is to Christianize. Conversion has meant too often the acceptance by the convert of some set of sectarian dogmas. Christianization would draw and win men to nothing but the gospel of Jesus Christ. Conversion has usually implied the utter uselessness of all the elements of the convert's former life, the falsity of all his beliefs, the immorality of all his practices. Christianization would burn out all the dross of the old, yet would leave unscorched what there was of real value. In such a way method would not break with itself. Christianity may call upon certain individual Mohammedans to cast away all their own past, but it may not, with much hope of success, call upon the Moslem world to wipe its system clean off the slate. Christian opportunity lies in the direction of cleansing and control.

A RIPE OPPORTUNITY.

It is not to be supposed that Islam has had no values. There are traces in Mohammed of sincerity and genuine prophetic inspiration. The work he did in his own day was wonderful, and its results have reached very far. The sins of Islam lie in the region of ethics more than in that of religion and are thus for our day all the more glaring. But Mohammed had his good qualities and Islam has its virtues. These things may not be justly ignored in the work of Christian missions. Moreover, Moslems as men are to play their part in the greater world affairs. To this end it is the task of Christianity to make them useful instruments. Thus it offers them the gospel and the Cross.

Christianity has not the freedom of the house of Islam. A much larger opportunity must be sought and won. A just confidence in the ultimate triumph of the gospel of Christ should not ignore the constraining power of appreciation and love. Only thus may Christianity win its way to the gates of Mecca and into the very heart of Islam.

A Minister's Friends

With Suggestions From the Life and Times of Jeremiah.

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

IN a sense, every minister lives a lonely life. Many as may be the number of those who love him and whom he loves, his position does not lend itself to intimate friendships. Entire familiarity is not easy in his position, even though he be at heart a most companionable man, and one who loves friends.

For instance, there was the Rev. Dr. Jeremiah. He was a tender-hearted man, who longed for companionship, and got very little of it. There is a verse in Ezekiel that troubled me when I read it. Ezekiel was preaching in Babylon, and what happened in Jerusalem he did not know very well. It took news an astonishingly long time to get back and forth. It was a year and a half after the city was destroyed before Ezekiel found it out, and then he learned it through a fugitive. So he did not know very well what was happening, but he kept as close track of movements there as he could. And he knew things were going very badly, and he blamed very nearly every one for it. This is what he said of Jerusalem and her leaders in one of his sermons:

STANDING IN THE GAP.

"Her princes in the midst thereof are like wolves ravening the prey, to shed blood, and to destroy souls, that they may get dishonest gain. And her prophets have daubed for them with untempered mortar, seeing false visions, and divining lies unto them, saying, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, when Jehovah hath not spoken. The people of the land have used oppression, and exercised robbery; yea, they have vexed the poor and needy, and have oppressed the sojourner wrongfully. And I sought for a man among them, that should build up the wall, and stand in the gap before me for the land, that I should not destroy it; but I found none. Therefore have I poured out mine indignation upon them; I have consumed them with the fire of my wrath; their own way have I brought upon their heads, saith the Lord Jehovah." (Ezek. 22:24-31.)

Not a man to stand in the gap! That was the very thing Jeremiah had been doing and was doing. He had been at it for a quarter of a century, and was still at it, in season and out of season. And Ezekiel did not appear to recognize it! Ezekiel's wholesale denunciation is as if some minister in Chicago should say, "Boston is utterly given over to religious fads, and her ministers are preaching every new heresy, and not the Gospel;" or as if some Boston preacher should say, "Chicago is sunk in commercialism, and she has not a preacher who dares lift up his voice and condemn it." You and I know that bad as Boston is, and bad as Chicago is, there are noble men and fearless ministers in each city, and any wholesale denunciation on the part of either would be in bad taste.

LACK OF HARMONY BETWEEN PROPHETS.

Now I wonder why Ezekiel said that. He probably knew Jeremiah before Ezekiel left Jerusalem. He certainly heard of him, and knew of his preaching, and knew that he sent letters to Babylon. But in those letters Jeremiah never referred to Ezekiel, and Ezekiel in his denunciations never made any exceptions in favor of Jeremiah. I think there is an explanation, and I do not now stop to explain it. I merely call attention to the fact that those two prophets, though they belonged to rival priestly families and to opposite political parties, might have been a lot of comfort to each other, and do not appear to have been. I do not mean that they quarreled. They did nothing of the kind; but though their books show that they influenced each other more or less, they worked in isolation, neither doing anything to help the other. To be sure they were a long way apart, but it is not by any means certain they would have agreed if they had worked together. They were doing the same great work, and preaching essentially the same great message, but they did not work together.

My own impression is that while they knew of each other, and realized that they were preaching substantially the same message, they were so separated to begin with by the old-time rivalry of their respective denominations—for there were denominations in that day—and by their adherence to two different factions in Jewish politics, that it was better for them to have worked completely apart. But I do not know this. I know only what the Bible tells. Jeremiah and Ezekiel, had they been friends and correspondents, might have cheered each other, and so far as we know they did not. There may have been a good reason for it, but I am sorry it was so.

HIS FRIENDS APPRECIATED HIM.

But Jeremiah had some friends among the ministers. First of all there was Baruch. He was to Jeremiah what Boswell was to Samuel Johnson. He stood by Jeremiah in his conflict with Jehoiakim. He was his recognized attendant and amanuensis. I notice that Prof. Moses Buttenwieser, a Jewish professor in Cincinnati, in his recent volume on the prophets, contends that Jeremiah himself was illiterate, and that but for Baruch we should never have had the written sermons of Jeremiah. I know far less about the Jewish prophets than Professor Buttenwieser, but I do not in the least agree with him. The Apostle Paul never wrote a letter with his own hand so far as we know, and he certainly was not illiterate. I would not be hammering out these articles with painful labor on a typewriter if I could afford a stenographer. Paul had several amanuenses, serving him from time to time. But Jeremiah for twenty years had but one, who was faithful to him all that time. Not only so, but Baruch was a prince, a man of high family. He gave up large ambitions to be with Jeremiah. Jeremiah recognized this and appreciated it, and warned him against his ambitions.

BARUCH THE FAITHFUL FRIEND.

"The word that Jeremiah the prophet spake unto Baruch the son of Neriah, when he wrote these words in a book at the mouth of Jeremiah, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah, king of Judah, saying, Thus saith Jehovah, the God of Israel, unto thee, O Baruch: Thou didst say, Woe is me now! for Jehovah hath added sorrow to my pain; I am weary with my groaning, and I find no rest. Thus shalt thou say unto him, Thus saith Jehovah: Behold, that which I have built will I break down, and that which I have planted I will pluck up; and this is in the whole land. And seekest thou great things for thyself? seek them not; for, behold, I will bring evil upon all flesh, saith Jehovah; but thy life will I give unto thee for a prey in all places whither thou goest." (Jer. 45:1-5.)

Jeremiah had this great comfort, God would never take Baruch away from him. He would be faithful; Baruch's rank would protect him from violence; and he would outlive Jeremiah. He did so, and preserved the writings of the old prophet; and I only wish he had put them into better order. Baruch had many virtues, but the methodical arrangement of literary material was not one of them. Otherwise I should not have to thumb the book of Jeremiah through and through and back again as I am doing while telling you these stories.

What a comfort was one such friend! And Jeremiah had others.

There was the prophet Uriah. He could not do much, except to believe in again, and get himself killed for the doing of it. Yes, and his murder was the Jeremiah and preach his sermons over meanest act of that contemptible cur, Jehoiakim. I call him a cur, because Jeremiah pre-empted the name "ass" with which to label him. That miserable coward of a king, not daring to murder Jeremiah, killed him by proxy. He secured a writ of extradition and brought Uriah home from Egypt and killed him as an insult to Jeremiah. The cowardly, contemptible, bloody murderer! This is the way it happened. They were accusing Jeremiah of treason for declaring that Jerusalem was to be destroyed, but his friends defended him by proving that Micah had said the same thing, and had not been killed for it. That precedent saved the life of Jeremiah, and you can read all about it in the 26th chapter of his biography. But when the king found he could not kill Jeremiah, he sent to Egypt and brought Uriah home and murdered him. Here is the record of that infamous crime:

"Then said the princes and all the people unto the priests, and to the prophets: This man is not worthy of death; for he hath spoken to us in the name of Jehovah our God. Then rose up certain of the elders of the land, and spake to all the assembly of the people, saying, Micah the Morashtite prophesied in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah; and he spake to all the people of Judah, saying, Thus saith Jehovah of hosts: Zion shall be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of a forest. Did Hezekiah king of Judah and all Judah put him to death? did he not fear Jehovah, and entreat the favor of Jehovah, and Jehovah repented him of the evil which he had pronounced against them? Thus should we commit great evil against our own souls.

MURDERED BY PROXY.

And there was also a man that prophesied in the name of Jehovah, Uriah the son of Shemaiah of Kiriath-jearim; and he prophesied against this city and against this land according to all the words of Jeremiah. And when Jehoiakim the king, with all his mighty men, and all the princes, heard his words, the king sought to put him to death: but when Uriah heard it, he was afraid, and fled, and went into Egypt. And Jeremiah the king sent men into Egypt, namely, Elnathan the son of Achbor, and certain men with him, into Egypt; and they fetched forth Uriah out of Egypt, and brought him unto Jehoiakim the king, who slew him with the sword, and cast his dead body into the graves of the common people. But the hand of Ahikam the son of Shaphan was with Jeremiah, that they should not give him into the hand of the people to put him to death."

You see, it was the princes that defended Jeremiah, and employed able counsel who sought out this ruling of the supreme court, which saved Jeremiah's life. He had influential friends. And Ahikam was among them! Ahikam was the son of a prominent man, and he took Jeremiah home to board, and Jeremiah had good things to eat, and a quiet place to study, and some one to answer the telephone, and a good stenographer. Hurrah for Ahikam! He protected the old minister, and nobody dared take him from under the roof of Ahikam.

And Jeremiah had obscure friends, who helped him from time to time. Do you remember the thoughtfulness of the old colored man in providing rags when they pulled Jeremiah out of the cistern? You don't? Well, it is a story you ought to know, and it is in the Bible. I know the name of that thoughtful old darkey, and maybe I will tell you about it in a later story.

Leaders of Men and Millions

ROBERT A. LONG, OF THE BUSINESS MEN'S COMMISSION OF THE MEN AND MILLIONS MOVEMENT.

EVERYBODY in Kansas City, Missouri, knows R. A. Long, where he lives and has his business headquarters. He is a leading citizen of the town, interested in every good work, including charity and philanthropy, civic pride and church work. The Y. M. C. A. recognized this when they reelected him as a trustee. The Anti-saloon forces proclaimed this when they placed his name at the head of the list of marshals of a recent demonstration, and he rode a prancing charger at the head of the column.

Citizens in Columbus, Kan., know Mr. Long, because he started in the lumber business in that modest town, with small capital, but lots of grace and grit, and made good, intending, as he says now, to spend his life there. He is still mightily interested in Columbus's affairs, and goes back occasionally for a visit, as on a recent occasion when the Christian Church was dedicated.

A NATIVE KENTUCKIAN.

Old Kentucky people know and love Mr. Long, because he is a native son—a Corncracker, as it were, and with others, proudly holds aloft the reputation of the state as one of the chief contributors of men of worth to the world. Mr. Long was born on a farm near Shelbyville, Ky., December 17, 1850. His mother was a relative of the famous Blackburn family, whom everyone in Kentucky knows and honors. The common schools of the county and a boys' school at the county seat are responsible for Mr. Long's early education, but it is to the "School of Hard Knocks" that most credit is to be given, for the bulk of Mr. Long's education was secured there.

Mr. Long began life as a farmer. Later he became a clerk in a store. Then he began to climb the ladder of fame and fortune as owner and manager of a retail lumber yard. His business prospered, or rather, he made it prosper. He saved his money and when lumber was low priced, he bought, and when it was high, he sold. That principle has guided his business life. Today, R. A. Long is said to control thirteen of the largest lumber companies in the world, which own eleven modern sawmill plants and eighty-seven retail lumber yards, and thousands of acres of virgin forest, principally in the south, with several small lines of railways affording these mills an outlet. The R. A. Long Building in Kansas City, the first steel skeleton office building erected in the city, is the property of Mr. Long. At this writing another property has just been completed and added to the R. A. Long collection, being a model farm of some sixteen hundred acres, located in Jackson County adjacent to Kansas City. Here is the summer home of the Long family, barns for Miss Loula's string of fine horses, in which her father takes great pride, herds of finest cattle, dairy, creamery, etc., etc. Like every other property, it is hoped to make the farm pay for itself if it can, and it usually can. While lumber is his greatest interest, Mr. Long has made a few investments in Kansas City utilities, such as gas and street railway plants, a bank or two, the boat line, etc. His city residence located on Gladstone Boulevard is the finest in the nation outside of New York.

Mr. R. A. Long.

A DEMOCRATIC FAMILY.

Mrs. Long, to whom her husband gives much credit for his business successes, is a retiring lady, much like her husband in this respect, and perhaps a bit more so. She is thoroughly democratic, helping at church bazaars and suppers and in all church work in the freest and heartiest fashion. Mrs. Hayne Ellis and Miss Loula, with the former's husband, Lieutenant Hayne Ellis, U. S. N., and their children, complete the family, and they are all much in each other's company.

The Gideons of Illinois have as their slogan "100,000 Bibles for Illinois Hotels!" They have placed 60,000 already.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

EDITORIAL

A NEW DAY IN INDIANA.

THE feeling prevailed at the Indiana state convention last week that the Disciples of Christ were entering a new era in their work in that state. New men have recently come to leadership. They are undertaking their task with a higher order of church statesmanship than has ever before obtained. And there is a heartening response from the churches to the recent generous gifts made to the state work by Mr. Marshall T. Reeves, of Columbus.

But more significant than anything else, a profound sense of spiritual need and aspiration found oft-repeated expression both in public address and prayer and in private conversation. The old controversies are dead among Indiana Disciples. A new era of religious life seems about to dawn.

The possibilities of the situation now obtaining in that state kindle the imagination of any one who has eyes to see.

MR. TODD AND DR. AMES.

CARRYING out our promise to express an opinion on the subject of mysticism as discussed by Mr. Todd and Doctor Ames we quote two paragraphs. Mr. Todd says:

> Religion is primarily and essentially not a matter of institutions and ceremonials and beliefs—it is not even a matter of deeds, however benevolent and disinterested, such as "visiting the fatherless and the widows in their affliction"—but a matter of communion with the Highest. The deeds follow, as do also the forms of worship and the institutions through which it expresses itself and the rules of conduct which we call beliefs. But religion itself, in its essential nature, is a fellowship between kindred souls.

Doctor Ames says:

> All religion in its vital expression is devotion to some great task. It is the attempt to build the kingdom of God, to create an ideal social order, to make of one family all the people of the earth. That was the dream of the ancient prophets, that was the mission of Jesus, that has been the ideal of all Christian reformers and missionaries. It is in this sense that Mr. Todd is justified in saying that religion is a matter of will. It is an act, a deed, an achievement.

These two quotations epitomize the clashing views of the two articles which appeared in The Christian Century last week. One says religion is direct friendly intercommunion between God and the soul. The other says religion is unselfish devotion to the social task of building the Kingdom of God.

To one the distinctive religious impulse finds its meaning in the social order. A social order conformed to Jesus' idea of the Kingdom of God is the end for which this universe exists and toward which all divine forces are carrying it. The attainment of such a social order is the ultimate motif of creation. To be religious, therefore, is to freely and fully give oneself in service to aid in bringing in the Kingdom of justice.

To the other the distinctive religious impulse finds its meaning and satisfaction in the soul itself. Souls, not a social order, are the end for whose creation this universe exists. The production of individual souls is the ultimate motif of creation. Souls do not exist for the social order, but the social order exists for souls. The importance of the Kingdom of God inheres in this, that it is only in a social order conformed to Jesus' idea of the Kingdom of God that souls have a chance to come to their own. Therefore, while religion embraces the social order and is hollow and false if it tries to exist apart from the social order, it can not be stated in terms of the social order. For the social order is not an end, but a means to an end; the end, the goal, toward which the whole creation moves, is the soul itself.

Of these two views The Christian Century finds itself in closer affinity with Mr. Todd's view than with Dr. Ames'. We believe that religion is the appreciation of life from the standpoint of and in terms of the ultimate worth of the individual soul. What kind of a universe must this be, that makes the bringing forth of my soul and of other souls like mine the end and aim of all its groaning and travail? This is the fundamental question of religion. Our answer to it, our full response, IS religion.

One could very well be devoted to a great task, could even be an effective laborer in building the Kingdom of righteousness in the world of men, and still not be religious. Religion is personal goodness plus; it is social service plus. It is our reflective interpretation of personal goodness and social service, our insight as to the ultimate meaning and worth of the things we are doing, the life we are living. It is the discovery of what, as individual souls, we are worth to God.

But if we cannot accept as adequate Dr. Ames' definition of religion, no more can we accept Mr. Todd's psychological explanation of his own definition. The resort to some non-intellectual "faculty" to account for what he calls "mystical knowledge" of God conveys no meaning to us. Against the dominant mode of thinking in our day we affirm the central importance of the intellect in true religious experience. Mysticism we believe in, not as something apart from knowledge, but as the recognition of the fact that the reality is more than our knowledge; that any concept or image whatever with which we approach reality is but a pale symbol of reality; that reality—God—is more than our best thought about Him.

Happily, Doctor Ames' statement, so wholesome and sane in its close touch with concrete experience, suggests at the close that he may not be so far from Mr. Todd's view after all. In his final paragraph he says the power of the preacher depends upon his ability "to direct the activities of the church into fruitful channels and at the same time GIVE THESE ACTIVITIES THEIR IDEAL INTERPRETATION AND TO EMPLOY ADEQUATE SYMBOLS, SUCH AS THE ARTS AFFORD, FOR THE SUPPORT OF THE FAITH AND COURAGE OF HIS PEOPLE." The words which we have put in small capitals describe the thing that is distinctively religious.

RELIGION IS, TO OUR MIND, THE IDEALIZATION OF SOCIAL SERVICE AND PERSONAL GOODNESS.

That is what God means to us. Our concept of God is the supreme symbol by which we grasp the ideal, the spiritual, and the eternal values of our life. What Mr. Todd calls direct communion with God is, it seems to us, from Doctor Ames' point of view, the momentary and habitual detachment of the soul from its moral tasks to see these tasks whole, to relate them to the cosmic Will and so to gain courage and faith to go back to them with renewed power and insight.

PERSONAL EVANGELISM.

THE Gospel gives us a very interesting account of the conduct of the very first disciples of Jesus. Two of them went out within twenty-four hours and brought to Him another disciple each. One of the first two who followed Jesus was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. "He first findeth his own brother Simon, and brought him to Jesus." It was the most natural thing for him to do, and the very first thing that occurred to him to do. It was the best day's work he ever did. The next day Jesus found another disciple, Philip, and Philip did the very same thing. That very day he found Nathaniel, and said, "We have found the Messiah, Jesus the son of Joseph." Jesus did not waste any time reproving Philip for thinking He was the son of Joseph, nor tell Nathaniel that he could not be a disciple so long as he thought so; He said, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile." If Nathaniel really needed to learn that Jesus was not the son of Joseph, the place to learn it was in fellowship with Him. He took Nathaniel gladly, and gave him a hearty welcome, and they went together. The beautiful thing about the story is the perfect naturalness of it. These men came to Jesus with defective theology and unsanctified ambition, but with glad hearts and wills that were ready to become submissive to the will of Christ. That was the first thing. Then they turned straight about and went out after their friends. We need another campaign of just that kind of evangelism. If between now and summer each reader of this editorial will seek with God's help to win one soul for Christ, we shall have a great revival. There is nothing so effective as personal evangelism. Let us have more of it.

COLORADO AND COATSVILLE.

A MINISTER from Coatsville, Pa., stood in the street opposite Mr. Rockefeller's office and read the burial service for the men who have been killed in Colorado. The cameras clicked while he did it, and the newspapers showed the pictures of the minister and a little group of his spectacular friends in this singular service. Nobody in New York attended. If we remember correctly, a minister from New York went to Coatsville not so very long ago, and hired a hall, and held a funeral service for a Negro who had been murdered by the town of Coatsville, and nobody in Coatsville attended. It is interesting that Coatsville should now be the pot that has discovered the blackness of Colorado's kettle. Coatsville showed about as little conscience as any community on earth could have manifested for its own sin, but has religion to spare over the sin of Colorado.

We are a sinful and a bloody nation. The sin of Coatsville is significant because it might have been the sin of Colorado or Camden or Columbus or California or Chicago. Human life is woefully cheap among us. We are flattered by our own frequent declarations that ours is a twentieth century civilization, and that the wicked and belated nations near us need us to civilize them. We are forever sending ministers from Coatsville to read the burial service for Colorado. Let us rather hold a service of humiliation for Coatsville, Colorado and America as a whole. God be merciful to us, sinners.

MEANTIME KEEP COOL.

THE question whether we are to have war depends largely on how many people are in a state of mind that expects war. As soon as war is believed inevitable, war becomes at the very least psychologically possible. We are not a very reasonable nation; there are no reasonable nations. We are more or less given to popular hysteria, and are exceedingly influenced by our momentary impulses. War is largely a state of mind. We have decided to accept the good offices of Argentine, Brazil and Chile. We can afford now to be patient. What if they decide that we were not justified under the forms of international law, in establishing a blockade without a declaration of war? It is best for us to accept the decision, though it should disappoint us. Meantime, we shall have saved life, kept faith, added to the ties that bind us to the nations of greater America (and those ties are none too many or too strong) and have shown to the world that a great nation on the very verge of war can stop in obedience to the demands of reason and conscience and submit to the arbitrament of a court more just than that of the sword. If the decision is in our favor, we can press our demands on Huerta with confidence that the conscience of the world is on our side. We have accepted mediation; now keep cool, and await the result.

THE INSTRUCTORS INSTRUCTED.

EIGHT prominent Chicago men, including one minister, were sentenced to jail for contempt of court, and were held prisoners for several hours till they completely retreated before the court and purged themselves of their contempt. They were members of the Chicago school board. The judge in reading the sentence told them that they could not expect school children to respect the courts and the laws if school boards did not do so. Amen. And if legislatures and courts would respect the laws, and now and then would make the laws and their administration more respectable, it would help still more. We are inclined to think that the judge was right and that these men deserved what he said to them. Incidentally, we are glad to read in the papers that while the other men smoked while waiting in the judge's chambers, the minister did not. This particular minister used to be a liberal user of cigarettes, and we are glad to read that he has stopped. It is well enough that men who are on the school board or in the pulpit, and who teach boys that cigarettes are bad, should themselves eschew the cigarette. We are as glad of this purging as we are that the eight members have purged themselves of contempt of court.

TIMES HAVE CHANGED!

PRELIMINARY meetings looking toward the organization of a new church of Disciples on the north side of Chicago were held last Sunday. Addresses were made by Prof. H. L. Willett and Rev. O. F. Jordan, and it is said that a goodly company of interested people was present.

It isn't such a big piece of news to chronicle the fact that the Disciples have organized a new church. That sort of thing is happening all the time. But in this case the significant thing is that the Disciples were requested by the Chicago Federal Council of Churches to plant a church in just this place. The request came two or three years ago. It has taken a long time to respond to it. Three other similar requests are on file in the Chicago Disciples' secretary's office.

It would seem that an encouraging stage of unity has been already reached when Congregationalists and Baptists and Presbyterians and Methodists point out a great field to the Disciples and say, You go in and possess it, and God's blessing and ours attend you!

It was not so in days not long since passed by.

The March of the Women

Sung by Five Thousand Suffragists in the Woman Suffrage Parade at Washington, May 9:

Shout, shout, up with your song;
  Cry with the wind for the dawn is breaking;
March, march, swing you along.
  Wide blows our banner and hope is waking.
Song with its story, dreams with their glory,
  Lo, they call and glad is their word.
Louder and louder it swells,
  Thunder and freedom, the voice of the Lord.

Long, long—we in the past
  Cowered in dread from the light of heaven;
Strong, strong—stand we at last,
  Fearless in faith and with sight new given.
Strength with its beauty, life with its duty,
  (Hear the voice, O, hear and obey!)
These, these—beckon us on:
  Open your eyes to the blaze of day.

Life, strife—these two are one,
Naught can ye win but by faith and daring.
On, on—that ye have done,
  But for the work of today preparing.
Firm in reliance, laugh a defiance,
  (Laugh in hope, for sure is the end.)
March, march—many as one,
  Shoulder to shoulder and friend to friend.

The Larger Christian World

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Noted Baptist's Remarkable Will.

The total charitable bequests of the late Daniel Sharp Ford, proprietor of The Youth's Companion, amounted to $3,185,092, distributed as follows: Boston Baptist Social Union, under the will, $1,216,031, to which is added $221,213 the avails of a sum of $125,000 left in trust for his daughter, Ella Ford Hartshorn, during her life, and which was paid to the Social Union after her death, making the total bequests to that organization $1,437,244; to the Foreign Mission Society and the Home Mission Society, $270,813 each; Massachusetts Missionary Society, $180,522, to which is to be added the price of his home, sold after the death of Mrs. Hartshorn, $50,000; Massachusetts Charitable Society, Conference of Baptist Ministers in Massachusetts, Maine Convention, New Hampshire Convention, and the Vermont Convention, $180,542 each; to the Boston Young Men's Christian Association, the Boston Young Women's Christian Association, and the Massachusetts General Hospital, $7,000 each; to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, Boston Public Library and Boston City Hospital, $6,000 each; to Boston Children's Aid Society, and the Children's Hospital in Boston, $5,000 each.

Dr. Clark's Tour Schedule.

The schedule being followed by Dr. Francis E. Clark and wife, in their present tour, covers France, Spain and England. The French Endeavor Convention meets at LaSalle, from which place the Clarks will travel to Barcelona, where the municipal corporation of the city has granted the Spanish Endeavorers the use of the Fine Arts Palace, which has the largest auditorium in the city, seating 3,000 persons. Such recognition for a Protestant religious organization by the public authorities of a Spanish city is said to be something absolutely without precedent in all the history of Spain. Later Dr. Clark is to speak in Valencia, Madrid, Zaragoza and Bilbao. Returning through Paris, the tourists will arrive in London in time for the British national convention, which will occupy a week and which will include a great open air demonstration in Hyde Park.

The Church's Greatest Chance.

J. A. Macdonald, who made the greatest of the many great addresses at Toronto last fall, recently spoke at the Sunday Evening Club, Chicago. His topic was "Love and the Social Order." Doctor Macdonald had much to say of today's startling events, and especially of the church's relation to them. He interpreted the troubles in Colorado and elsewhere as "a cry for social justice, for a man's chance for every man and for brotherhood." "I say of the Stars and Stripes and the union jack that their stains are as deep and damning if we repeat all the oppression and the injustice of Great Britain in our respective countries of the United States and Canada, was the speaker's assertion. Man's inhumanity to man has made thousands mourn. I know the cry of the unprivileged multitudes. I know also that wealth has its problems and there are among the rich those who have a high desire to do justice. For both classes there is no permanent and adequate solution of the problem that does not change the motives and viewpoint of men. This is the church's greatest chance—to reconstruct the brotherhood. It would revive again the old evangel and the old enthusiasm. The modern church has as much as Peter, James, and John had. They had only an idea, but that idea changed the Roman empire. It is for the church to recognize that 'One is your master and ye are brethren;' that 'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye love one another.' Cain tried to solve the problem of destroying competition by killing his brother and then by denying his obligations by sneering, 'Am I my brother's keeper?' Rome tried to solve the problem by the strong lording it over the weak. The cynics called brotherhood a beautiful dream that could never be fulfilled. But Jesus set out to establish a brotherhood in which no man should eat his bread by the sweat of another man's brow; where there would be no social parasites high or low, but one in which a man should be ministered to in proportion to his need and a man should serve in proportion to his possession of power. The realization of this brotherhood is the fulfillment of gospel, and it lies within the reach of the church."

Spiritual Healing Discussed.

Chicago ministers have been discussing Christian Science, inspired by the report of the London Commission of Clergymen and physicians appointed last year by the Conference of the Clerical and Medical Professions to investigate the problem of spiritual healing. The commission's conclusion that "faith or spiritual healing can be permanently effective only in functional disorders as distinguished from organic diseases" found support in some quarters, but was strongly opposed in others. The statement of Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, the Chicago preacher, was illuminating: "I'm glad that the medical profession has spoken in frank recognition of the psychic element in the treatment of disease," he stated, "and I am equally glad that a scientific word has been said concerning the inexorable limits to the power of mind over matter. The mind may clear the mind of the fancies that distress and distort the nerves, but the mind cannot mend a broken bone or tie a severed artery."

Dr. Shailer Mathews on "Statistics."

In an address before the Baptist Ministers' Conference, at Pittsburgh, Dean Shailer Mathews, of the University of Chicago, referring to the ambition of some to add numbers to churches and the denomination, is reported to have said, "Statistics are no more an evidence of efficiency than size is an indication of health; the size may be due to dropsy."

Baptists in Boston in June.

Thousands of Baptists throughout the northern states are beginning to plan to go to Boston, in June, to attend the Northern Baptist Convention, June 17-25.

Charles Stelzle in Winnipeg.

Rev. Charles Stelzle spent the week following Easter Sunday in Winnipeg, Canada, conducting a campaign of social service and evangelism under the auspices of the Manitoba Social Service Council. Mass meetings were conducted every night in "Ralph Connor's" church, meetings were held in the big railroad shops every day at noon, and conferences were conducted every afternoon for special groups. Among the subjects discussed during the campaign were: "Radical Tendencies in the Labor Movement," "Will the Abolition of the Liquor Traffic Create a Labor Panic?" "Why the Church Cannot Advocate Socialism," "How Church and Labor May Coöperate," "Making the Public School Efficient." In one of the meetings Mr. Stelzle spoke to 2,500 persons.

Rural Church Work Considered.

How the rural church may become a powerful factor in building up the social life of a community was illustrated in a series of talks given at one of the closing sessions of the recent Country Life Conference of the University of Wisconsin. One of the striking examples of successful parish effort was related by Rev. Joseph Heyde, of Ashton, Wisconsin. Out of a parish of 84 people, 71 are farmers, and out of these 71 only 7 are renters. In ten years, this pastor predicts, nearly all of these men will be owners. So strong is the neighborhood feeling, and so well are the young people organized, that in eight years only one boy has left the community, and he is now a "professor" in Madison. How the minister may make the school a great community clubhouse, rather than using the church building itself, was illustrated by Rev. W. J. Warner, of Windsor. He explained how a community fair served to bring the people together in a neighborhood which was much divided. That a harvest festival can be made a potent factor in bringing village and country together was the opinion of Rev. Q. L. Dowd of Roscoe, Illinois. He illustrated his talk with a history of the organization of the Roscoe harvest festival.

Count Okuma a Sunday-school Man.

While the attention of the world is being focused upon Japan's new Premier, Count Shigenogbu Okuma, it is a great satisfaction to the friends of the Sunday-school to know that this great Japanese statesman is also a warm friend of the Sunday-school. Count Okuma, as is well known, is one of the Japanese promoters of the World's Sunday-school Convention in Tokyo, and has manifested the most lively interest in the cause.

Is the Preacher Losing Influence?

The Christian Register has something to say regarding the oft-heard statement that the ministry is losing its influence: "The advocacy of no class in a community is more sought for any cause than that of the ministry. The minister is appealed to for assistance first in many matters, and when an important public measure not of special limitation is under consideration, no alliance is more welcome than his. He is looked to until it is proved that his aid is not sufficient. What other class is more influential? The physician can less rely on his time; the lawyer has loyalties which embarrass him in the fields of reform; and the professor is singularly lacking in authority outside the province of his specialty, and is bound up in the scholar's seclusion. Compare the audience which comes under the preacher's influence, even in its scantiest example, with the audience the professor deals with, and even the university can have no boast in comparison with the ministry as to influence in a community. So far from having little influence, a man has more influence according to his deserts in the ministry than he would have in any other profession, if he has the mind to use it."

J. R. Mott for Sunday-School Council.

Dr. Edgar Blake, secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Board of Sunday-schools, and Dr. John R. Mott, chairman of the Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Conference, have been elected advisory members of the executive committee of the World's Sunday-school Association. Both of these prominent leaders in the Christian education of the world's youth have consented to serve in this capacity.

Tokyo School for Religious Education.

Plans are being considered for the erection in Japan of an educational building of unique character. Everyone recognizes the great need in the so-called non-Christian lands for training in Christian leadership of all kinds, and especially is there need of trained Sunday-school leadership. To meet this need for Japan the World's Sunday-school Association purposes to erect, as part of the proposed Tokyo Christian University system, a school of Sunday-school method, similar to the Hartford School of Religious Pedagagy at Hartford, Conn. This school will serve admirably to make permanent the Sunday-school spirit and impulse which may be generated in Japan by the Tokyo Convention.

Northfield Conferences and Schools.

The thirty-second season of the Northfield, (Mass.) conferences and summer schools extends from May 1 to October 1. The following sessions are announced: Bible study courses and special addresses at the Northfield schools and conferences, May 1-October 1. Northfield Seminary commencement and Thirty-fifth Anniversary exercises, May 30-June 2. Student conference (Y. M. C. A.) June 19-28. Young women's conference, July 1-8. Summer school for women's foreign missionary societies, July 10-17. Home mission summer school, July 18-24. Summer school for Sunday-school workers, July 18-25. General conference of Christian workers, August 1-16.

Bishop Hughes Defends His Church.

At a recent New England conference of the Methodists, Bishop Hughes is reported to have attacked certain men who have "slandered the Methodist church" by saying that her old preachers are on the way to the poorhouse. "I have heard words like that again and again," said the Bishop. By talking like that we simply lift a warning all over the country to young men not to enter our ministry. No Methodist clergyman has ever yet gone to a poorhouse, and none ever will. To spread these false rumors is a contemptible injustice to the Church, and is not fair to its future."

Chicago Federation Council to Meet.

The next Union Ministers' Meeting is to be held Monday, May 25, under the auspices of the Church Federation Council. In response to several requests the question of the Bible in the public schools will be discussed. Hon. Wm. E. Church, of the firm of Church and McMurdy, formerly associate Justice of the Supreme Court of South Dakota, and Mr. Thomas E. D. Bradley of the firm of Bradley, Harper and Eheim, formerly Professor in the Chicago Kent College of Law, will be the speakers. These eminent lawyers will present carefully prepared briefs upon the fundamental legal questions involved under the recent adverse decision of the Illinois Supreme Court. While this is primarily a ministers' meeting, all who are interested, both men and women, are cordially invited to attend. The meeting will be held in the Y. M. C. A. Building, 19 S. La Salle Street, at 10:30 A. M., with Dr. Charles Bayard Mitchell in the chair.

BROTHERHOOD.

By Edwin Markham.

The crest and crowning of all good,
Life's final star, is brotherhood;
For it will bring again to earth
Her long-lost poesy and mirth;
Will send new light on every face,
A kingly power upon the race;
And till it comes we men are slaves,
And travel downward to our graves.
Come clear the way, then, clear the way,
Blind creeds and kings have had their day,
Our hope is in the aftermath—
Our hope is in heroic men,
Star-led to build the world again.
To this event the ages ran;
Make way for Brotherhood, make way for man.

Epworth League Celebrates Anniversary.

On May 14, the Epworth League, of the Methodist church, celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary. The League had its origin in the necessity for a single unified organization to take the place of the several societies that were trying to keep themselves individually alive. The convention that set this great young people's movement to going met in Cleveland, in 1889. Delegates from the five church societies came to Central Church, Cleveland, at the invitation of the pastor there. There were three purposes in his mind—consultation, probable federation and possible union. The following interesting story of the meeting is told by the Epworth Herald: "There were twenty-seven men in the little class room of Central Church on May 14, 1889, and when the meeting began no man could forecast the outcome of their discussions. At one time they were so far from agreement that the delegates from one of the societies withdrew, seeing no hope of any profitable result. But two days of conference and fellowship, even though each man was a sturdy defender of his own society, brought broadening vision and hotter eagerness that there should be one great body of young people in the church. Far into the night of the second day every group had given up something and contributed something; there was a happy blunder which settled the vexed question of the name of the new organization, and the Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal Church was born." The League was hailed by some as a providential institution; by others as a child of dissension and division. The news of the Cleveland merger was received by the young people of the whole church with an enthusiasm that swept everything before it, and the record of the first year or two amazed the most sanguine. That the sentiment of the church is still strong for the League was evidenced by the result of a recent questionnaire. The question was put to Methodist workers throughout the country whether the League should be allowed to disappear. Seven hundred persons exultantly replied no. Three said let it die or be absorbed. Our congratulations to this remarkably successful movement at the completion of its first quarter century of achievement!

Baptist Missions in India.

American Baptists have four mission fields in the Empire of India. The oldest is the Burman Mission, established by Adoniram Judson in 1813, although the American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society was not organized until 1814. It has twenty-three stations, and over 60,000 church members are enrolled. The largest number of converts are among the Karens. Their work is 80 per cent self-supporting.

Atlanta Men and Religion Forces Win.

The news comes from Atlanta that the "Citizens' League" has fizzled out. This is the organization formed there to "protect Atlanta's good name" from the publicity of the bulletins put forth by the Men and Religion executive committee.

Revival Converts One-Fourth Town.

Shelbyville, Ill., with a population of about 4,000, has had a remarkable revival under Evangelist E. C. Miller, of South Bend, Ind. One thousand people have professed conversion, among them saloon-keepers, ex-convicts, and bootleggers.

Sixty-One Years in One Pulpit.

Dr. John Clifford has been preaching sixty-one years in the same pulpit. Sixty-one Sundays, suggests a contemporary, comes nearer to the period of service of the average preacher!

Italian Protestant Churches.

In New York city alone there are now twenty-five Italian Protestant churches. One Chicago Italian church has 461 members, and one in New Haven has 500 members. The Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians of America each have about sixty ordained Italian ministers.

P. E. Cathedral for Washington.

An anonymous gift of one-half million dollars toward the construction of the great national cathedral of the Protestant Episcopal Church on Mount St. Albans, in the suburbs of Washington, D. C., was announced recently. The bequest was made through the New York Chapter of the National Cathedral Association.

Disciples Table Talk

Frank Waller Allen to Springfield, Ill.

Frank Waller Allen, pastor at Paris, Mo., for the last seven years, will become pastor of First Church, Springfield, Ill., on September 1. The church of his acceptance has a membership of 800, and recently erected a $120,000 building. This congregation is the largest in the Illinois capital city. Mr. Allen is very appreciative of the opportunity for service afforded him. It is with regret that Paris releases Mr. Allen to Springfield. For he has been much more than a church pastor in the town. He has been a community asset. As a leader in the literary life of Paris and an inspirer of higher social ideals, he has been highly valued. The Paris Mercury has always been a stanch supporter of Mr. Allen's words and works and speaks thus editorially of the citizen Paris is losing: "Frank Allen is not alone a big preacher but a big man as well, uniting to a broad culture in books an intimate and sympathetic knowledge of life and adding to both a capacity for practical achievement and an energy that never tires. He is a progressive in all that the term implies and does things with ease and alacrity. He has made over the local congregation in many ways, putting it abreast modern thought, and in addition to endowing it with a new vision, leaves it with a new and modern $30,000 building. As a citizen and public man, identified with the whole life of the community, he has rendered services yet more incalcuable, having been a constant stimulus to the intellectual activities of the town and a leader in every movement looking to social betterment. How Paris will fill his place, just what it will do without him, is the question now uppermost. In seven years he has become so much a part of us that disassociating him from Paris, or Paris from him, seems well near impossible. The Springfield church will not be long in realizing that its new pastor is a very big and a very potential man."

More About the Kansas City Fire.

As was reported last week, the historic First church at Kansas City, Missouri, burned to the ground, May 9. Further word brings information that in addition to the old plant, the fire destroyed also the half completed new addition, costing $40,000. The cause of the fire is unknown. It is likely that the First church congregation will meet in the Y. M. C. A. auditorium temporarily. T. P. Haley was pastor of First Church, Kansas City, for a score of years. W. F. Richardson succeeded Mr. Haley and has been pastor also a score of years. It is probable that a new edifice will be immediately erected by the Kansas City Disciples, as a memorial to the cause of the "Mother" of Kansas City's twenty-six Disciple churches. Luckily W. F. Richardson's library and study had been removed from the First Church, Kansas City, prior to the fire, and were therefore not destroyed in the fire which laid waste the old and new buildings.

More Union Spirit at Franklin, Ind.

In Franklin, Indiana, where William J. Wright ministers, the congregation of the Baptist church and the faculty of Franklin College, a Baptist institution, came recently in a body 300 strong to worship with the Christian Church. The congregation of the Christian church last year visited every church of the town, and this is the second of the return visits, which are made without announcement, each congregation taking the others by surprise. The churches have so many union meetings of different kinds as to make the Christians of the town feel much like one great communion. Passion week was observed by union meetings, and similar outdoor meetings are planned for the entire summer. There is a disposition on the part of all to "let brotherly love continue."

Methodist Minister Joins Disciples.

W. G. Eldred, pastor at Shelbyville, Ind., reports that J. W. McClure, who has been engaged in the ministry for several years in the Methodist church, united with First church, Shelbyville, last week. His wife came with him. Mr. Eldred writes: "After investigating the questions of doctrine and church policy, Mr. McClure is convinced that his ideas and ideals are the same as those of the Disciples of Christ. So after mature thought on these questions he comes to be identified with us. Mr. McClure is a modest man and does not care to advertise for a call to preach among us, but he believes the ministry is his life's work and is desirous of continuing the work of the ministry among us if opportunity offers. To get started with us he will consider a ministry that will pay him a thousand dollars a year. I have been in this field only three months and have not known Mr. McClure very long, but from my acquaintance with him I believe him to be a consecrated, earnest man. Those who know him here speak very highly of him both as a man and as a minister. Let's keep this good man at work. He may be addressed at 637 South Harrison St., Shelbyville, Ind."

"Country Life" In Edgar County, Ill.

The country life movement is quite strong in various parts of Illinois and is especially so in Edgar county. There is a Country club in almost every neighborhood in the county. H. H. Peters, pastor of the Christian church in Paris, has lectured before ten of these clubs during the past year. In addition to this he has spoken before several farmers institutes and is now listed as one of the regular lecturers of the State Farmers Institute. The two subjects he has presented quite frequently are, "City Life in the Country Home," and "The Soil and the Soul."

Rare Treat for Kentucky's S. S. Workers.

Walter E. Frazee, Kentucky's State Sunday-school Superintendent, has made Kentucky's already glowing Sunday-school record look dim in his announcement of the coming School of Methods to be held at Lexington, June 11 to 19. Lexington, as is well known, is an ideal place for such a school with its inspirational environment and its college atmosphere. Nine days of "instruction, recreation and inspiration" are planned. The first day will be given to matriculation, commencement exercises of Transylvania and the College of the Bible, the alumni banquet and special class work, lectures, conferences, demonstrations and recreational activities, with chapel and vesper prayer service each day. International certificates will be awarded. The intervening Sunday will afford opportunities for observation of the up-to-date Lexington schools. The expense is put thus, "Nine days for nine dollars." The school is intended for pastors, Sunday-school teachers and officers and all Christian workers. An unusually competent faculty has been selected, as follows: F. E. Lumley, of the College of Missions, Indianapolis, instructor in Social Service and American Missions; H. L. Calhoun, of Lexington, instructor in Bible Study; W. C. Bower, of Lexington, instructor in Religious Pedagogy; W. J. Clarke, of Cincinnati, Adult Specialist; Miss Cynthia Maus, of St. Louis, Teen Age Specialist; Miss Hazel Lewis, of Cincinnati, Elementary Specialist. W. E. Frazee, 706 Realty Building, Louisville, may be written for reservations and further information.

Maryland Convention Features.

Maryland, Delaware, and District of Columbia Disciples are meeting, May 19-21, at Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., the pastor of which, Earle Wilfley, is also president of the convention. Some of the features of the meeting are as follows: "Preachers' Day," with discussions of "Pastoral Evangelism," "The Preacher and Men," "The Ideal Preacher," "The Preacher and Moral Reform," "The Preacher as Leader of the Church," "The Preacher and the Every Member Canvass," and "The Cause and Cure of Church Factions." Other features of the program are: Addresses by Earle Wilfley, A. McLean, John H. Booth, Mrs. Ellie K. Payne, Dr. Mary Longdon, R. M. Hopkins, H. C. Armstrong and Carey E. Morgan. The convention music was in charge of W. E. M. Hackleman.

Ohio's Coming Convention.

I. J. Cahill, Ohio's Corresponding Secretary, is calling the attention of the Disciple clans of the Buckeye State to the privileges that will be accorded them in the state convention, to be held at Bowling Green, June 1-4. Thirty-five specialists of national reputation will be present to give expert instruction. It will be a "How" convention from beginning to end. Among the themes discussed will be "Rural Church and Bible-Schools," "Church Advertising," "Church Music," "Church Debts," "Reverence in Worship," "Amusements," "Evangelism in the Bible-School," "Preparation for the Revival"; a complete course of teacher-training instruction for those who teach "Beginners" and the "Primarys" and the "Junior" and the "Teen Age" pupils and the "Adults." In addition to the class room work will be inspirational addresses by the president, P. H. Welshimer; by J. Campbell White, and by Carey E. Morgan, of Nashville, Tenn. The national secretaries will be there with brand new messages. The reports of work done by the state departments, Mr. Cahill writes, will this year be "such as to rejoice the hearts of the saints." The Sunday-school work, evangelistic work, mission churches—all have rendered splendid service and shown rich fruitage.

M. B. Madden Returns to Japan.

M. B. Madden has just returned to Japan after making a visit in Portland, Ore. He leaves his two sons. They have taken membership with the First Church in that city.

Dr. Shearin Leaves Transylvania.

Dr. H. G. Shearin, who has been connected with Transylvania University for the past nine years, from 1905 to 1909 as Morrison Professor of English Language and Literature, and from 1909-1914, as Professor of English Philology and administrative head of Hamilton College, resigned some months since, to give his undivided efforts to his profession, and this summer will give courses in English in the University of Virginia Summer School, and next September will go to the headship of the English department in Occidental College, Los Angeles, California.

If anyone thinks Indiana is not a progressive state, let him consider this picture. These are the five district secretaries of Indiana Discipledom in their automobiles. No 1 is W. H. Martin, No. 2, T. J. Legg, No. 3, G. I. Hoover, No. 4, Melnotte Miller and No. 5, Fred R. Davies. The machines are the gifts of Marshall T. Reeves, of Columbus, and were awaiting the district secretaries on their return to Indianapolis, after the State Convention.

Indiana's State Convention

"The best convention the state ever had," was the unanimous comment with which the week's sessions of the Indiana convention at Terre Haute broke up last Thursday night. A few conventions have had larger attendance, but it was felt that in none has there ever been struck such great notes of progress and such depths of spirituality and personal devotion as in this. Certainly there was never manifested a spirit of unity and cooperation surpassing that which obtained in the Terre Haute gathering.

The convention opened with a session of the Central Indiana Ministerial Association on Monday morning. A. B. Philputt read a review of "The Inside of the Cup" which is described as an appreciative and well-balanced critique of this popular novel. In the afternoon B. A. Abbott of St. Louis spoke on the minister, bringing a rich and helpful interpretation of the calling of which he is himself an admirable example.

Other speakers during these sessions were W. E. Sweeney of Evansville, John R. Golden of Angola, J. M. Vawter of Jeffersonville, E. E. Moorman and E. L. Day of Indianapolis, J. A. Spencer of Bloomfield and J. Boyd Jones of Anderson.

At the opening session of the state convention proper, on Tuesday evening, W. H. Book of Columbus preached the convention sermon on the familiar text from Hebrews 6:1, "Leaving the first principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection." He declared that the first principles were not to be left behind in the sense of being left out of account, but in the sense that the builder goes on with his superstructure, not continually laying and relaying his foundations. It was a heartening sermon and stood for progress. The President's address by L. C. Howe, of Noblesville, was received with much favor. Mr. Howe presided throughout the convention with an evident earnestness of purpose to make each session tell appreciably for the good things that are coming to be more and more clearly desired by Indiana leaders. A remarkable session was held on Tuesday afternoon when a sort of exhibit of the whole Indiana mission work was made by the workers from the several fields. Beginning with C. W. Cauble, the state secretary, including the pastors of churches in whose support the Indiana treasury has a share—W. A. Howard of Hobart, H. A. Carpenter of Indiana Harbor, J. E. Wolfe of Whiting, Donald C. Ford of Glen Park and Tolleston, S. W. Nay of Gary—and the various departments of effort such as the work among Purdue University students represented by G. W. Watson, the student pastor, the Sunday-school represented by Garry L. Cook, the Christian Endeavor Society represented by W. D. Bartle, the work among the colored people represented by H. L. Herod, the task of reviving the weak churches represented by William Chapple, and closing with inspiring talks on the tasks of evangelism in the five districts of the state by the five Evangelists—the Northern District represented by A. L. Martin, the Western District represented by T. J. Legg, the Eastern District represented by G. I. Hoover, the Southwestern District represented by Melnotte Miller and the Southeastern District represented by Fred R. Davies—with such an array of state mission interests, and such an interpretation as these specialists gave them, one can imagine how clear and inspiring an impression the convention received.

That evening there was a veritable flood of characteristic Indiana eloquence. With their respective subjects, "Back to Christ" and "Forward with Christ" W. R. Motley of New Castle and C. M. Yokum of Rushville held the attention and won the applause of the great house as well as Beveridge and Hanly could have done. In addition to the eloquence each man brought a helpful message also.

Unlike most state conventions, the sessions of the C. W. B. M. instead of opening the series came in the midst of things. Wednesday was the day of the Woman's Missionary Society. Mrs. O. H. Greist, state president, gave no extended address but her remarks at the closing moments of each session were full of light and encouragement. Miss Mattie Burgess of India, Mrs. Laura D. Garst, Dean of Residents of the College of Missions, Indianapolis, and Mrs. J. McDaniel Stearns, one of the international secretaries of the woman's society, made great addresses. Miss Burgess spoke intimately of her experiences during her long period of service in India. Her story was intensely interesting. Mrs. Garst pleaded, with masterful grasp upon the problem, for the highest training for missionaries. Mrs. Stearns showed how, historically, in both Mexico and Japan, the church had failed to sense God's hour when mission triumphs would have been easy, and pleaded for an adequate policy of missionary effort in the lands that are open today, especially China, India and Africa.

On Wednesday evening Secretary S. J. Corey of the Foreign Missionary Society told the story of the Men and Millions Movement, described the ideals that dominate the movement and interpreted its significance. This movement was often on the lips of those who led the convention in prayer. Mr. Abram E. Cory, the leader of the movement, was remembered in prayer again and again.

Thursday was a sort of school of efficiency. The convention divided into groups for consideration of special interests such as the several divisions of the Sunday-school, the Christian Endeavor Society, the C. W. B. M., the Rural Church Problem, the Every-member Canvass, etc. Each group was led by a specialist.

At night a popular service for young people was held, with addresses by Elmer Ward Cole of Huntington and Secretary Bert Wilson of the Foreign Society.

All the general interests of the churches were represented by their secretaries, and much business was transacted of which this report makes no mention.

A Tribute to S. M. Jefferson.

The recent death of Professor S. M. Jefferson, of Translyvania has brought forth many tributes to his memory. A most appreciative one has come from F. B. Sapp, State Secretary of North Dakota Missionary Society, and a fellow student with Professor Jefferson at Bethany. He praises him as man, preacher, friend, philosopher and teacher. Most illuminating as regards the character of Professor Jefferson are Mr. Sapp's comments upon him as a preacher. From this sympathetic appreciation we quote: "Frankness entered into Professor Jefferson's structure as a preacher. When called to one of our churches prior to his career as a teacher, he was handed a document by one of the elders in Israel, which was supposed to contain the ne plus ultra as to the length of his theological cable-tow. His response to said Elder, who served in a congregation of 300, was, 'My brother, you have written well, but there are still 299 who have not handed in yet, and when they do so, I shall strike a general average and do the best I can.' A further characteristic of the man-preacher was manifested when a certain cultured woman wished to join his congregation from another pastorate. She had not yet breathed the spiritual content of baptism, and said to him, 'Dr. Jefferson, if you say so, I will be baptized.' His kind yet laconic reply was, 'Madam, it is not baptism, but faith that you need.' As a preacher, he was not the most magnetic, but his power of exposition ranks with that of a MacLaren, and his spiritual intuition was akin to that of a Robertson. His great messages from the pulpit were not of the day, but the timeless spirit entered into his prophetic words. While absolutely loyal to the plea of the Disciples, there was a catholicity in his spirit that marked him a prophet in, the Kingdom rather than the advocate of any doctrine needing emphasis in any particular historical epoch. He was a 'Voice' speaking to men."

Chicago Church Loses Oldest Member.

Will F. Shaw, pastor of Sheffield Avenue Church, Chicago, reports that his congregation has lost its oldest member by death. A. R. Knox, seventy-six years of age, and sixty-four years a preacher of the gospel, passed to his reward Saturday night, April 18th, in Waukegan, at the home of his daughter. The following churches of Christ were organized by Mr. Knox throughout Lake County, Illinois: Gurnee, Antioch, Waukegan. These are monuments of his faith and miinstry. He taught Bible classes in Hinsdale up almost to his last year. He brought of the fruit of his own vines to the communion table of the church of his membership, Sheffield Avenue, North Side. Vividly he retold the story of his Christian life and labors on his seventy-fifth anniversary—of his obedience to the gospel. Mr. Shaw writes that he was loved of all for his character and his friendly visits. Funeral services were conducted by Will F. Shaw and C. G. Brelos in Waukegan.

THE COMING OF THE KINGDOM.

INTERNATIONAL UNIFORM LESSONS FOR JUNE 7, 1914.

Luke 17:20-37. Memory Verse, 33.

Golden Text.—Lo, the kingdom of God is within you.—Luke 17:21.

American Standard Bible.
Copyright, 1901. by Thomas Nelson & Sons.
(Used by permission.)

(20) And being asked by the Pharisees, when the kingdom of God cometh, he answered them and said, The kingdom of God cometh not with observation: (21) neither shall they say, Lo, here! or, There! for lo, the kingdom of God is within you.
(22) And he said unto the disciples, The days will come, when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and ye shall not see it. (23) And they shall say to you, Lo. there! Lo, there! go not away, nor follow after them: (24) for as the lightning, when it lighteneth out of the one part under the heaven, shineth unto the other part under heaven; so shall the Son of man be in his day. (25) But first must he suffer many things and be rejected of this generation. (26) And as it came to pass in the days of Noah, even so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. (27) They ate, they drank, they married, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came, and destroyed them all. (28) Likewise even as it came to pass in the days of Lot; they ate, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; (29) but in the day that Lot went out from Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all; (30) after the same manner shall it be in the day that the Son of man is revealed. (31) In that day, he that shall be on the housetop, and his goods in the house, let him not go take them away: and let him that is in the field likewise not return back. (32) Remember Lot's wife. (33) Whosoever shall seek to gain his life shall lose it: but whosoever shall lose his life shall preserve it. (34) I say unto you, In that night there shall be two men on one bed; the one shall be taken, and the other shall be left. (35) There shall be two women grinding together: the one shall be taken, and the other shall be left. (37) And they answering say unto him, Where, Lord? And he said unto them, Where the body is, thither will the eagles also be gathered together.

Verse By Verse.

BY C. C. BUCKNER

v. 20. When the kingdom of God cometh: The Pharisees thought of the kingdom as being a great political empire; while Jesus thought of it as a spiritual kingdom. So the question was not asked in good faith but for the purpose of committing Jesus on a point which would work to his disadvantage. Cometh not with observation: Jesus pointed out that it was not to be looked for as men look for the appearance of some stellar body.

v. 21. The kingdom of God is within you: The kingdom was in the hearts of Jesus and his followers. Where God is king, there is his kingdom.

v. 22. The days will come: He is referring to testing times which will come to them when he, their leader, shall be taken from them.

v. 23. They shall say to you, Lo, there! Lo, here!: They are here warned against the false predictions of his coming.

v. 24. So shall the Son of man be in his day: When he comes for his spiritual reign it will be perfectly apparent.

v. 25. No comment can make this verse more lucid. Ponder!

v. 26,27. As it came to pass in the days of Noah, etc.: As the Deluge came on a people who were unprepared for it, so would the Son of man come in his kingdom upon an unprepared people.

v. 28, 29, 30. Likewise even as it came to pass in the days of Lot: In his use of these scriptural references we must note his knowledge and use of the scriptures to carry his messages to men's hearts.

v. 31. In that day, etc.: He is teaching that when Christ comes men must forsake all earthly attractions and follow him.

v. 32. Remember Lot's wife: See Gen. 19:26.

v. 33. Whosoever shall seek, etc.: The earthly life must not be reckoned as first.

At the Heart of the Lesson.

BY REV. A. Z. CONRAD, PH.D.

Where we need to know, we are not left in doubt. No man will ever be lost because of necessary ignorance. Revelation covers all that is essential to salvation and sanctification. To be unsatisfied with the Revelation of God in Jesus Christ is to be doomed to hopeless unrest. Curiosity is always calling for striking demonstration. Where the veil is drawn it is useless to try to tear it away. What God has not seen fit to disclose about the future we may well leave with Him.

Being asked by the Pharisees when the kingdom of God cometh, he answered and said: "The Kingdom of God cometh not with observation." Had there been advantage in further disclosure on this point Christ would have made it. In all ages men and women have tried to gain information about the future which God has not seen fit to disclose. No good has ever come of it. The sum total of knowledge that has been given to the world by all the necromancers, soothsayers, fortune tellers, table-rappers and the like is represented by zero. Modern spiritualism with its mummery has never given evidence of receiving one single intelligent message. But more than all this, God has deliberately placed his ban upon that sort of search. Trouble and only trouble has come from consulting "familiar spirits." It is prohibited.

SPECIOUS SPECULATION.

Jesus was a Prophet. He knew the mind of man. He well knew that one of the chief handicaps of the kingdom would be the specious speculations of his professed followers. "Neither shall they say Lo, here! or Lo there! * * * And they shall say to you Lo there! Lo here! go not away nor follow after them." Jesus again and again warned against following false leaders and teachers. The importance of the warning is fully justified in the light of church history. Periodically, theological speculations have sought to lead away from the Divinely appointed and accredited paths. Never more than now has it been important to guard against men who are wise above what is written and who say "Lo, here" concerning the Kingdom of God but who are blindly perverting the truth and leading themselves and their followers into the ditch. It is heart-breaking to note the applause with which the pressing of the crown of thorns of unbelief and denial into the head of Christ is greeted by his professed followers in ministerial meetings, because it is all done under wreaths of roses and lilies of adulation of a merely human Christ.

The warning is directed here more especially against dating and localizing the second coming of Christ. In the face of this protest it is difficult to see how or why men will undertake to fix the time and determine the place.

EXPERIENCE AND INTERPRETATION.

"The Kingdom of God is within you." Here is one of the profoundest and most illuminating utterances of Jesus Christ. His conception of the religious life is presented in a single sentence. The whole of religion is a matter of the heart. Moreover interpretation demands inter-penetration and this comes only from the indwelling Christ.

No man is able to become a spiritual guide by virtue of his intellectual learning. Scriptural discernment of the external Kingdom requires the Kingdom within. Like interprets like. The pronouncements of men in matters of faith have value only as such men have had an inner experience of Christ. The doubts, the scoffs and the scorns of men have no effect on those of us who have the witness within. WE KNOW. We who have tested the promises and prayer are moved with pity but are not disturbed when men deny the efficacy of prayer to procure things from God. We who have known the risen Christ and Exalted Saviour as Redeemer cannot be moved by the denials of his supernatural birth and his miracle working and his intercession. His transactional relation between man and God is placed beyond doubt because the Kingdom of God is within us through His Grace. Jesus would never consent to a religion of externals. It must be an experience of the soul.

LONGING FOR VISIBLE AND TANGIBLE EVIDENCE.

There is a natural longing at times for some manifestation of Jesus Christ such as his Disciples enjoyed. We wish we might see his face as they saw it. We wish some demonstration of his power such as marked and sealed his utterances as authentic in Galilee, might again be given. "The days will come when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man and shall not see it." So great would be this longing that they would be in danger of following false teachers professing to have new light. He would come but not in the way expected. It was for them to be faithful to duty, to develop the Kingdom within and without and wait God's ruling. It is idle for us to long for other manifestations of Divine power than those given.

UNIVERSALITY OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

In the figure of the leaping electric fires of the sky whereby the whole firmament is illumined instantly, we have a fine illustration of the immediateness and universality of the manifested glory of Christ at his Second Coming. As it is without time designation so also is it independent of latitude and longitude. We may well be wary of accepting as conclusive the detailed descriptions of the Second Coming. The most of men who have made it a special theme of discourse have been betrayed into untenable positions. We know very little about it except the sure fact that it will take place. Jesus desired to emphasize the importance of preparation for such a tremendous event whenever it should come. As a basis of appeal it is less effective than an appeal to the inevitableness of death and the coming of Christ individually and personally in the call to the realities of the world beyond. I have no doubt that Christ will come again as a visible presence. He may come at any moment. The probability of his coming soon is less than the probability of my departure from earth to meet him in the Home beyond. The fact stated by Christ that the Kingdom of God is within, stressed the importance of holy living in which case the unexpected coming need create no uneasiness. If we live well, we die well. If we are living daily with Christ, then his Second Coming will only accentuate what we already feel and know about him.

THE PERPETUAL PARADOX.

"Whosoever shall seek to save his life shall lose it, and whosoever shall lose his life shall preserve it." Repeatedly our Lord presented this paradox. It was a striking way of declaring that selfishness defeats its own purposes. Lovers of pleasure burn out the ability to enjoy. As miserable as a leper upon a heap of ashes is a man whose energies and capacities have been burned out in the fires of unholy dissipation. It is unchangeably true that what we wisely bestow we really have, that the life which looks outward has most inward; that the life blood courses most strongly in those who mint their blood in the interests of the Kingdom. We are so constituted that deep and abiding joy can only come through ardent service.

THE GREAT SEPARATION.

"There shall be two in one bed. The one shall be taken and the other left. There shall be two women grinding together. The one shall be taken and the other left." Another way of saying, "One shall be accepted and another rejected." The basis of it all is made evident in the previous sayings of Jesus. The ground of the division is not accidental selection of one to the exclusion of others, nor arbitrary refusal to receive one and preferential acceptance of the other. Those who are left will be left because already they have left Jesus Christ. Those who are accepted will be accepted and taken because they are already identified with Christ as Lord and Master. Worship and service are the primary and sole conditions of permanent and eternal acceptance. Unity with God is effected through regenerating power and this is made possible through the atonement.

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

TOPIC FOR JUNE 3.

The Christian and the Lord's Day. Matt. 12:9-12; Rom. 14:5-12; Acts. 20:7.

The saying of Jesus that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath is sometimes taken to mean that impulse shall displace reason in determining how the day shall be used. Jesus addressed his teaching to the intelligence of his hearers. We must therefore use the best sense we have in interpreting his words. He condemned the Pharisaic notion of the Sabbath for the reason that the Pharisee had lost sight of the man in his effort to keep intact a set of rules. Jesus bids us think of the man and make our conduct fit man's needs.

FOR THE BODY.

The law of the decalogue was made in the interest of the overworked. It was inteneded to secure for them the rest that was needed for health. If the agricultural laborer of Palestine needed protection against the greed of land owners, how much more does the industrial worker of today need his day of rest made sure to him by sound public opinion and wise legislation. Some of us have been in doubt about Sunday laws because we believe in the doctrine of a free church in a free state. But there is no danger of unlawfully thrusting religion into the affairs of government if we have in mind justice to the toilers. We are not legislating to build up the church, we are trying to give all our citizens their rights. The church will have a better opportunity to deliver its message in a state that takes good care of its citizens. It seems to have been demonstrated that the thirty-six hours rest from Saturday night till Monday morning is a requirement of bodily health.

FOR THE MIND.

The work we do ought to be done so well that it will be a source of education of the highest kind. There is something seriously wrong when a man's vocation and his intellectual life part company. But it is not enough that we know our own business. We must know as much as possible about the ongoing of the universe and the life of man. The day of rest is for mental improvement. Looking at every body and every even from the angle of business produces intellectual narrowness. The business man who teaches a class in Sunday-school and prepares for his teaching, who opens his mind to the influences of the Bible and who gets the best aids to the study of religion, can think better than he could if he gave himself up wholly to his business. He will learn in this way to think as a man and as a citizen.

THE JOY OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Henry Ward Beecher said, "A world without a Sabbath would be like a man without a smile, like a summer without flowers, and like a homestead without a garden. It is the joyous day of the whole week." Have we always made the day of rest a delight? In the time of Amos there were traders who found no pleasure in the Sabbath because it gave them no opportunity to cheat the farmers out of their grain. The humanitarian aspect of the day had no interest for them. A visitor at a Sunday-school in a state that was advertising for men with money was engaged in conversation by a real estate man who used the entire class hour to explain the financial opportunities of his section of the state. This real estate man either did not know or had momentarily forgotten what it was just to be a man and enjoy human felowship. In some homes religion is dishonored by being assigned as the reason for making the day tiresome for the children.

Ex. 20:8-11; Ps. 92:1-15; Amos 8:5; Lu. 13:10-17; 14:1-6; Jno. 5:5-14; Acts 13:14-27; 15:21; 17:2; Rev. 1:10.

Be at war with your vices, at peace with your neighbors, and let every new year find you a better person.—Franklin.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

* * *

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System, published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

Let Us Have The Best!

Progressive Texas, in its recent splendid convention at Gainesville, put itself on record as standing for the very best in religious literature. Not only must the Disciples demand the best that can be produced in weekly journals, but in Sunday school supplies no encouragement must be given to the production of inferior studies.

E. M. Waits, of Ft. Worth, Tex., made one of the most striking addresses of the Gainesville convention. At its close it was unanimously indorsed and ordered sent to the Disciples' weeklies for publication. Here is what Mr. Waits had to say concerning Sunday school literature:

"If the Syndicate excels our supplies in pedagogical value and attractiveness, the thing for our publishers to do is not to get angry, but to move up. If you say this costs I say success everywhere costs. Put some of the dividends into improvements and make the product and the by-product the best that can be had."

The Disciples Publication Society would make only one suggestion regarding this excellent pronouncement. It is a practical one. What is the use of producing still other perfect lines of supplies, when we already have, edited by the experts of the Sunday school world, including a Disciple representative,

Rev. Finis Idleman, of Des Moines, Will Write for "The Conquest"

Rev. Finis Idleman.

For several months "The Conquest" has been looking for a man who could work out our ideal of what a Sunday School lesson treatment should be. In addition to the Scripture text and a "verse by verse" explanatory column, there should be a straight-from-the-shoulder talk applying the principles of the Sacred Word to today's life. We have found the man who can do it, and is willing to do it. Mr. Idleman will talk to "Conquest" Bible classes just as he talks to his great Des Moines class. His treatment of the lessons will be forceful, inspirational, up-to-date. This feature will begin early in June. Watch for it. Still other new features are to be announced.

I know I shall be challenged upon this proposition. It is a proof of the irreligion that prevails that men deny the importance of religion. Let men speak whose authority you will not despise; not ministers of the Gospel, but men of wide vision in the world; men of affairs; many of them not even professing Christians. I summon the witnesses, one by one. Weigh their testimony!

Louis A. Lamb, in "Investments:" "It is not fashionable to speak of religion as an economic factor. But fashionable or not, no honest observer can gainsay the fact that the decay of faith among men has contributed not a little to our trouble. So long as mankind in general had faith in a personal God, belief in future retribution and salvation through divine grace, there were powerful checks in the way of reckless living, wild borrowing, insane spending and blind determinism in conduct. Having lost the fine flower and potency of ancient faiths, the populace has taken resort in socialism, radicalism, syndicalism, as the only agencies by which the ills of materialistic living and thinking may be corrected. Unfaith and envy are sisters and revolutionary ideas are cousins-german to both."

President Garfield: "Unless we become once more a people moved by a profound belief in eternal verities, our morality will wither away as the plucked flower withers and dies."

The Wall Street Journal: "A low conception of life is responsible for a brutal individualism that makes for crime at the bottom of society and selfishness of tyranny and greed at the top; that makes for excessive luxury on the one hand and anarchical defiance on the other." "A marked decline of religious faith is a fact of profound, far-reaching significance. It alters the basic conditions of civilization. There is no more important problem before us than to check a development that has within it the seeds of a national disaster." "Not billion-dollar congresses or gigantic crops make for the true advances of a people. Now, as ever, righteousness exalteth a nation. We have had enough of quack religious and political cure-alls. Let us get back to the Ten Commandments and the fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom."

President Roosevelt, in his discussion of the Pennsylvania coal strike: "We do not need a new philosophy to solve this problem, but only to practice the precepts of the Bible."

Senator Marcus Hanna: "The golden rule is the only way I know to settle the dispute between capital and labor."

Carroll D. Wright, United States Commissioner of Labor: "I believe that in the adoption of the philosophy of the religion of Jesus Christ as a practical creed for the conduct of business lies the surest and speediest solution of those industrial difficulties which are exciting the minds of men today, and leading many to think that the crisis of government is at hand."

We are suffering in Denver, in Colorado, from want of religion; from sheer godlessness. It is irrelevant to say "We are no worse than others!" Our concern is with ourselves.

I heard, in our Auditorium, two weeks ago, a lecture on Socialism. When the speaker read from Socialist books and periodicals sentiments of blank atheism they were greeted with great applause. The speaker remarked that he was surprised to find so many Socialists there who were ready to avow themselves atheists.

A Mining Camp at Cripple Creek.

One of the worst of these ripening fruits is the well-nigh universal distrust which prevails among us. Who knows what to believe as he reads our papers? Who knows whom to trust in word or deed? "Truth is fallen in the streets."

Take the present strife in our coal camps: As to causes, there is the most absolute contradiction. We are continually told that this or that testimony is biased by prejudice. Meanwhile, we are at the mercy of a press that has often proved itself utterly unworthy of belief. I quote from a reported interview the words of a member of the Congressional Commission that recently came to investigate conditions here: "I never saw such a low moral sentiment. I think it is chargeable to the press of Denver. Reports have been printed, not with a view to stating the evidence, but with a view of arousing class hatred. Think of it! A Congressional Committee, coming out here, spending thousands of dollars to help the people of Colorado, and a Denver paper giving two columns to Miss 'Raffles' and about six inches to this committee! In all my life, I never saw its equal! I think the papers are largely responsible for the low moral plane of your public opinion." And the only reply to this which I have seen in any Denver paper is the easy sneer: "That was influenced by the operators!"

Suggestions are many: New legislation; a change political or personal, in civil or military offices; the overpowering of this element or that whatever wisdom there may be in such plans, saving truth is not in them. Our need lies deeper. Legislation we have heard in abundance; but what have we heard of political bargaining in connection with it? Of "trades" and "dickers," of "jokers" in bills; of the hindrance, not to say defeat, of justice, by legislative, executive or even judicial powers?

Whatever may be said of law enforcement, of compulsory use of the civil or military powers of the state, force can never settle our problems or deliver us from our perils. "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword." Under modern conditions force will be met by force unless there be diffused among men a sense of justice, respect for authority, the sentiment of brotherhood and the obligation of fairness and mutual consideration.

What is needed in Colorado? The establishment of authority, supreme, unquestioned; supreme by reason not of power only, but of righteousness. Men are crying for the strong arm of the state; for the succor of Federal authority. But our deepest need can be met only when men recognize the supreme authority of the Almighty.

President Roosevelt once said: "There are great problems ahead of us as a nation, but the greatest problem is the problem of making better men and women of us all. As generation succeeds generation, the problems change in their external shape. But it remains as true as ever that in the last analysis national greatness, national happiness, national success, depend upon the character of the individual man and individual woman."

We shall have righteousness and peace only as the reign of God is established in the hearts of men.

The Philosophy of Christian Education

A Chapel Address, Delivered at Columbia University in the City of New York, July 10, 1913.

BY WALTER S. ATHEARN, PROFESSOR OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION, DRAKE UNIVERSITY.

"AND I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." This sentence contains the entire philosophy of Christian education. There is a sense in which we may say that education is the introduction of control into experience. Any act from which we gain control is an educative act; any act which does not give us increased power of control is a non-educative act.

We were once told that "practice makes perfect." In that day our copy books had the perfect copy printed at the top of the page. Our first line was the most accurate line on the page and our last line was the least accurate. Each added line contained the mistakes of the line above. Practice did not make perfect.

Then our copy books were changed and the engraved copy was printed on a narrow slip which could be moved down the page as we wrote. On these pages, in which the ideal copy was always in the eyes of the writer, the best writing was at the bottom of the page. Practice under criticism, practice under the direction of an ideal makes perfect.

We were once told that progress comes through accidental adjustment—through the survival of the fittest—through natural selection. But forty years of the psychological laboratory have taught us that mind and matter evolve together and that mind determines the direction of evolution. One selects that which he will imitate, and comes to be that which he does. Progress comes through conscious adjustment to an ideal—not a rolling down to environment, but a pulling up to an ideal.

He who determines the ideals of a race determines the destiny of that race. This is the mission of the prophet and the teacher; one holds up the nation's ideals, and the other teaches the youth to realize the ideals through conduct.

But the ideal must be expressed in terms of personality to have pulling power.

Christian education is the introduction of control into experience in terms of a great personal ideal. This is salvation through the love of an holy person—the pull of the personal ideal.

It is the business of Christian education to so present the Christ ideal to children at every stage in their unfolding lives that they grow up Christians, and, to use Bushnell's phrase, "never know themselves as having been otherwise."

All this I think is involved in the text, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

Religious Inspiration or Dogma?

PROF. THOMAS C. HALL, IN "RELIGIOUS EDUCATION."

"DOGMA" and "dogmatic" are not words today with which to conjure. The air is quivering with expectancy of the new, and even firmest convictions are held with a sense that the forms in which they are held are only relative, and that we need to hear from every man of good will lest we lose some light.

And it is well that this is so. For one of the striking things in history is the unconscious character of some of the great religious movements. Thus the age of Caesar Augustus may be called one of the greatest religious epochs in history, comparable if at all only with the eighth century before Christ. Roman stoicism and cynicism, the mystery cults and philosophic monotheism struggled for mastery in an age that gave as its crowning expression the religious synthesis we call Roman Catholicism. Yet the literary and philosophic worlds were unconscious of what was taking place, and the world of politics only took notice of it in an attempt to suppress the movement.

So also the crusades and the humanist movements mark the pervasive religious ferment which resulted in a new political and religious world. Yet that religious movement was regarded by the most thoughtful men of the day as irreligious and dangerous, a menace to the church, state and all society.

I have little doubt that we are today in the midst of a new and profoundly religious movement whose marks are not alone great conventions, nor yet the building of churches, important as these elements are; but a new sense of a coming ideal society; a new sense that the old is passing away and all things are becoming new, a quickening of the civic and national discontent which to many seems as dangerous as Christianity did to Marcus Aurelius, or Luther to Leo X.

The serious question God is now asking of organized religion in all its forms is, what is to be the relation of these forms to the new religious movement? Are we going to so identify religion with ritual, cult or dogma that men who cannot accept our rituals, cults or dogmas can get from us no religious inspiration?

National education we have undertaken because education tends not only to efficiency but to national unity. Religion has had to be left out because religious dogmas are divisive. We look to Europe and see its education imperilled, its peace made impossible by religious differences formulated in religious dogmas.

One of the results of this is that men are not only becoming impatient of dogma but of all exact and firmly held intellectual beliefs. Loose and emotional sentimentalism is welcomed as a relief from exact statement and clear thinking.

Now this is not the proper remedy. Never did a situation need clearer thinking and more courageous facing of the facts than today. We can never save the day by indirection. Has Roman Catholicism a good case, it should be heard. It is a shame that Protestants are so often content with antiquated caricatures of Rome. Men like Leo XIII and Cardinal Newman were no fools. We need clear and able defense of historic Protestantism with its claims for an infallible Bible instead of an infallible Pope. We need sane and non-hysterical treatments of the new Protestantism which has risen since the days of Hume and Kant.

But we must at last begin to recognize the fact that what civic progress needs is religious inspiration, and that we must, if need be, be content to see the dogmatic forms of the new religious movement and express it. We must save religious values, and this we can only do if we are wiling to hold fast to what we cannot let go, but refrain from such identification of it with religion and religious inspiration that it is a choice for us between our dogma and religion, or no dogma and no religion.

It is vain and even wicked to stake our religious faith upon dogmatic formulae, no matter how much they command our assent.

As an historic fact no enthusiasm has lifted men so effectively on to higher planes of living; has enabled them more strongly to overcome selfishness, national narrowness and personal limitations than religion. It has and still does groan under a weight of form and superstition that does not belong to its essential life. But today there is no test of vitality it will not submit to, and no other movement that can compare with it in mere material effects.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

The Season for Women's Meetings

We are told that in the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love. In the spring, a young woman's fancy (and an old one's, too) seriously turns to thoughts of conventions.

The state conventions of women's began last month, and will continue until the Biennial of the General Federation of Women's Clubs meets in Chicago, June 9-18. The Kentucky Federation of Women's clubs held its annual meeting in Louisville, April 21-24, with a large attendance of delegates and visitors. To one like the writer, who has attended nearly all the state conventions since the federation was organized twenty years ago, the growth of the society, both in members and activities, is a constant source of pleasure and surprise; the number of young women who are taking an active part in the work is an especially hopeful sign. The federation now works through about twenty committees, representing art and culture and education, but more especially, every line of modern social reform.

The report of the Committee on Moral Sanitation, which was unanimously adopted, is an indication of the serious work the women's clubs are doing. After suggesting a list of subjects, bearing on Social Hygiene and related topics, the committee recommended:

1. That the clubs composing the Kentucky Federation place on the programs for the year 1914-1915 lectures or conferences bearing on some or all of the suggested topics; and that, when possible, they secure the co-operation of local boards of health, and the services of physicians, or local experts in sociology, to contribute to the course.

II. That when the time is propitious, they undertake social surveys of moral conditions in their various communities, with the fixed purpose of constant repression of the social evil as the immediate remedy and complete annihilation as the ultimate ideal.

There will be a series of spring conventions in other states, and there will be a host of women who will go up to Chicago in June, full of purpose and enthusiasm for social and moral betterment.

The spring is the favorite time for state and district conventions of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. The district conventions in Kentucky continue throughout the months of April and May, and the same is true in many other states. The state convention in Texas was in session two weeks ago, then Indiana and so on through the greater part of the summer.

But the greatest gathering of women this year is the International Council of Women, lately in session in Rome, Italy. The council meets every five years, for the review of women's progress and for planning new activities.

The total membership of the organizations included in the International Council is about 6,500,000 women from twenty-one countries.

This great affiliation of interests was founded by Susan B. Anthony and other American women leaders in 1888, and the women of the United States represented in it, numbering 3,000,000, lead those of all other countries.

The preamble to the statement of the aims and objects of the International Council is:

"We, women of all nations, sincerely believing that the best good of humanity will be advanced by greater unity of thought, sympathy and purpose, and that an organized movement of women will best insure the highest good of the family and of the State, do hereby band ourselves together in a confederation of workers to further the application of the Golden Rule to society, customs and law."

The International Council can identify itself only with such movements as have been unanimously accepted by its members. The survival of the fittest of propositions thus far considered includes:

First—To further international peace and arbitration.

Second—To combat the "white slave" traffic.

Third—To win suffrage for women.

Fourth—To promote legislation concerned with the general welfare of women and their legal position.

Fifth—To promote the improvement of public health.

Sixth—To protect emigrants and especially safeguard women and children.

Lady Aberdeen, the noted suffragist of Great Britain, is president of the council, and Dr. Anna Howard Shaw of the United States is chairman of the woman suffrage section. The executive committee voted favorably on a request of the United States government to call an international conference on emigration. It also adopted a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee of women from each country of the world which will communicate with the United States government on the subject of the deportation of girls.

MARGARET WILSON WILL EDIT.

Miss Margaret Wilson heads a list of noted social workers of the United States who will comprise the editorial staff of The Social Center Magazine, to be published at Madison, Wisconsin. Announcement of the plans of the publication was made this week, with the issuance of the following statement from the White House:

"Miss Margaret Woodrow Wilson, eldest daughter of the President, has accepted an editorship on The Social Center Magazine, a national publication soon to be issued, whose purpose is to promote the use of public school-houses as polling places, forums for common counsel, centers of co-operative enterprise and recreation for all the people.

"Among those associated with Miss Wilson in this project are Dr. Frederic C. Howe, director of the People's Institute of New York City; Miss Zona Gale, author of Friendship Village and other stories, and chairman of the Civic department of the General Federation of Women's Clubs; Frank P. Walsh, chairman of the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations; Herbert Quick, editor of Farm and Fireside; Frank Parker Stockbridge, managing editor of Popular Mechanics; George F. Bowerman, public librarian of Washington, D. C.; Dwight H. Perkins, school and recreation center architect, of Chicago; John Collier, secretary of the National Board of Censorship of Motion Pictures; John R. Richards, superintendent of recreation of Chicago; J. J. Pettijohn, University Extension director of Indiana; Dr. Josiah Strong and Clarence A. Perry of New York City, and Dana Bartlett of Los Angeles.

"The magazine is to be published at Madison, Wisconsin. Edward J. Ward, of the Extension Division of the University of Wisconsin and secretary of the Social Center Association of America, will serve as managing editor, and Prof. Grant M. Hyde, of the department of journalism of the University of Wisconsin, will take charge of the business management of the publication. Miss Wilson will go to Madison in June personally to attend to the launching of the magazine."

JUST ABOUT WOMEN.

Iowa now has women factory inspectors.

Miss Cora Dow of Cincinnati, O., owns twelve drug stores in that city.

Women employees of the government printing office are to have rest-rooms.

In two New York industries, employing 10,893 women and girls, the majority of them receive only $3.00 a week.

Women were first admitted to the University of Wisconsin in 1866. Over 1.240 were enrolled for the sessions of 1913-14.

The New York Housewives' League has engaged several women to act as inspectors in their crusade against cold storage food.

Kingston Mines, Peoria County, Ill., has elected the first woman mayor in Illinois in the person of Mrs. Kate York. For the past twenty-three years Mrs. York has been successfully engaged in the general mercantile business.

Some American women receiving large salaries are Ella Flagg Young, superintendent of the Chicago public schools, who gets $10,000 a year, and Dr. Catherine Bement Davis, the commissioner of corrections in New York City, who receives a salary of $7,500.

Miss Marian Smith is said to be the champion newsgirl of Erie, Pa. Her sales of the Woman's Journal at the suffrage booth and charity fair recently were phenomenal. Miss Smith is in partnership with her brother in the real estate and insurance business, but she finds time to work diligently for equal suffrage.

Mrs. Juliet Low in an address at Hull House, Chicago, last week, outlined the plan of organizing "girl scouts" in Chicago. She said: "The training and ideals are about the same as the Boy Scouts movement. The girls after passing examinations in first aid, are given ambulance badges and some of them are made members of the Red Cross Society." Sir Robert Baden-Powell, head of the Boy Scouts in England, suggested the idea of a sister organization, the founding of which has been undertaken by Mrs. Low.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

APPLAUSE.

SHALL we applaud in religious conventions? There seems to be a growing sentiment against it among Disciples. There are times when clapping the hands is the natural and effective response of an audience even in a religious convention. But there are so many other times when applause is totally out of place, when it is actually destructive of the religious feelings, that it is coming to be felt by many leaders of our conventions that it should be prohibited altogether, or at least made the exception to the rule.

Applause expresses, primarily, approval and encouragement of the performer. But in a religious service or convention it is not the "performer" who should mainly interest us, but the truth. And the deep truths of religion do their work in our consciences in silent reflection much better than in noisy demonstration.

The growing determination to make our conventions more truly religious, more spiritually helpful, is one of the most heartening signs of progress.

THE MANLESS CHURCH.

WE KNEW it would come. The extreme advocates of the new feminism in London have organized a manless church. The Church of the New Ideal, which admits no men to membership, held its first services a few days ago. The church is located at Wallasey, the newly-constituted borough on the Cheshire side of the Mersey. Some 200 wmen assembled for the inaugural sermon, delivered by Rev. Hatty Boker of Plymouth. Men were rigorously excluded.

A preliminary declaration of reasons for the formation of the church sets forth "the epoch-making advance in the self-consciousness of women as a sex," and women's realization of equality with man in religious as well as other spheres of life.

Rev. Hatty Baker, who wore what is described as a "white choker" and a black gown of conventional clerical type, took as her subject "God's Glorious Ideal." She declared that churches as founded and conducted by men obscured this ideal, and the present effort was to create a church of the future which would be along the lines of the ideal.

Abraham, she said, as long as he acted on his own initiative, made many mistakes, and twice had to be told by God to take the advice of his wife, and the greatest tragedy the world ever witnessed would never have taken place if Pilate had listened to his wife. The male bias had obscured the message of Christ in the past, and the present church would do away with such bias.

We note an obscure announcement that this new church of the eternal feminine is to have an evening service to which men are invited. We are glad this bit of information accompanies the other. We expect for that service immediate popularity.

The truth of the matter is, God, who might have saved Himself and us a lot of bother by not creating any sex, has put men and women into one common world and told them to behave themselves and work out their problems together. No very permanent reform can be brought on the basis of sex hostility. If there is anything the women really want, they can have it. But one of the last things they want, or ought to want, is a manless church. A manless world would be something worth considering, but if there are to be any men, the women want them. And God meant it to be so.

We note with approval the high praise given to Pilate's wife by the preacher in this new church. Pilate's wife deserves the full measure of this commendation. Hers was the only voice raised on behalf of Jesus after the trial was taken to the Roman authorities. But we are not quite so clear about Abraham and Sarah. Was it not Sarah who gave Abraham the bad advice to marry Hagar, and afterward nagged him into that piece of shameful cruelty that drove the girl and her child out into the desert to perish? We doubt the wisdom of laying too great emphasis upon Sarah's advice to Abraham. It was true in that day and in the day of Robbie Burns that the husband sometimes ignored to his sorrow the suggestions of his wife. With Robbie we could admonish Tam O'Shanter:

> "O Tam, hadst thou but been sae wise,
> As ta'en thy ain wife Kate's advice."

and we could further consider with some sorrow, and even with some measure of self-reproach:

> "Ah, gentle dames! It gars me greet
> To think how monie counsels sweet,
> How monie lengthened sage advices
> The husband frae the wife despises."

But there are cases on record in which the husband has taken the wife's advice to his sorrow; and we are too well-bred to say anything about them, from Adam down.

No, no. It is not in that way we are to make progress, but by working together, brothers and sisters, husbands and wives, at the great tasks of life. And if either men or women show folly, as both do and have done and will, let us comfort ourselves with the wisdom of Mrs. Poyser, and reverse it if you like. We can afford to admit that women are fools; the Lord Almighty made 'em to match the men.

CANVASSING EVERY MEMBER.

THE Every-member Canvass was taken literally and in dead earnest at Hannibal, Mo. The members of the church were notified that solicitors of pledges to missions would call on them between certain hours on a certain Sunday afternoon and they were asked to stay at home and receive these solicitors. The result is stated in detail in our Table Talk department this week. Rev. George A. Campbell, the pastor, is enthusiastic over the blessing the church has received through this systematic "putting over" of a common sense method of securing missionary funds. That plan ought to be universally adopted.

BERKELEY SEMINARY.

A FEW weeks ago The Christian Century called admiring attention to the modest new Disciples' paper launched on the Pacific Coast called "The Christian Union Advocate," and we added a friendly word of caution against the temptation to an over-belligerent treatment of the issues in which our movement is now involved. The latest issue of the paper, however, discloses certain facts in connection with Berkeley Bible Seminary at the University of California, which should stir the fighting blood of any Christian accustomed to face moral questions squarely. Dr. H. H. Guy, who is sustained in a professorship in Pacific Theological Seminary, a union institution, by the direct gifts of a group of California Disciples, recites the facts with a frankness and assurance based on inside knowledge.

It is not necessary to restate these facts here. It must suffice to say that while holding a position as the one sole professor of Berkeley Bible Seminary, under a federation plan of coöperation between Berkeley and Pacific Seminaries which made him also a member of the faculty of Pacific Seminary, Prof. D. A. Russell used his position to surreptitiously shift the location of Berkeley Seminary from Berkeley to San Francisco and thus to break up the federation of the two institutions. The facts indicate that the supporters of the Bible Seminary were the victims of a sharp trick.

Mr. Russell managed it on this wise: Instead of hearing his classes in the Seminary buildings in Berkeley he received them across the bay in San Francisco, alleging some reason that now turns out to be a mere pretext. The effect of this procedure, prolonged over a long period of a year or so, was to bring into confusion and contempt the federation arrangement. As a result, a recent vote of a ministers' meeting held at Stockton shows a willingness on the part of a considerable number of ministers to abandon the movement for a union or federation of the two seminaries upon which the hearts of far-visioned Disciples in California have been devoutly set.

Doctor Guy lays the responsibility of this failure of the union plans and of the Seminary itself in plain but restrained language upon the shoulders of Mr. Russell.

The Christian Century does not withdraw its counsel in regard to over-belligerency, but it marvels at the self-restraint with which the "Advocate" handles this instance of sheer perfidy.

PRECEDENT AND PROGRESS.

WHOEVER attempts any marked improvement in the methods by which men seek to accomplish their corporate undertakings is met at once with the inertia of established usage. The presumption is in favor of continuing to do things the way in which they have been done. Yet the fact that society has been accustomed to do things in a particular way is not a demonstration that that is forever to be the best way. The Saturday Evening Post in a recent editorial speaks of men's slowness to learn as follows:

"You would have a poor opinion of a man who, as a regular occupation, harnessed half-naked women to carts and set them to crawling all day on their hands and knees through the hot, narrow passages of mines, hauling coal, and who bitterly resented every attempt to change that condition.

"You would hardly care to belong to the same club with a man who was put into a towering rage by an attempt to stop him from working little children at the loom until they fainted from hunger and exhaustion. Yet good men have done these things.

"There is nothing more terrible in any literature than those parliamentary reports on the condition of English labor in the forepart of the nineteenth century, from which Marx took the most important material for the first volume of Capital.

"To read now of the awful abuses and of the stubborn resistance to reform gives one the impression of a cold and calculating ferocity that makes Milton's Satan look like a sentimental amateur. Yet it is perfectly certain that the British employers of that time were personally, in the main, good, kindly men—so far as they could see. A majority of the Southern slaveholders were personally good, kindly men—so far as their understanding went.

"A long-standing abuse from which a profit is derived inevitably blinds its beneficiaries and makes them utterly untrustworthy witnesses. In child-labor legislation, the objections of employers of that labor should not be at all considered. Their position puts them out of court."

THE CAPE COD CANAL.

THE Cape Cod Canal is now practically complete. For a hundred years and more men talked about it. Now it is done. George Washington recommended it as a benefit to the commerce of the nation. A company has now accomplished it as a purely commercial undertaking. On April 21 the narrow dike which alone separated the waters of the two bays was broken down, with impressive ceremonies, and the waters were mingled. Of course, this point in the canal has not yet been deepened and widened sufficiently for the passage of vessels; but it is believed that such a condition will be reached, so that the first vessels may pass upon the day which marks the anniversary of our national independence.

In the future these coastwise vessels, bringing coal and lumber and other products from ports at the southward, northbound for Boston, instead of making the wide detour around Cape Cod, may pass through Vineyard Sound and Buzzards Bay, and thence to Cape Cod Bay and Boston. It is probable that, in calm weather, very many of these vessels will prefer half a day's delay in arrival at their destination to meeting the expense of the canal tolls. It is also urged by some—and this has from the beginning been one of the obstacles to the success of former promoters—that at the very time when the canal will be most needed it will be liable to be blockaded with ice. But this objection is as nothing to many obstacles which have been overcome in the construction of the Panama Canal. Every improvement which has in it the element of the possible saving of human life is to be favored and encouraged. It is to be hoped that the result of this work, undertaken as it was as a purely financial enterprise, will prove to be beneficial in the saving of life and property far beyond the ambition of its promoters.

If the Pilgrim Fathers had found a canal with free tolls they might possibly have sailed south in an effort to locate more nearly in "the northern parts of Virginia." It may be just as well that we have waited till now.

PUTTING IT OVER.

THERE is a phrase which graphically speaks of success. It describes a thing accomplished as having been "put over." The phrase is not always used of commendable movements or methods, but there is no reason why it should bear any sinister suggestion. In our childhood we played "ante-over" and we often had the sorrow of seeing the ball losing speed as it reached the ridgepole, and come rolling back. Then we had to cry "Half way over" and try again with a little more of vigor and muscle in the throw. There are so many good causes that get half way over and roll back. Sometimes they crush those who have rolled them up as far as they went before they rolled back. If there is a good thing to be done, put it over. If you yourself should do a good thing, come across. Put it over.

DREAMS AND INSANITY.

IT IS dream-murder now that acquits, and it works as well as the old-fashioned plea of insanity, and better, for there are no asylums for dreamers. Why did not one ever discover before that dreams are just as good as insanity for purposes of acquittal, and without the attendant disadvantages of the insanity plea? Behold the case of Mr. Harry Thaw, of whom some of our readers may have heard. He killed a man. The man needed killing, as the evidence abundantly showed. For this reason it was undesirable to find Mr. Thaw guilty, but there was no doubt about his having done the killing; so there was nothing to do but find him insane. It took a lot of perjury to make him insane, and then some more perjury to make him sane again, and there is more perjury to follow. We are not alienists, and we are glad of it, but we venture the opinion that Mr. Thaw is sane, and always has been sane, and that our opinion on this subject is the opinion of other people in general. We suspect that no one would have suspected that Mr. Thaw was insane if it had not been there was need of some substitute for the inevitable conviction which the evidence compelled. But now comes the dream, and it may help out in cases of this kind. It might have been a more sure impediment to Mr. Jerome than the insanity plea. We have no opinion as to the recent case in which the dream has been used so effectively. We have not followed the evidence closely, and did not need to do so. We had little idea that there would be a conviction, and it may be that the acquittal was deserved. If the dream is to be substituted for insanity, we hope it will call for less expert lying than the other and time-honored plea. The double-corner move in the insanity dodge, which makes a man insane when he commits the crime but quite sane when he gets behind bars and wants to get out, has gone rather too far.

Presbyterians Storm Chicago.

The last few days have been a gala season for the Presbyterians in Chicago. Within a period of a week fell the dedication of the new $750,000 building erected by the Fourth Presbyterian Church, and also the sessions of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. The new Fourth Church building is of stone, and is adapted to and intended for the service of the entire community, according to John Timothy Stone, pastor of the church. It contains a gymnasium, church office, library, club, and social rooms. The manse in which Dr. Stone and his family live occupies a corner of the quadrangle. The manse and church are united by cloisters. In the center of the quadrangle there is a fountain twelve feet in height. Interest in the new building, however, was soon swallowed up in concern for the General Assembly, which had its first sesions late last week. Of chief interest in this assembly seems to be the question of reform and social service. Charles Stelzle, until recently in charge of the social service department of the church, several months ago made the statement that at this meeting the church would face one of the crises of its history. For a decade the Presbyterians have taken advanced grounds in their attitude toward labor and capital, insisting strongly upon the rights of the former. Mr. Stelzle, who during his career has traveled all the way from a New York newsboy's experiences to high church position, was elevated to the office of head of the department of church and labor. In the last two or three years, however, there has been a reactionary tendency in the church. Conservatives have insisted that the soft pedal be put upon the labor propaganda. In accord with this policy, Mr. Stelzle was released from his position, and the work of the department came to a standstill. At Atlanta, last year, the plea was made that there should be voiced the plea of "spirituality" rather than the social idea. A committee was appointed to draft a declaration on "Christian Faith and Social Service" and to present their report this year. At the present writing, the question of reform has been kept in the background by the Assembly. The white slave traffic, marriage and divorce and family worship have been considered, as reported by the committee, and it is insisted that the church push measures against these evils. In general, however, the sentiment of the assembly seems to be that evangelism shall be the weapon of warfare rather than legislation. The Chicago Evening Post has been stirred by the situation now facing the church, and had something to say editorially regarding it a few days ago. "A million and a half members of the Presbyterian Church are represented by its General Assembly convening in Chicago this week," states this paper. "It is a great church, wealthy, vigorous and exercising a tremendous influence over the lives and thoughts of the people whom it serves. It faces at this present gathering a big issue. No question of greater importance will be discussed at its sessions than that of the program to be followed in dealing with the social and industrial problems of our modern life. We hope, for the sake of religion and for the sake of society, that there may be no going back. Rather may there be sounded a ringing bugle call to advance and to carry the banner of Christian faith into the very citadel of social and industrial unrighteousness."

New S. S. Lesson Committee Plan.

The executive committee of the International Sunday-school Association has recently had a conference with the Sunday-school Council of Evangelical churches and as a result of the conference there will be recommended to the international Sunday-school convention at Chicago in June an entirely new organization of the committee which selects the uniform Sunday-school lessons. Under the new plan the Sunday-school Association will choose eight members; eight members will be chosen by the Sunday-school Council, and one member will be chosen by each denomination represented in the Sunday-school Council. This Sunday-school Council is made up principally of the editors of Sunday-school literature connected with the publishing houses of evangelical churches. Heretofore, the Sunday-school Association has appointed its own committee, made up of representatives from leading churches.

G. Campbell Morgan Must Rest.

In this department was recently reported the return of G. Campbell Morgan to England from his American tour. Dr. Morgan, leaving America, had boasted that he was returning to his own land "in renewed health." It seems, however, that Dr. Morgan was too optimistic. He has been compelled to relinquish the presidency of Cheshunt College, Cambridge, and to forego all plans for May work. The noted preacher recently made the following statement to his congregation: "I have been living and working for a considerable time under very heavy mental and physical strain, and it is quite certain and decided that at the conclusion of my tenth year of work at Westminster I shall seek a period of release in change of work for a while. The period of the rest is far more likely to be six months than three, or even two years. I should hardly have referred to the matter thus publicly were it not that I am compelled, in view of my present condition, to seek immediate rest. I am weary almost unto death, and am convinced that, unless this action is taken at once, serious consequences will follow."

Working People and Episcopal Church.

An inquiry has recently been conducted among the dioceses of the Episcopal Church throughout the country to learn the attitude of wage-earners toward that church. Thirty-four out of the fifty-four dioceses report a favorable interest on the part of working people. The dioceses reporting an indifference on the part of working people are in those states given over largely to agriculture, such as Delaware, North Carolina, Alabama, Nebraska, Iowa, and Kansas.

M. E. Church, South at Oklahoma City.

The general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, held at Oklahoma City last week, adopted a resolution indorsing the declaration of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America for equal rights and complete justice for all men, uniform divorce laws and proper regulation of marriage.

A Story of John R. Mott.

An exchange gives the following interesting item concerning Dr. John R. Mott: "A while ago, a committee of wealthy, influential men in New York City called upon John R. Mott and offered him the presidency of a strong business corporation at a salary of one hundred thousand dollars a year. On hearing the proposition, Mott became thoughtful and serious. Then, tears showed in his eyes. Observing his serious mood and tears, the committee thinking he was troubled about what his decision should be, suggested that they did not wish him to take the matter of decision so much to heart. Mr. Mott's reply was that he was not at all troubled about how to decide, and assured them that his decision was reached the moment the proposition was made. 'What pains me,' he said, 'is that I should have so lived before you that it would come into your minds to come to me with such an offer.'"

Roman Catholic Figures.

The 1914 edition of the "Official Catholic Directory" has just been issued and contains what may be regarded as the authorized census of that Church. It is reported that there are in the United States 18,568 priests, 14,651 churches, and 16,067,985 communicants. This gives an increase over last year's figures of 623 priests, 339 churches, and 913,827 communicants. The large increase in membership figures is accounted for chiefly by more complete reports of the Ruthenian-Greek Catholics. There are 5,403 parochial schools, with 1,429,859 scholars, and 82 seminaries, 230 colleges for boys, and 680 girls' schools. New York has by far the largest number of Catholics, 2,884,723. Pennsylvania comes next, with 1,684,220; Illinois and Massachusetts are the other states which number over a million. Besides the American Catholics, communicants in the Philippines, Porto, Rico, and other over-seas territories raise the total number of Catholics under the American flag to 24,224,609.

Is Methodism "Hard Pressed"?

According to the census of English Methodism, which has just been made public, the Wesleyan Church records its eighth consecutive year of decrease in membership. The figures this year show a decline of 1,282 full members and of 875 members on trial. We understand that The Wesleyan Church, however, is not alone in this retrograde. Congregationalism, Presbyterianism, and other of the Protestant Churches are suffering a like shrinkage. This decrease results despite the fact that for the past few months the president of the conference, in company with their greatest evangelist, Gypsy Smith, has been making an extensive tour of the different centers. The Northwestern Christian Advocate (Methodist) finds some consolation in the fact that America reports increase rather than decrease in the church's membership, but is not entirely optimistic. This paper says of the situation in which the Methodist Church finds itself: "Methodism in the United States presents on the surface a quite different aspect, as there is reported an increase of over 200,000 during the last year; but even with this large addition to our membership, we do not find anything in which to glory. Methodism, along with the other churches of America, is hard pressed. If such an increase in the United States fails to cast a comforting glow over the denominational sky, we can easily conceive the gloom that has settled upon English Methodism, by having for the eighth consecutive year, to report a loss that will total many thousands of members."

Preachers as Men of Fame.

Among the famous Bostonians who have been selected as entitled to places on the "Roll-call of Fame" in Boston, a contemporary finds twelve preachers, if Edward Everett and Ralph Waldo Emerson, both of whom early abandoned their calling, are included. The other ten included are: Phillips Brooks, William Ellery Channing, John Cerverus, John Cotton, John Eliot, Benjamin Fenwick, Cotton Mather, Jonathan Mahew, Theodore Parker, E. T. (Father) Taylor. The proposals are that the names of the Immortals should be inscribed in the public Library and other public buildings, that the biographies of these men should be studied in the schools and their names used on public holidays.

Union Still Far Off.

The religious census of Houston, Texas, taken under the auspices of the State Sunday School Association, shows some one hundred denominations or separate and distinct religious bodies. It is worth while to scan the list, compiled from the cards turned in by the Home Visitors: Adventist, Agnostic, African Methodist Episcopal, Apostolic, Atheist, Baptist, Baptist M. Dr. Clark Cables from Spain.

A cablegram from Dr. Francis E. Clark, sent from Barcelona, Spain and dated May 4, says: "The greatest Protestant meeting ever held in Spain, with more than four thousand present, was addressed by Rev. Francis E. Clark, LL. D., president of the World's Christian Endeavor Union. The corporation of Barcelona granted the use of the Fine Arts Palace, the largest auditorium in the city, a concession absolutely without precedent in the history of Spanish Protestantism. Doctor Clark will address conventions in Madrid, Valencia, Zaragoza, and Bilbao."

Dr. Boynton on Church's Losses.

Protestant churches are losing many members because rural people neglect to transfer their membership when they move into the cities, according to Rev. M. P. Boynton, pastor of the Woodlawn Baptist Church, Chicago, in a recent address on "Transplanting." "It is estimated that there are 250,000 Protestant church members in Chicago," said Mr. Boynton. "In almost every neighborhood the membership of a given church could be doubled if those who have moved in from the country would unite with the church of their choice. There probably are 250,000 church members in Chicago who are not identified with their respective denominations. Our day has developed a superficial Christianity that has swelled church membership rolls. In rural communities it is not respectable to be out of the church, it is the exception when a family is not identified in some fashion with the church." Mr. Boynton suggested as a remedy that city church members should assume a greater responsibility. The social aspect of the churches must be broadened, he said, so that appeal will be made to young people who come from the country to the city.

The Negroes and Roman Catholicism.

The sixth annual conference of the National Association for the advancement of the colored people was held in Baltimore May 3-5. Rev. Stephen L. Theobald, pastor of the church of St. Peter Chaver in St. Paul represented the Catholic Church. He is the sixth of the Negro race to be elevated to the priesthood.

Union is Coming!

The report comes of a Presbyterian preacher, who baptized by immersion the superintendent of a Methodist Sunday-school while preaching in a union meeting held in a Disciples church. Clear the tracks. The union special is on the way.

New York's Easter Collections.

It is estimated that the Easter collections in the churches of New York city amounted to $3,000,000. Among the gifts was a check for one-half million dollars from Mr. Frederick G. Bourne, president of the Singer Manufacturing Company. It was a donation toward the endowment fund of the Choir School of the Episcopal Cathedral of St. John.

Immanuel Movement Still Going.

The work of the "Immanuel Movement," so widely advertised a few years ago, is still being quietly continued at the Emanuel Episcopal Church, Boston, under the direction of its original promoters, Dr. Elwood Worcester and his associate, Dr. Samuel McComb. Three clergymen are kept busy most of the time ministering to the hundreds who apply for help each month.

Chicago Presbyterians Make Record.

According to figures compiled by the Coöperative Council of City Missions in Chicago, the Presbyterian is the only denomination which has held its own in or near the business district of the city in the last twenty years.

Presbyterians in Generous Work.

The Board of Ministerial Relief of the Presbyterian Church is endeavoring to raise $10,000 from the ministers of that fellowship for the erection of a sanitorium for their brother ministers who have become afflicted with tuberculosis.

Opening of the American University.

The official opening of the American University by the President of the United States, announced for the afternoon of Wednesday, May 27, was marked further by the formal raising of the American flag over the marble buildings and extensive grounds of the university located on the Northwest Heights of Washington.

Church in Every-member Canvass.

The Congregationalists are now engaged in the every-member canvass. It will continue six weeks or possibly longer. Careful plans have been made to obtain thorough work. In speaking of the plan, the Congregationalist describes it as the "most business-like proposition made to the evangelical churches for many a day." It has been successfully tested already in five hundred Congregational churches.

Full General Assembly Reports.

Next week's issue of The Christian Century will give a full report of the achievements of the great Presbyterian gathering which is being held in Chicago this week.

Of Human Interest

Kipling Prophesies.

The age of romance, according to Rudyard Kipling, is by no means dead. On the contrary, Mr. Kipling, who recently broke his silence by a lecture before the Royal Geographical Society of London, believes that in the newly opened realm of the air "we are on the brink of discoveries as thrilling as those of the Elizabethan age."

Up to the present, he declares, "we have been forced to move in two dimensions by the help of the three beasts of burden and a few live coals in a pot. Now, we perceive we can move in three dimensions, and the possibilities of our new freedom distract and disturb us in all relations. There will arise—they are shaping themselves even now—risks to be met as cruel as any that Hudson or Scott faced: dreams as worldwide as Columbus or Cecil Rhodes dreamed, to be made good or die for, and decisions to be taken as splendidly terrible as that which Drake clinched by Magellan or Oates a little further south."

Kipling, it will be remembered, prophesied aerial navigation in his remarkable story, "With the Night Mail," published five years ago.

What "Gene" Field Wanted.

It is often told that Eugene Field one day wandered into a basement restaurant, sat down at a table, put his chin in his hands, and gazed moodily into space. A waiter came to him, and after the manner of his kind, enumerated the long list of dishes that were ready to be served.

"No, no," said Field, dejectedly, "I require none of these things. All I want is some sliced oranges and a few kind words."

Joseph Fels, Philanthropist.

Frank Crane wrote in the New York Globe recently of Joseph Fels, philanthropist, "There died the other day in Philadelphia a soapmaker by the name of Joseph Fels," said Doctor Crane, "If not the greatest, he was the most typical, significant and characteristic philanthropist of the day. This he was because he represented the direction which modern altruism is taking. . . . The intelligent man of today is shy of old-fashioned charities, for he sees the real charity is changing unjust conditions. What the manly poor want is not alms nor dole, but opportunity and a square deal. How he goes at changing bad conditions is his own business. It may be through one ism or another, this party or that; the main thing is: Does he strike at the root or chip the bark? . . . It is for this reason that I call Fels the most rational philanthropist of his time, and place his name in the list of those who benefit their fellow-men by money above those of Carnegie, Rockefeller, Doctor Pearson or any other princely endower of institutions."

A New Southern Story.

Prof. C. F. Marvin, head of the United States Weather Bureau, tells Lippincott's this story of an expedition from the University of Pennsylvania, which was sent to one of our southern states some years ago for the purpose of observing a solar eclipse.

The day preceding the event one of the professors said to an old colored man who was employed in the household where the scientist was quartered:

"Uncle Sam, if you watch your chickens tomorrow morning you will find that they'll go to roost at 11 o'clock."

Sam, as might be expected, was skeptical, but at the appointed hour the heavens were darkened and the chickens, as foretold, retired to roost. At this the old negro's amazement knew no bounds, and he diligently sought out the scientist.

"Perfessor," said he, "how long 'go did you know dem chickens would go to roost?"

"About a year ago," said the professor, indulging in a faint smile.

"Well, ef dat don't beat all!" was the man's perplexed reply. "Why, perfessor, year ago dem chickens wa'n't even aigs yet."

Secretary Garrison Tells Story.

Secretary of War Garrison, apropos of the revival in navy and army of vice admirals and lieutenant generals, said at a luncheon in Washington:

"This is largely a matter of diplomatic etiquette, a matter of elegance.

"Much goes by elegance nowadays, you know. I said recently to a multimillionaire who had risen from a plumber's apprentice to I don't know how many bank presidencies and interlocking directorates:

"'Your women folks must be proud of you, since you are self-made.'

"'Yes,' he answered grimly. 'Yes, they're about as proud of me as they'd be of a homemade dress.'"

Dr. Carrel on American Overwork.

Dr. Alexis Carrel was condemning the unhealthy life of the American business man.

"I met the other day," he said, "one of your multimillionaires, a chap who had ruined his health by overwork.

"'I used to work eighteen hours a day,' the poor old fellow wheezed from his bath chair. 'I know better, now I'm old. Age brings us wisdom, but doesn't give us any time to use it.'"

Orville Wright on Speed.

Orville Wright, at a dinner in his honor in New York, talked about the fast French monoplanes which now make 250 miles an hour.

"They're very fast," said Mr. Wright, shaking his head, "but they're—"

"Fast indeed!" interrupted a young millionaire. "Mr. Wright, is there anything on earth those machines can't overtake?"

"Yes," said Mr. Wright, with a frown. "There's one thing they can't overtake, and that's their own running expenses."

The World is Growing Better

A Much-Needed New Profession.

A new profession has come into being. It is that of health officer. Harvard University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology have joined in the founding of a School for Health Officers. Candidates for admission must be graduates of approved medical schools or bachelors of science in biology or sanitary engineering. It is strictly a post-graduate professional school, with practice in the city, state or national health departments and in the hospitals of Boston. Graduates of the school will be specialists in preventive medicine, sanitation and public health, and qualified to become effective members or officials of boards of public health. The movement to prevent disease is taking precedence of the efforts to cure disease.

Hope to Outlaw Colorado Saloons.

All signs are hopeful in the extreme for a dry Colorado this fall. No ground was lost at the spring elections. At Akron, a railroad town, already dry, the liquor people forced the issue and lost four to one. Brighton, Le Veta and Grand Valley, which have had saloons from their incorporation, went over to the dry column by substantial majorities. Manitou, Swink, Nederland and Sugar City remained wet but by reduced majorities. A strenuous fight at Gunnison, dry territory, resulted in the election of officers on the dry ticket.

Prohibition Victories in Canada.

The "dry" forces continue to win victories in Canada, recent elections in three counties of the Province of Ontario resulting in prohibition victories in each instance. In Huron County the "dry" majority was 2,536, while in the counties of Peel and Welland the majorities were each less than one hundred. The contests were hard fought, and the liquor men imported speakers from the United States as well as from other sections of Canada. As a result of these elections, one hundred and four bars close with the present year. The elections were held under the Scott act, which provides for local option by counties and does not require the three-fifths majority, as in the case of towns and cities. The temperance people are now encouraged to hope for victories in most of the counties of Ontario, and a "dry" province is the goal of their efforts.

British Fight Race Track Gambling.

Great Britain is pushing a war on race track gambling. In the House of Lords a bill has been introduced by Lord Newton to prevent the writing, publishing, or circulating within the United Kingdom of any advertising relating to betting or tipsters' business.

Henry Ford Cleans House.

Henry Ford, the auto maker, who arrested the attention of the civilized world by his profit-sharing plan announced a few months ago, and his distribution of several millions of profits to his employees, has now announced that no profits will be given to uncleanly employees. He says no employee of the Ford Motor Company will be permitted to live in tenements and squalid rooming houses. Notice has been sent to all the employees that the company expects each recipient of the profit-sharing plan to use his or her share in the profits for the good of themselves and their families and "make more comfortable your homes and dwellings." Married and single men are required to live up to the modern standard of American life or to be eliminated from the Ford organization. Single men who live in rooming houses where they sleep in shifts must find better places of abode or be dismissed.

Gates Fortune for Philanthropy.

It was reported recently that the wealth of John W. Gates is to be spent almost wholly by his widow for founding schools for the education and maintenance of orphan boys and worthy boys of poor parents.

Our Readers' Opinions

"THERE WAS NO WOMAN IN IT."

Editor The Christian Century:

I have just read your editorial, "There was No Woman in It," and am pleased to note that unlike most articles on kindred subjects in these days, it is free from the platform gush that audiences are cruelly subjected to. You really make a point. However there is perceptible the very thing you deprecate in your first paragraph, the tendency to fasten blame on one or the other of the sexes.

As I understand it, the point you make is that there "may be a great wrong with no question of sex involved." This is indeed a new thought in connection with the crucifixion but in your enthusiasm over your discovery you lose the balance you manifest in your opening paragraph. Moreover, the tragedy of the cross is not unique in the fact that there was in it no motive growing out of sex. There was "no question of sex involved" in the crime of American slavery and the necessity of the awful war fought for the freeing of the slaves. There is no question of sex involved in the crime of the legalized liquor traffic, nor in the present Mexican situation nor in a thousand other evils.

That no woman had a hand in the crucifixion is only apparent. There are no means of getting positive information in that regard. In the very nature of the case men were the prominent ones in the execution of Jesus; they composed the Sanhedrin and the Roman garrison stationed at Jerusalem and the apostolic college, and occupied the places of high priest and governor. You say that Pilate and Judas and Peter and the soldiers were all men; let it be remembered also that John and Joseph and Nicodemus were all men and that it was Joseph and Nicodemus who begged the body of Jesus of Pilate and tenderly took it from the cross and buried it in a new tomb. Furthermore, there was no woman governor nor high priest nor soldier nor apostle, and what women might have done in these same positions we can judge only by what they did do in places of authority. Woman's hand was not entirely free from blood stains in that early day as it is not in this day. You say all the women were on his side. Is it likely that the two maids that accused Peter of being with Jesus were on his side? Else why Peter's fear when they accused him? Had they held other positions their opposition would perhaps have expressed itself in more violent form. If in a very few years in Antioch of Pisidia it could be written that "the Jews stirred up the devout and honorable women" as well as "the chief men the city and raised a persecution against Paul and Barnabas and expelled them out of the coasts," it surely is not much amiss to surmise that at least some women might have had a hand in the crucifixion. As women are not always given credit for all the good they do, so they may not always be blamed for all the wrong they do.

You say that men murdered Jesus. May we not say rather that society murdered him and that men, occupying the positions by which the foul deed was to be perpetrated, simply constituted the instrument? "The sin, the shame, the stubbornness, the cruelty, the blunder of the crucifixion belong wholly to" society, and men were simply in positions that necessitated their forming the avenue by which society's meanness was to be expressed. If you limit the crime to men as such then you must limit it to the particular group of men who actually committed the deed and thus make of what you call "the sin of the centuries" a purely local affair. When a man or woman is sent to the electric chair unjustly is it "wholly and exclusively an affair of men" simply because society, composed of both men and women, in pronouncing its verdict uses men as its mouthpiece and the instrument by which the verdict is carried into execution? The mere fact that the names of women are not mentioned in connection with the crime of the crucifixion is not evidence that they were not thus connected any more than the names of women not appearing in connection with the good deeds recorded of men signifies that they had nothing to do with those good deeds. To absolutely separate men and women in the world's affairs is like separating the positive and negative forces of life.

Here is my excuse for writing. We are governed by a false principle when we think to stimulate the sexes to harmonious action by lauding the one and deprecating the other. If it is woman you are concerned about you will not help her much by belittling man in whom her happiness is more or less involved. If it is man you are concerned about you will render him but scant aid by drawing an ugly picture of woman in whom his happiness is more or less involved. Man is not moved to do his best by ever being the victim of odious sex comparisons and woman is as much the loser as is man when man does not do his best. We are, after all, but grown children. As you can do more with a child by suggesting to him that he is capable and good so you can with adults. Paul said: "Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they become discouraged." And we would say: "Writers and speakers, provoke not your readers and hearers to anger, lest they become discouraged." You must admit that you do not feel especially inspired when you sit in an audience and hear your own sex belittled and ridiculed while the other is inordinately exalted. The value of an address or an article should be measured by its effect for good on the hearers or readers. Sex has nothing to do with merit. We are not men or women through any accomplishment of our own. We should be praised or blamed as individuals and not as sexes.

If it is agreed that women can be brought to their highest and best by being honored for what they have done and can do, what valid reason is there for not using the same method with men? If to call attention to feminine badness only is depressing to women, it is equally true that the constant citing of masculine badness is depressing to men, especially when it is brought into sharp contrast with feminine goodness. I am reminded of an evangelist who in the course of his campaign had on consecutive nights a special service for women and a special service for men with a mixed audience present on each occasion. His sermon to the women was a beautiful tribute to womanhood and gave the women a high conception of their function as women. The sermon to men, however, was simply a tirade on the whole male sex, which did anything but give them a high conception of their function as men. If evil conduct must be dwelt upon let it be done without indicting the whole sex to which the guilty person may happen to belong. There are too many good women to accuse the whole sex when a few go wrong and likewise are there too many good men to accuse the whole sex when a few go wrong. May the day soon come when we shall see that there is merit in neither male nor female as such, but righteousness constitutes merit in both male and female.

MYSTICISM OR CHRIST?

Regarding Mr. Todd's contention that mysticism is the essence of religion, let me ask, "What if it is?" There are religions many, but only one Christianity. And the foundation of that, be it remembered, is belief in Jesus as the Christ, the only begotten Son of God, and the absolute acceptance of his teachings. These teachings adequately explain why the world is out of joint, why disease, ignorance and death reign, and point the way to God and life through the spiritual birth, whereby we are born back into His kingdom, whence man fell.

Why does not Mr. Todd go to the Bible and the experience of thousands of saints for examples of "the Spirit bearing witness with our spirit," instead of calling up men who wander chartless on the sea of doubt? Would he put speculators on an equal footing with Christ's redeemed? Has the Lord "refused to answer him by dreams, by Urim or by prophets?"

In the two articles there is not a syllable written that indicates a belief in the mighty truths of the New Testament that bear directly on the subject. True, Mr. Todd compliments Jesus highly, but was he wrong in his claim of being divine? If not, let us accept his statement that "His is the only name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

One of the men seeks to show that communion with God may be attained by Hindu, Mohammedan or Christian by simply "looking within." The other denies that any has such fellowship. Of course we know whom we have believed and are not mistaken in the evidence God gives by his presence. Thank God for that.

The Lord has evidently hid these things from these wise and prudent men and revealed them unto babes. Let it be even so, for so it seems good in the sight of God. E. VAN DEVENTER.

WHAT SAITH THE SCRIPTURE?

Editor The Christian Century:

In reference to the discussion between Dr. Ames and Mr. Todd, the former has by far the better of the argument. If I might be permitted a word of suggestion it is that all such presentations claiming to touch vital religious problems would find as much material for their illustration in the Scriptures as in the writings of men who have especial bent for such study. When a matter purports to deal with so fundamental a thing as our religious interests it gives added emphasis to point for elucidation to the attitude of the sacred writers. What Mr. Todd evidently contends is an element of mysticism seems assuredly to be in reality a highly developed and unusually sensitive spiritual appreciation. How very simple the matter looks in the light of the exhortation, "But grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." The view of Mr. Todd is exactly the element responsible for such developments as Christian Science and the occultism now competing for the support of those who demand that if they are to have a belief really religious it should contain what is vague and abstract. Dr. Ames has certainly written most clearly and while leaving room for the very highest spiritual appreciations makes the deepest experiences of faith the possible possession of those who would care to attain it. We must have the dreamer and also the man who cautions us that we are to be guided by something more substantial. E. RICHARD EDWARDS.

MERE SUGGESTIONS.

Editor The Christian Century:

The following remarks on the addresses of Mr. Todd and Doctor Ames are intended to be purely suggestive:

1. The addresses lead me promptly to recall the two great commandments—love to God and love to man. Some have always placed too much relative stress on the first commandment; while others have overemphasized the second. Mr. Todd seems to emphasize the divine and spiritual side of religion; Doctor Ames, the human and practical side. I think that we would all do well to stress in ourselves the side which seems to be the weaker.

2. Perhaps the greatest difference between these two advanced thinkers results from the limitations of language. Words, being signs of ideas, can not clearly define Mysticism, which belongs to the domain of affection, and not to that of thought.

3. Both these brethren know quite as well as I, that the left lobe of the brain is the home of thought, while the function of the right lobe has not been definitely discovered. I feel very sure that Mr. Todd will not desire to underestimate the realm of thought, and just as certain that Doctor

Disciples Table Talk

Patmont, Found, Tells Story.

L. R. Patmont, who disappeared from Westville, Ill., March 31, after working in a "dry" campaign there for several days, was found in an abandoned home near Columbia, Ill., May 23, and was brought to St. Louis, Mo., by John L. Brandt, of the First Church in that city, in an automobile. With a two-months' growth of beard and emaciated, Patmont presented a pitiable appearance. He told the following story, after having been identified by several friends: "While walking home from the dry meeting at Westville I was attacked at the railroad tracks by a gang of four or five rough-looking men. I was rendered partly unconscious by the sandbags with which they hit me on the head and was then put on a handcar and taken about two miles down the track. Here I was thrown into an automobile, taken about eighteen miles, in which direction I do not know, and thrown into a dark, damp cellar. For two days I was without food or a drink. When I talked to my captors above they threw hot water on me. Later they fed me rotten bananas and by and by other fruit and sandwiches. I never saw light except when they opened the trap door to throw food to me. Two days ago I was removed to the house where I was found. While being brought here I was kept in the bottom of the same automobile used before and slugged every now and then with the sandbags. I was semi-conscious all the time. A drug they forced upon me helped to keep me dazed. The automobile trips were always made at high speed and during the night, when I was put into this last cellar, two of the men gagged me, tied my wrists to my knees with the aid of a board under my knees, and then put a gunny sack over my head. They told me if I made any noise they would set fire to the house. I was cramped in such a position I could neither sit nor lie flat. After I heard the men leave the house I slowly worked my head out of the gunny sack. I chewed the gag in my mouth until I became unconscious. When I awoke I began to chew at it again and I finally worked it loose. Then I yelled for help a whole day before anybody came."

Berkeley, Cal., Disciples and the University.

H. J. Loken, pastor of First Church, Berkeley, Cal., reports that a very unique and significant service was held at the church recently. The evening service was in the hands of the University of California graduating class of this year and all the speakers were candidates for degrees. That the University is fast becoming a center for Disciples Mr. Loken indicates, is demonstrated by the fact that the Disciples are represented this year by fourteen graduates. Ten of them are candidates for the degree of A. B., three for M. A. and one for Ph. D. In addition to these there was also one graduate from the union seminary this year, and also one graduate from the Art and Craft School making a total number of sixteen graduates. The church at Berkeley has a total constituency in the university, in members and regular attendants, of one hundred and ten.

A Memorial Church to Eldreds.

The following telegram has just been received from Coldwater, Mich., signed by James F. Cargill, pastor there: "This congregation passes resolution today to build a $25,000 Eldred Memorial Church of Christ in this county seat to the memory of the Eldreds, missionaries, who died in Africa. Mr. Eldred was born in this county and his parents reside in same. Michigan needs this memorial for missions and our plea. The memorial suggestion came from Mr. Amaden, an Angola-Hiram man and is championed by Bethany and Lexington graduates. The Brotherhood should help us. What do you say? The Hull Brothers Evangelistic Company is rendering great service in sermons, songs and visitations. Splendid audiences, baptisms and accessions. Churches will make no mistake in securing the Hull Brothers Company for meetings and lectures."

Disciples in Purdue University.

Purdue University has 1,859 regular students this year. Of that number, 150 are members of the Christian church at home, while 75 have expressed a preference for this fellowship, giving a total of 225 or 12.1 per cent of the whole student body. It is the custom of the university to ask each Freshman to fill out a card stating his church membership or preference, and for the past ten years the order of numbers has been: Methodist, first; Presbyterian, second; Disciples of Christ, third. This year the Disciples have 95 Freshmen out of a class of 769. More than 90 per cent of these students are men.

Rev. H. J. Loken, who reports successes at Berkeley, Cal.

Hannibal, Mo., Every-Member Canvass.

The summary of the results of the every-member canvass conducted in the church at Hannibal, Mo., indicates that this plan is both practical and fruitful. Several weeks ago, just after the canvass was taken—late in March—The Christian Century published an enthusiastic report from the pastor, G. A. Campbell, of immediate results. The following summary will be of further interest: sixty-nine pledges were under $1 each; 213 pledges were from $1 to below $3; thirteen from $3 to below $5; forty-two pledges were from $5 to below $10; fourteen pledges were from $10 to below $15; eight pledges were for $15 each; two pledges were for $20 each; three pledges were for $25 each; one pledge was for $30; one pledge was for $31; two pledges were for $40 each. The Sunday-school pledge was for $100. Two pledges were for $125 each. The total amount of pledges received by the canvass was $1,538.69. With the C. W. B. M. and Easter offerings, the total will be over $2,000. There were 371 pledges representing 518 people. A prayer-meeting was given over to these cheer bringing reports. This meeting was the biggest blessing of all, writes Mr. Campbell. He states that in the next canvass an effort will be made to secure a pledge from every member.

C. R. Scoville in Oakland, Cal.

Arrangements have been made by the Church Federation of Oakland, Cal., to secure the services of Charles Reign Scoville in a union evangelistic campaign to be held in that city early in the fall. The exact date has not yet been set. Work has already been begun to insure the most effective co-operation of all the churches. It is possible that the Piedmont Pavilion, which is being fitted up to accommodate the Christian Endeavor Convention this summer, will be used. This building will seat five thousand people. In case it is not available a tabernacle will be erected for the occasion.

Death of John S. Shouse.

John S. Shouse, one of the best beloved of Kentucky's Disciple ministers, dropped dead at his home in Lexington, Ky., May 14. When the end came Mr. Shouse was surrounded by his children, Jouett Shouse, state senator from Kinsley, Kans., and Mrs. Sydney Smith, of Omaha, Neb., his wife and Rev. R. H. Ellett, a son-in-law, of Clintonville. Mr. Shouse was born near Midway, in Woodford County, seventy-three years ago. His father was a man of large business interests, and for years conducted a rope factory on the outskirts of Midway. His mother was a member of the Baptist Church, Mr. Shouse was first sent to the Baptist College in Georgetown, at which institution he was fitted for Bacon College, Harrodsburg, from which he was graduated. He was a student at Bacon College during the Civil War. He studied theology at that college under President Robert Milligan, who was afterwards president of Kentucky University in this city, and the father of Prof. A. R. Milligan, the distinguished Latinist. Mr. Shouse was converted under the preaching of L. L. Pinkerton, one of the early intellectual giants of the Church of the Disciples in Kentucky. In young manhood, a convert to the Christian Church, he commenced his long ministry of more than forty years at Grassy Springs, in Woodford County. Later he conducted a private school at Midway, and after that began preaching for the Christian Church in Midway. Mr. Shouse was pastor of the Midway church for eighteen years, during which time he took keen interest in the Female Orphanage School at that place. His father had been interested in this school, and for the last forty years he had been a trustee of this institute. In his younger days Mr. Shouse was eminently successful in evangelistic work, conducting great revivals in Versailles, Cynthiana and at Broadway Christian Church, when J. W. McGarvey, for many years president of the College of the Bible, was pastor. Mr. Shouse left Midway thirty-three years ago to take charge of the Broadway Christian Church at Lexington, succeeding Mr. McGarvey there as pastor. Mr. Shouse was pastor of Broadway Church for nine years. The year after he left Broadway he was financial agent of the educational interests of the Christian Church in Kentucky, working for Kentucky University, the College of the Bible, the Orphan School at Midway, and several other institutions. At the end of that year he went to Columbia, Mo., in which city he preached for about two years. From Columbia, Mr. Shouse went to Mexico, Mo., at which place he remained for several years, after which he returned to Lexington, where he remained until his death. Since returning to Lexington, Mr. Shouse has been pastor of Chestnut Street Christian Church, and of several rural churches in Kentucky. He was deeply interested in educational work. For many years he was trustee of the College of the Bible and a member of the Executive Committee of that institution.

National Benevolent Association is Building.

Building operations have been begun on the new plant for the Benevolent Association's new Juliette Fowler Home for Children at Dallas, Texas. This new building will have cost more than $40,000 when completed. The Kansas City Hospital building operation is under way. President J. W. Perry, of the Association, writes, "In digging the foundation for the Hospital, we struck some very hard rock and we are going rather slowly, but they tell us that as soon as they are through with this rock work, they will make rapid progress. They have a world of material on the ground at this time, and I believe they will push the matter along hurriedly." This will be a great national institution. The Association has recently come into a $5,000 bequest, a $2,500 annuity gift and other smaller bequests and annuities. The Easter returns are thus far running ahead of the best previous year.

Brotherhood Movement Succeeding.

E. E. Elliott, National Brotherhood secretary, writes that local chapters and many individuals are banding together in the support of the National Brotherhood Movement, and the work is making progress. The directors of the Men's Movement are firm in the conviction that there never was a time in our history when the church needed a Men's Movement more than at the present time, and hundreds of local churches are seeing to it that a beginning along this line is made.

Kansas City Ministers Meet.

Kansas City and vicinity ministers had their annual dinner at Swope Park Church, Kansas City, May 25. George Hamilton Combs acted as toastmaster, and E. T. McFarland of Lawrence, Kansas, delivered a paper. The usual toasts and "horseshoe" contests followed.

C. H. White, pastor of Sheffield Church, Kansas City, was instantly killed in an elevator accident in his home city Monday morning, May 11. His body fell nine stories after it had been crushed against the top of the elevator doorway. He leaves a wife and five children. The sympathy of the entire brotherhood goes out to the distressed family.

Indiana County Conferences.

G. I. Hoover, Secretary of Indiana's Eastern District, is accomplishing things in church efficiency, in his district. Among other conterprises, he is pushing county conferences. The third series is announced, as follows: June 1-2, Monday and Tuesday at Anderson, Madison County. June 2-3, Tuesday and Wednesday at Marion, Grant County. June 4-5, Thursday and Friday at Portland, Jay County. These conferences will be held in the First Christian Church of the cities named. These county conferences are a part of the program of work adopted by the Indiana Christian Missionary Association. C. W. Cauble, corresponding secretary Indiana Christian Missionary Association; Garry L. Cook, state Sunday-school superintendent; Mrs. O. N. Greist, state president of the C. W. B. M.; Prof. C. E. Underwood of Butler College; Joseph C. Todd of the Bloomington Bible Chair Movement; and the state evangelist for the eastern district will represent the state interests upon the program of the conferences. Local brethren in each of the counties will represent the interests of the county churches. The conferences begin on the evening of the first day and conclude on the evening of the second day. On the second morning, afternoon and evening sessions will be held. On the second day noon and evening luncheons will be served by the ladies' aid societies of the churches. Mr. Hoover writes that the great interests of the kingdom of God and the relation of our own churches thereto will be considered. Each Christian church in these counties is asked to send as many of its most representative members as it can secure to the conference of churches held in the county in which it is located.

Indianapolis in Evangelistic Campaign.

What is said to have been "the greatest evangelistic movement in the history of Indianapolis" is reported by M. C. Pearson, Executive Secretary of the Church Federation of that city. From January 1 to Easer Day the campaign was carried on, including several seasons of special effort. That success followed the campaign is no surprise, for preparations had been going on from January 1, 1913, when it was decided by the Federation to undertake the gigantic task. A week or two of prayer early in January, 1913, was observed by all the churches, as the initial step of the campaign. Following this the churches engaged in organized work along lines of personal work, Sunday-school, family visitation and personal interviews with men and women relative to uniting with the church. In addition to the January meetings held in more than 100 churches each night, a large mass meeting was held for a period of ten days at noon each day in Keith's Theatre, where the attendance ranged from 700 to 1,900 persons daily. The entire movement culminated in the observance of Passion Week beginning Palm Sunday and closing Easter

Day. During this week the churches of the city were open every night, and at noon each day. Another series of mass meetings was held in Keith's Theater, where the attendance ranged from 600 to 1,400 persons. The speakers at all these Keith Theater meetings were Indianapolis ministers with the exception of one. The result of the January meetings was the reception of 2,500 people into membership on "Church Membership Day," which was observed by all the churches on February 1, 1914. "Church Going Sunday" was observed on January 11, when more than 110,000 persons attended services the Protestant churches. The Passion Week services closed on Easter Day with the reception of about 1,000 persons into church membership, making a total of 3,500 people received into the churches of the city since January 1, 1914.

TRAVELING LIBRARIES FOR MINISTERS.

Comparatively few ministers are acquainted with the fact that small but exceedingly useful traveling libraries on theological subjects can be obtained for a fee sufficient only to cover expressage and the handling of the books through the American Institute of Sacred Literature, located at the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

Good friends of the Institute have from time to time contributed funds for the purchase of these libraries. They range in size from ten to twenty volumes, and each library is devoted to a specific topic. The libraries are shipped complete at one time and remain in the possession of the reader four months. The volumes represent the best literature published in Great Britain or America, giving an all-round view of each topic under consideration. Libraries sent out in May may be held until September, thus making it possible to utilize the long summer vacation in becoming familiar with a dozen or more of the best books on some topic of interest to the reader.

Some of the subjects of the courses represented by these libraries are, The Psychology of Religion, The Church's Work of Religious Education, Constructive Theories of Modern Scholarship Concerning the Bible, the Church and Religion, Jesus in the Light of Modern Scholarship. The Apostolic Age in the Light of Today, The Efficient Church, The Expansion of Christianity in the Twentieth Century, and The Religion of the Hebrews and Modern Scholarship. Each course has been arranged by a specialist in the department concerned, and is accompanied by a series of reviews discussing the individual books and the particular field to which they belong.

Ministers who would like to know more about this privilege should address the American Institute of Sacred Literature, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

A DOUBLE AND PERPETUAL BLESSING.

The late J. T. Parish of Winchester, Ky., left $2,000 to the Permanent Fund of Ministerial Relief, with the provision that his brother should receive an annuity on it during his life. We have accordingly delivered to the brother our Life Annuity Bond for $2,000 which assures him $120 per year as long as he lives, without risk, care, taxes, or expenses.

Each semi-annual payment will be a new reminder of both the wisdom and the affection of this brother. Health may fail, business be crushed, crops miss and banks close their doors, but this semi-annual check is as sure as the day's return—until death—and after that it will not be needed. Then it will go as unfailingly to the assistance of the veterans of the cross of Christ.

Moreover, by the 20 per cent proposition of one devoted promoter of the gospel this bequest calls out this year $400 more.

Another bequest, $250, comes from the estate of Wm. Hodgin Smith, of Denver, Colo. The 20 per cent additional immediately makes this $300.

"No one should live without a will, and no Christian should die without remembering the veterans."

ENGLISH ITEMS.

BY LESLIE W. MORGAN.

At last I think I must respond to the several intimations which I have had that further news from England would be welcome to Christian Century readers.

There are many matters of current interest on which I might write just now. To select the most appropriate is the difficult task. I think, however, amongst all the items which stand out prominently in my mind today the tragedy involved in the death of the Rev. C. Silvester Horne, M. P., takes first place. My American readers will have an interested concern in this, since the tragedy occurred on the boundary waters of America and Canada. It has been many a day since the Free Churches in this country have met with such a loss as that sustained by the passing of Mr. Horne in the heyday of his career and at the height of his popularity. The fact that he recently retired from the active ministry at the Central London Congregational Mission at Whitfields, with the exact nature of his further activities still undetermined, whether ministerial or political, did not in any way detract from the belief that he had a great work before him. To Mr. Horne there was no dividing line between religious and political duty. Everything was religious to him. He said recently that "the bottom would fall out of his religion" if he thought that his interest in social reform had in any way detracted from his religious life or work. In an interview which I had with Mr. Horne in the House of Commons a few years ago, the results of which were given to Christian Century readers, he made the statement that he thought we had yet to see that religion should dominate and control exery phase of life. His conception in this respect was akin to the Roman Catholic belief that the church should dominate and control the affairs of the world; although in the mind of Mr. Horne all ecclesiastical and sacerdotal conceptions were absent.

LOSS OF J. SILVESTER HORNE.

Mr. Horne's twenty-five years of ministerial work were confined to two churches, Kensington Congregational Church. London, S. W., a well-to-do residential district, where he spent fourteen years, and Whitfields, in the heart of the shopping and warehouse district of London. When he went to the latter place he found an almost derelict and hopeless work, but it was soon a great center of social and religiously-political activity. For several years Mr. Horne carried the double burden of his ministerial work and parliamentary duties, being the first active minister to be elected to the House of Commons. This double responsibility, together with hundreds of engagements up and down the country of a religious and political character, proved too much for his physical strength and his doctor told him at the early age of forty-eight that he was an old man. Christian Century readers are already familiar with the fact that Mr. Horne, accompanied by his wife, had gone to America to deliver the Yale lectures on preaching, and that on the boat from Niagara to Toronto he was taken ill and fell dead on the deck at his wife's feet as the boat was entering the harbor at Toronto. He leaves a wife and seven children, literally thousands of friends, and probably not an enemy, notwithstanding the fact that he fought a strenuous battle in the interest of many things which naturally did not claim the support of many classes of people. He was always kindly and always genial, and one of the most humble and unassuming of men. Amongst those outside his own family who will mourn his loss no one will probably feel it more keenly than his bosom friend, Rev. J. D. Jones. who was born on the same day and who shared so many interests in common, although their type of ministry is totally different. Mr. Jones has just left for a visit to Australia and will probably receive the news on the ocean.

ENGLISH BAPTISTS HAPPY.

The Baptist world is just now rejoicing, and indeed all denominations with them, over the completion of their Sustentation Fund of a quarter of a million pounds sterling—one and a quarter million dollars. This is the second special quarter of a million to be raised in the last decade, or a little more, the first having been in connection with their celebration of the centenary. The present sum has been secured in the record time of two years, or really in fifteen months, since through the illness of the secretary, Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, operations were practically suspended for nine months of the time. This fund is to be used for the purpose of increasing the salaries of underpaid ministers in the denomination, the minimum of which will henceforth be from 600 to 750 dollars. Great enthusiasm was shown at the demonstration held at the Royal Albert Hall, a few days ago, when the completion of the fund was announced; and our Baptist friends may be forgiven for having indulged on that occasion, and during succeeding sessions of their Spring Assembly, in a certain amount of denominational clap-trap. They have been adepts at this in past years, but the practice had been considerably curtailed of late. It has broken forth again, but really we must forgive them for this once. It may be truly said that their genial secretary never indulges in this method of rousing enthusiasm. He has better cards to play than that. He is a great leader and an ecclesiastical statesman, and has no superior, if indeed equal. While some are lamenting the loss of denominational enthusiasm and are casting about for something to take its place in order to sustain religious activity, and are expressing fear that they will fail in their search, Mr. Shakespeare is going forward in the belief that the religious idea, and especially the Christian religion, contains a sufficient dynamic, stripped of all denominational bigotry and self-seeking, to take captive the best and strongest forces in humanity. Our religion is indeed a poor thing if it must depend upon the over sympathetic emphasis of a few more or less unimportant things (which is the very essence of denominationalism) if it would hold the interest of men. Mr. Shakespeare is the most outstanding example of which I know of a religious leader, responsible for directing the activities of a denomination, who, notwithstanding this fact, stands for a united and catholic church. As a rule denominational officials block rather than promote Christian union.

THE NEW BUDGET.

As this letter is written the daily papers are full of the new budget which was laid before the House of Commons yesterday afternoon by the doughty Chancellor of the Exechequer, Mr. Lloyd George. It is the first budget since 1909 in which any new taxes have been introduced, the memorable budget of that year having shown sufficient elasticity to provide for the rapidly increasing expenditure. Even yet it has not reached the limit of its growth, but the demands for additional social reforms, the desire to relieve local taxation, and the necessity for relief in certain overburdened quarters have made it necessary to seek new fields of taxation, or at least to increase the harvest from certain ones already under cultivation. The additional income of nearly ten million pounds required is to be largely derived from the increase of the tax on unearned incomes, an increase of the tax on all incomes of a high figure, to a decrease in the scale of incomes on which a super-tax is assessed, and in a large increase of the death duties of estates over 300,000 dollars. The reduction made for each child of parents with an income of less than 2,500 dollars has been doubled, and certain other reductions have been made in the taxes imposed upon those in less well-to-do circles. On the whole the new taxes are derived from those who are able to pay, in the interests of those who are not able.

HOME RULE EXCITEMENT ABATING.

This leads the opposition to say that it is an electioneering budget, which is only another way of saying that there are more poor people than there are rich. For the first time in the history of the country the estimated expenditure, for which the new budget seemingly makes ample provision, exceeds the one billion dollar mark. Of this amount the navy swallows up more than 250 millions and the army not much less. There is probably no such other example of unwilling expenditure as that which is being forced upon the nations of the world by the grip of the all but universally regretted system for obtaining national security.

The interest in the budget has, for the time being, displaced the passion and ill feeling engendered by the critical situation in regard to Irish Home Rule. A week ago excitement was at its height. The government was being subjected to angry protest by the opposition because of certain precautions which had been taken to guard army stores in Ireland, and which the opposition claimed was a move directly intended to provoke the Ulster volunteers to violence, thus giving an excuse for shooting them down. But this phase of the situation was soon to be transformed into that of the supporters of the government condemning the opposition for their sympathy, if not active co-operation, in extensive gun smuggling in violation of the regulations recently passed forbidding the importation of arms and ammunition into Ireland. There are signs just now that a compromise may be arranged, a compromise which perhaps, as is not infrequent, will not fully satisfy anyone, and yet which for that reason will probably pacify everyone.

PREACHERS FOR FLORIDA.

Do our preaching brethren realize the great opportunity for service which Florida offers at this time?

Our trouble is, mainly, the want of means to meet the great demand. But is there not a more excellent way? Have our preachers forgotten the personal sacrifices made by the pioneer preachers in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri and other states? Do any of our present preachers remember how those pioneers labored and were sustained during the early days of our religious movement? We then had few churches and scarcely any of them were able to pay a preacher even a moderate salary. Still the work went on, and the foundations were laid for the numerous churches which now exist. Has the heroic spirit been lost to our ministry? I trust not.

Florida presents many of the same conditions that existed in many of the states at the time to which I have referred. We have few churches and not one of them is able to pay the salaries which are common now in the states where our pioneer preachers labored.

In thinking the matter over I have reached the conclusion that there must be some among the following classes who would delight to come to Florida and labor for the Master:

(1) Preachers with private means who would be glad to live in a climate such as Florida possesses, without any special compensation for their services. To breathe this atmosphere, while at the same time one is working for a great cause, ought to be enough for those who have the means to support themselves.

(2) Another class is composed of young men who have yet to win their spurs. There is no better field in all the world for young heroes, who are willing to make sacrifices and wait on results, than right here in Florida. But they must have the heroic spirit, or they are not needed in this sunny land.

(3) A third class, I imagine, is fairly numerous—men who are themselves not very vigorous in health, or else some of their families need a change to this mild climate. Now many of these could find employment here, but in most cases their remuneration would be small compared with what they receive where they are now living. But could they not afford to make a change, as living here need not be very expensive? If a man is willing to work with his own hands he need not fear the results, if he has real stuff in him of the right kind. He would receive cordial sympathy, and as far as possible financial support. There are a few Disciples in nearly every town of the state, and a man of good character and fair ability could settle almost anywhere, and, if he has a little means with which to start, could build up a church that would be self-sustaining. There are at least fifty places right now where this very kind of work could be done, if we had the men of faith, tact, and energy who would undertake it. But let it be known that there is no place here for men who can not come highly recommended for character, ability, and faithfulness with respect to the cause we plead. But there is room, and plenty of it, for the right kind of men belonging to any of the classes I have mentioned, who will come here not merely for a winter's outing, but for a permanent residence, and who are willing to share with the people here in all the sacrifices which are necessary to do this pioneer work. It may be that these men may never be compensated commensurately with the sacrifices they would have to make, but the coming generation will rise up and call them blessed.

If this appeal moves any sympathetic heart let him write to me and I will help him to get located.

THE FRIEND OF SINNERS.

INTERNATIONAL UNIFORM LESSON FOR JUNE 14.

Luke 18:9-14; 19:1-10. Memory Verses, 19:10.

Golden Text.—I came not to call the righteous, but sinners.—Mark 2:17.

American Standard Bible.
Copyright, 1901, by Thomas Nelson & Sons.
(Used by permission.)

18:(9) And he spake also this parable unto certain who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and set all others at nought: (10) Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a publican. (11) The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, God, I thank thee, that I am not as the rest of the men, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. (21) I fast twice in the week; I give tithes of all that I get. (13) But the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote his breast, saying, God, be thou merciful to me a sinner. (14) I say unto you, This man went down to his house justified rather than the other; for every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled; but he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

19: (1) And he entered and was passing through Jericho. (2) And behold, a man called by name Zacchæus; and he was a chief publican, and he was rich. (3) And he sought to see Jesus who he was; and could not for the crowd, because he was little of stature. (4) And he ran on before, and climbed up into a sycamore tree to see him: for he was to pass that way. (5) And when Jesus came to the place, he looked up, and said unto him, Zacchæus, make haste, and come down; for to-day I must abide at thy house. (6) And he made haste, and came down, and received him joyfully. (7) And when they saw it, they all murmured, saying, He is gone in to lodge with a man that is a sinner. (8) And Zacchæus stood, and said unto the Lord, Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have wrongfully exacted aught of any man, I restore fourfold. (9) And Jesus said unto him, To-day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham. (10) For the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost.

v. 9. Certain who trusted in themselves: These were probably some of his weaker followers. It is interesting to note the various degrees of piety and devotion among the disciples of Jesus.

v. 10. Into the temple to pray: It was probably at nine, twelve, or three o'clock that they went up to the temple on Mount Moriah to offer their prayers. A Pharisee: The Pharisees were the narrow formalists of the time of Jesus. A publican: A tax-gatherer.

v. 11. Stood and prayed: It was their custom to stand when praying. With himself: It is more of a soliloquy on his goodness than a prayer. I thank thee: Contrast this with the model prayer of Jesus: "Our Father." Prayer should be more social. That I am not as the rest of men: "It is better to be ashamed of never having done anything to be proud of than to be proud of never having done anything to be ashamed of." Youth's Companion.

v. 12. I: The "ego" protrudes throughout the entire prayer. But it is not really a prayer; it is more of a boast of his observance of the customs of his sect.

v. 13. But the publican: Here we have real prayer. He feels the blight of sin and humbly calls upon God for forgiveness.

v. 14. Went down to his house justified: There is nothing so satisfying as communion with God. He went to the house of prayer with a great burden of sin upon his heart; he went from this house of prayer with the burden lifted. The Pharisee was the same arrogant sinner after his sojourn is God's house as before. Do we go to God's house humbly seeking light?

v. 2. Zacchaeus: He was a Jew. Chief publican: The chief publican had as his business the direction of the work of a considerable number of inferior publicans who did the actual collecting of the taxes. Matthew was an inferior publican.

v. 3. 4. Sought to see Jesus: He was undoubtedly a seeker after a better life.

v. 5. He looked up: He had been attracted by the fixed gaze of Zacchaeus. I must abide at thy house: Of course, Jesus "knew what was in man," but we must not fail to recognize that the very peculiar circumstance would reveal much to anyone in the throng. The man's dress showed his station in life. Indeed he was probably a well known character in this section. His eager expression and his position in the tree would both indicate his interest.

v. 6. Received him joyfully: This was the proper way to receive so royal a guest.

v. 7, 8. That is a sinner: So the Jews regarded all tax collectors. Behold, Lord, etc.: He offers a full surrender of his life to God.

At the Heart of the Lesson.

BY REV. A. Z. CONRAD, PH.D.

Self-sufficiency is the relentless enemy of divine sufficiency. Self-trust stands as a perpetual barrier to trust in Christ. A sense of need is a primary condition of appeal for supply. If no sense of sin, then no call for a Saviour. There is more hope for a conscience smitten prodigal feeding swine and eating husks than for the pampered, palace-housed, self-satisfied Pharisee. The last thing an insurrectious member of the Sanhedrin would have asked was salvation. To-day his antitype with a smattering of knowledge mistakes veneer for virtue and declines the proffered atonement of Jesus Christ as altogether unnecessary. Among the humble who boasted of no personal merit and were ready to accept help in the struggle for life at high levels Jesus found ready listeners and obedient followers. Those who depended upon their own righteousness and entertained the fatal "salvation by character," derided and rejected him and finally crucified him.

THE ASSUMPTION OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

"They trusted in themselves that they were righteous." Any one who demands the recognition of God on the ground of his own righteousness either has a very distorted view of righteousness or a most imperfect recognition of himself. Righteousness is a strong word, a large word. To be righteous one must first of all be right with God. To be right with God one must be obedient to his will. Only one has ever been fully obedient and that was Jesus Christ, who was able to say, "I do always the things that please him."

Again, to be righteous one must be right with men. The strictest justice must obtain. Kindliness and consideration, sympathetic interest, compassionate concern with an absence of all jealousy and envy and all disposition to take advantage of the unlearned and unfavored.

Furthermore, it involves being right with one's own conscience. The things which conscience condemns must ever be rejected, and denounced and abandoned, and the things which conscience commends must ever be the practice of life.

Now who can measure up to such a standard as this and say on the ground of his own perfected life, "We may demand the recognition of God?"

SOLILIQUY SUBSTITUTED FOR SUPPLICATION.

The portrait of the Pharisee is drawn in outline. We see him moving with measured step to the temple. Self-consciousness is declared by every look and every movement. With a supercilious air he passes others who are moving, too, toward the temple. With a sneer of contempt he looks upon all men other than himself. With self-complacency he contemplates his own life. He freely reviews his own conduct. Without one element of humility he begins his prayer, "God, I thank thee." He assumes a right to be familiar with the Eternal. He expresses thankfulness. We are disappointed. After the first three words all goes wrong. He does not say, "I thank thee that thou," but, "I thank thee that I." Not gratitude but gratulation is his thought. He assumed almost an equality with him to whom he prays. He presumes upon divine goodness and proceeds to contemplate himself. "I am not as other men." The first effects of self-righteousness is to mark down other people. He sees no God. He sees only himself. He substitutes soliloquy for supplication and undertakes to instruct God as to what he is.

RECITAL IN PLACE OF REPENTANCE.

"I fast twice a week." This was beyond the legal requirement, vastly beyond it, and was uttered with the idea of putting God under obligations to him. There was no question about his punctilious observance of the law. He was seeking to gain credit for himself by doing certain things more frequently than the law demanded. A parade of piety must always accompany soul poverty. Ceremonialism is no substitute for consecration. Ritual recitals will not be accepted as sufficient. Nothing was farther from the practice of Christ than religious exclusiveness. He never taught that there was the slightest benefit or merit in the self-infliction of pain. The Pharisee added, "I give tithes of all that I get." Certain things were exempted from the tithing system, but he included all, again with the idea of special merit. He gave to the temple treasury. He gave alms. All this was not only a duty but a privilege. There was no saving virtue in such acts.

PUBLICAN PENITENCE.

The portrait of the publican is not less striking when in a few bold lines our Lord pictures to us the condition of true worship. First there was a sense of unworthiness when "standing afar off," he did not presumptuously approach the holy place. He made no demand. He put forth no claim. He recited no personal achievements in righteousness. He was overwhelmed with a sense of his own sin and of his own unworthiness. He remembered no man. He did not even see the presumptuous, self-righteous Pharisee. He saw only God. His cry was not for justice but for mercy. Unmerited forgiveness was what he sought. He based his whole hope upon the unmerited favor of his father. The one thing in which he differed from the Pharisee was his sense of sin. It is ever the dividing line between the true and the false worshiper.

JUSTIFIED.

The point of the parable is found in the results of temple worship. "This man went down justified rather than the other." He had made his confession and was acquitted. He had made his plea and was pardoned. He hed declared honestly his own unworthiness and was approved. He had recognized he was lost and now was safe. He had become the object of divine pity and sympathy and where condemnation had rested upon him now he was sensible of beatitude and went away with hope of his heart. Is this the effect of your church attendance?

SAVED AND LOST.

Two striking utterances stand out in bold outline in the concluding utterances of our Lord. "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." "Lost" and "saved" are words which are being much confused in our day. They are perfectly clear in the Gospels. They are perfectly clear in the life and work of Jesus Christ. They are perfectly evident through all the epistles. Only the rejection of the spirit of the New Testament can lead to the confusion which exists. Nothing is clearer than that every man is lost except he is saved through Jesus Christ the Lord. It is faith in Christ that changes at once the status of the immortal soul from "lost" to "saved." The supreme business of the disciple of Jesus is so to relate the lost to Jesus Christ that they may rejoice in the consciousness of their soul salvation. When we are impressed with that word "saved" we will more diligently and devotedly and with true redemptive passion seek to make salvation a reality in individual lives.

MATERNITY.

Within the crib that stands beside my bed
A little form in sweet abandon lies,
And as I bend above, with misty eyes,
I know how Mary's heart was comforted.

O World of Mothers! Blest are we who know
The ecstasy—the deep, God-given thrill—
That Mary felt, when all the earth was still,
In the the Judean starlight, long ago.

—Anne P. L. Field, in "Putnam's."

TOPIC FOR JUNE 10.

Efficiency—The Individual Christian. Acts 1:8; Phil. 2:12; Eph. 4:11-13; Acl. 9:10.

A prominent American preacher recently said that every young man who graduates from a theological seminary ought to take an oath not to organize a new society within five years after his graduation. The same minister or another of like mind gave it as his opinion that the preacher ought to count that day's work well done that includes the killing of a church society. The ablest preachers of America believe in organization. They know its value. They also know that much of the energy of the disciples of the Lord is wasted in keeping up useless societies. Salvation by societies has become a popular theory. For many of us the Lord's Day brings neither rest nor inspiration; we do not use it for saving souls but for tying together some organization that is about to fall to pieces. One of these days the efficiency campaign will begin in the churches and when it ends we shall know that much of our supposed progress has been motion in a circle.

INDIVIDUAL INITIATIVE.

Manufacturing establishments encourage their employees to think by offering rewards for ideas that will improve their products. The ideal church is one in which every member is contributing to the common stock of knowledge. It is a poor sort of church in which the minister does all the thinking. The situation does not improve when the oldest elder or the richest man or woman decides to bear the burden of thinking for the whole congregation. A church of Jesus Christ should be the most democratic institution on the face of the earth. Discussions in the Sunday-school class should be such as to invite expression from every member.

KNOWLEDGE AND DOING.

Our ignorance debars us from participating helpfully in the life of the Christian community. We have neither the vocabulary nor the ideas that make discourse interesting and profitable. We have words and ideas suited to ball games, fishing, card playing, horse trading, and other amusements and vocations, but equipment for the study of experience we lack. We misunderstand the motives of the man whom we ought to know best. We hear the noise of the Salvation Army but we remain in ignorance of its spiritual power until its external resources become so conspicuous that we are driven to look for an explanation. The critic of missions utters a deal of nonsense and we cannot silence him because we know as little as he does. Those to whom the church must look for contributions to its strength are giving attention to immigration, to changing economic conditions, to the growth of democracy and science. They speak with power because they observe accurately and they reason correctly.

DOING AND KNOWING.

If we must know in order to do, we must also do in order to know. What the church needs is not advice from loafers: it needs the counsel of workers who try to understand what they are about. William James makes the statement that "the most colossal improvement which recent years have seen in secondary education lies in the introduction of manual training schools; not because they will give us a people more handy and practical for domestic life, and better skilled in trades, but because they will give us citizens with an entirely different intellectual life." This new intellectual life will benefit the church. Perhaps there will be fewer of the dumb in Sunday-school classes and in prayer-meeting when we all do more.

Neh. 13:14; Ps. 106:30; Jer. 22:15-16: Matt. 10:42; 18:3; John 3:21; Acts 10:4; Rom. 2:13; I Cor. 3:6-9; Gal. 6:4; Heb. 10: 24; Jas. 1:22.

REGARDING MYSTICISM.

Ames will not wish to undervalue the source of Mysticism. Surely, Dr. Ames, the right member can not be less important than the left.

4. I feel that I do not quite understand Mr. Todd, when he represents mysticism as friendship. Even with his qualifications the term "friendship" seems inadequate for the average mind. It clings to the natural degree of life, and refuses to perform service in the higher degree.

5. I thank him for his lesson on preaching. I need it. Mr. Todd's father and I began to preach about the same time, and in adjacent localities. This was about sixty years ago. I am still learning, and more eagerly as the days go by. I feel scarcely prepared to have my preaching submitted to Mr. Todd's high test. Consciousness of God's presence is a wonderful power over the soul, when the soul is brought into touch with it. A few earnest souls will feast upon it. But will the masses who are far from God be benefited by it? Of course, I do not question the success of R. J. Campbell and other mystics in dealing with the masses, but will a wider circle of observation confirm Mr. Todd's conclusion? Is it the spirituality of the modern evangelist that charms his immense crowds? Was it not the sensationalism of novelty that drew crowds to hear our Lord? And did not the people leave him on account of the spirituality of his teaching?

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

* * *

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

* * *

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

Let Us Have The Best!

Progressive Texas, in its recent splendid convention at Gainesville, put itself on record as standing for the very best in religious literature. Not only must the Disciples demand the best that can be produced in weekly journals, but in Sunday school supplies no encouragement must be given to the production of inferior studies.

E. M. Waits, of Ft. Worth, Tex., made one of the most striking addresses of the Gainesville convention. At its close it was unanimously indorsed and ordered sent to the Disciples' weeklies for publication. Here is what Mr. Waits had to say concerning Sunday school literature:

"If the Syndicate excels our supplies in pedagogical value and attractiveness, the thing for our publishers to do is not to get angry, but to move up. If you say this costs I say success everywhere costs. Put some of the dividends into improvements and make the product and the by-product the best that can be had."

The Disciples Publication Society would make only one suggestion regarding this excellent pronouncement. It is a practical one. What is the use of producing still other perfect lines of supplies, when we already have, edited by the experts of the Sunday school world, including a Disciple representative,

A Perfect System of Studies, the Bethany System of Sunday School Literature

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR HERBERT L. WILLETT, CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

In Uncompromising Terms

There is something very pathetic in the picture of Peter standing up to preach the funeral sermon of Judas. Judas had just died. He suffered a tragic death by suicide. His death and the manner of it shocked the Christian community with unutterable horror. Who was to rise up to preach the funeral sermon of the man who had betrayed Christ? It was the man who had denied Him.

There are those who affirm that he might better have sat down. It is not altogether certain but that some were present who thought so then. It must have required no little self-control on his part to have stood up in the midst of those who knew his own unfaithfulness.

He stood up to preach and to preach concerning Judas and the appointment of his successor. Judas was the only one of the apostles who ever had a lineal successor, and there are those who have questioned whether it was worth while that he should have had one.

When Peter delivered this terrible sermon did he feel no self-reproach? Did nothing within him say, "Consider, for thou also was tempted and didst fall?" If he did, there is no trace of it in the sermon. Relentlessly, fearlessly, Peter spoke the words of terrible reproach as he stood in the company of one hundred and twenty. "Judas," he said, "was guide to them that took Jesus. He had been numbered among us and received his portion in our ministry. He has gone to his own place."

That is the most terrible thing that can be said about some people, that they have gone where they belong, to the place they have prepared for themselves, to the place fitted to be their environment by reason of what they have done to their own souls. Peter took two texts from the book of Psalms. "Let his habitation be made desolate," and "Let another take his office."

In all this there was no intimation of pity, no word that in any wise blunted the keen edge of condemnation. It was no time for mawkish sentiment. It was no time to soften the terrible severities of apostolic invective. Relentlessly, sternly, with words that cut and seared, Peter spoke of Judas.

But are we not certain that Peter applied something of this sermon to himself? Must not every preacher who is faithful to the truth apply his sermon backward as well as forward? The Apostle Paul stood in a holy fear, lest having preached to others he himself might become a castaway. Peter knew too well his own weakness not to feel something of self-reproach even in the utterance of these words of condemnation.

But Peter was brave enough and strong enough not to put his confession into this sermon. Already he had wept his bitter tears; already he had found forgiveness and the disciples knew he had seen the Lord and had it out with Him. Peter stood up a redeemed, penitent, forgiven man. If he had sad memories of his own denial, and he must have had, no word of that self-reproach colored his sermon. That was between his own soul and God. His message he gave forth to the disciples.

There must have been those present who hearing Peter, wept tears of sympathy because they knew out of what struggle and self-condemnation had come his power to stand and preach this awful condemnation of him who had betrayed his Lord.

And what must Matthias have thought as he heard these words? How must he have taken thought to himself in wholesome fear lest he might also become an unfaithful follower of his Master.

It was a time when each of the disciples may well have asked himself again, "Lord, is it I? Lord, is it I?"

We are exhorted in Holy Writ to be careful in our condemnation of others, remembering lest we ourselves be tempted. It is a wise and salutary reminder. Yet, there are times when God's condemnation of human sin must be spoken through human lips, and we shall wait long if we delay till a perfect man be found to utter God's message of denunciation.

* * *

There were men present who had been friends of Judas, who must have thought Peter's words were more severe than the occasion called for. It would have been a cheap and easy thing for them to tell him that he was another, but that would not have made the sins of Judas any less, nor the task of Peter any less easy or any less imperative. Weak and sinful as we all are, it is sometimes a necessary thing that the condemnation of God should be spoken in uncompromising terms. Of such occasions there is no more tragic or suggestive example than the denier's funeral sermon on the betrayer.

The Unchanging One

A Quieting Message for a Restless World.

BY G. CAMPBELL MORGAN.

THERE is nothing more certain or more impressive than the transitory nature of earthly things. We change our calendars, and are conscious as we do so that we ourselves have changed. We glance about us, and we find that there has been change everywhere. And even while we are in the act of thinking, lo! we have changed again and all around us is changing even as we look.

Now, this fact of change is at once the salt and the poison of life. It is the salt of life preventing monotony, that deadly foe of the soul. It is the poison of life paralyzing effort, that vital all of the soul. Change is of the very nature of life, and is necessary to life. Change takes on the guise of death, and checks the movements of life. Thus we are perplexed and earnestly do we desire to find some center of permanence, and some perennial freshness.

We need a center of permanence, not an anchorage. An anchorage means limitations and monotony. An anchorage belongs to a ship, and is a hindrance to the ship. The tug of the ship to be away from the shore, and to be out upon the sea, is of its very nature and of its very being; and the anchor holds it back. We are not asking for anchorage. The only sense in which the figure of the anchor is warranted is when it is used, as it is used by the writer of the letter to the Hebrews, in such form that it is contradicted in the very suggestions it makes.

THE NEED OF THE PROPER ANCHOR.

In an earlier part of this letter, he said: "the hope set before us; which we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast." Yes! but let us finish the quotation! "Entering within the veil."

In that phrase he has contradicted his own symbol finely, intelligently; not blunderingly. It is the figure of the anchor cast, not where the shoals are, but within the veil; the place of finality, the place of satisfaction, and eternity, and God. Thus the figure breaks down; but in the magnificence of its breakdown it is fitting in every sense, and at any and every time. The anchorage which we need must have some element, sure, unshakable, persistent, continuous; and because we are persons, let us at once say, some Person, never destroyed, never weary, never changing.

And we ask not merely a sign of permanence, but a secret of freshness; not excitement, that means reaction and yet more deadly inertia; but some element growing, developing, surprising the soul. And once again, because we are persons, we need some Person always alive, full of initiation, and ever equal to realization. Where shall we turn for these things?

THE IMMUTABLE CHRIST.

We look within, and if there be one place where we fail to find the stability for which we cry out, and the springing freshness we desire, it is within. We look to our friends, and the story is tragic. The air is full of farewells to the dying. We look to circumstances, and there is neither anchorage that holds, nor freshness that satisfies the soul. It may be that the sanest of us had a sort of sub-conscious feeling of ease when 1913 had passed away. Then on the first day of 1914 death stalked upon the Embankment and smote us between the eyes, and over the heart! Where are we? Great God! Where are We? We must find anchorage in that broader sense of the word somewhere. Where shall we turn?

In the declaration of this text is found the perfect answer to the two-fold cry of the human soul. Let us remind ourselves then of the eternal freshness of Christ. He is always alive; "I am alive for evermore;" always beginning some new thing, "I am the Beginning;" always realizing and consummating that which He does begin, "I am the Ending." Let us remind ourselves of the unchanging nature of Christ. He is never destroyed, nor can He be; never weary, however weary we may be; never changing, for love never faileth, and love altereth not when it alteration finds. He is unchanged in the fact of His perpetual freshness; so that no soul has ever found it to be monotonous to walk with Him or talk with Him or think of Him or sing of Him; He is perpetually breaking in upon the soul with new surprises, in some amazing and lightning flash, or as the freshness of a morning in the spring-time. He is the same yesterday and to-day and for ever.

THE JESUS OF TO-DAY.

The text is in itself the message with which I fain would greet and hearten my own soul, and that of each of those who may be reached by my words. I do not propose to defend this statement of the writer. I affirm it anew, and pray that its music may strengthen our faith, may brighten our hope, may deepen our love. Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and to-day and for ever. Let us then attempt to listen to the music as we consider Jesus Christ yesterday, Jesus Christ to-day, Jesus Christ for ever.

And what of Jesus Christ to-day? There is a difference, and we must face it. The difference is that He is now gone out of sight, as He said He would, in those Paschal discourses from which our lesson was taken; and for a while we shall not see Him. He is gone out of sight. But He also said, "A little while and ye shall see Me." In that promise there was no reference to a second Advent. He was referring to something that was to be immediate; something to which they actually did come, and that soon. Those men who heard Him talk in the Upper Room, Peter, James, and John; Philip, Thomas, and Jude; the men who spoke in the Upper Room, those men lost Him. He passed out of their sight. Then came Pentecost, and they saw Him as they had never seen Him, though they could no longer see Him. He said to them: "It is expedient for you that I go away." I do no violence to the thought conveyed if I change the word. "It is better for you that I go away." Why better? Because this Eternal One, localized in flesh, was limited by that localization; because in the midst of His Ministry He was compelled to say, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straightened till it be accomplished?" Passing out of sight, the sight of sense, in His coming again by the Holy Spirit to the consciousness of such as put their trust in Him. He came into nearer association, came to be the Companion of the spirit-life of men, that inner spirit-life which no man can see, either of himself or of his neighbor, by the eyes of sense. "No man hath seen God at any time." We all agree that no man hath seen Him at any time. No man hath seen man at any time! Do you agree? It is true. You have never seen me, I have never seen you. We look upon these outward forms, these are but tabernacles. Thank God if we have learned the lesson, that the body, marred, spoiled, broken, laid to rest, was but the tenement house. Jesus said to these men in effect: I am shut outside you by living in this body, while you live in these bodies. I will go away and come again, and come right into the true spirit-life of you, and reveal Myself to you by the Spirit, as you never can know Me while I remain outside of you. We can have closer followship with Jesus than with each other. I am shut out from the final fellowship of my larger spirit-life that lies beyond. I can have no final spiritual fellowship with my earthly friends, but with Him I can have full spiritual fellowship.

THE UNIVERSAL APPEAL.

Thus He came again to these men, and to us. He is known to-day through the Writings, through spiritual interpretation, and through the saints, who in their fellowship with Him are transformed into His likeness and reveal Him to other men. Thus, then, He is the same. The only thing that is different is the accidental. The essential abides. Through that which I have described, not carelessly, but carefully, as the accidental of the days of His flesh, the essential and abiding was revealed.

I look again to the yesterday, to the days of His flesh, and I declare that He is the same, making the same appeals to humanity. That is the deep secret of the victory of Christianity. All our hindrances are due to the fact that we quarrel about forms and methods of expression and neglect the central authority of the Christ Himself. Oh! shame on us! shame on us! He is the same. Let us remember that whenever we are tempted to quarrel!

He makes the same appeal to humanity. Take that little Testament of yours! Nay, take much less. Take Mark alone, the first and simplest narrative. Print it, give it away. Read it to men everywhere. Read it to them when they are quiet, when they are thoughtful. Let them look, let them listen. So let them see this Jesus. They will come to Him. He will attract them whether they are black or white; whether learned or illiterate; whether high or low, bond or free, rich or poor. When they see Him they forget black or white, high or low, rich or poor, bond or free, for they have found in Him their own humanity. Humanity ever goes out to humanity in Him. That is the story of the success of missions.

MAN NEED NOT SIN.

He makes the same appeal to human nature. He will not excuse sin. He will not excuse my sin. He will never allow me to say in His presence that I was bound to sin. We cannot say it, we dare not say it, in His presence. We say it to each other. We know we lie when we say it! But when we are alone with Him we dare not look into His face and say we were bound to sin! We know it is not true, All modern philosophy, in so far as it says that sin is necessary, is a lie against which this Christ of God proceeds, and he will deny it in the human conscience, ere His Mission is completed. Man need not sin.

But it is also true that we cannot say in His presence that our sin is incurable. It is not incurable. He believes in us. He has perfect confidence in humanity. He is producing the same effects to-day as of old, effects which I shall not enumerate, but summarize in His own sweet word, Rest. "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." In that word I find, Righteousness, peace, joy.

He is the same to-day in His mysteriousness, still surprising the soul, still breaking out upon us at some point in life, amazing us, and then explaining His own surprise, and moving us a little farther on toward the final knowledge.

So let me end, with only a brief sentence or two. He is the same For Ever. The phrase that the writer actually used was most suggestive. "For Ever" is altogether too mechanical. It is trying to say everything. We cannot say everything. Let us dare to be poetic, in company with the Bible. Jesus Christ, the same yesterday and to-day and to the Ages! They come, they pass, they go! One thousand nine hundred and fourteen. The year has broken, the year has dawned. It is for us a new age, but a hand breadth, but a span; but it serves to illustrate everything that is suggested by the phrase, to the Ages.

We are always at the beginning of a new age. Behind us are ages; before us are ages! Now the writer says that this One Who came into human history and human life, and Whom He names Son of God, Jesus, Christ, is the same to the Ages! At the beginning of ths letter he declared that this One fashions the ages, determines their nature, limits their duration, includes their forces.

Heaven will never be monotonous. There will always be new satisfaction for the heart. We shall never become satiated with the things spiritual. The unfathomed deeps and distances of the ages lie before us, but He will lead us through them. Therefore am I no longer afraid of the vastness of the outlook.

That Living One is in our midst now; that is permanent, the spring of all that is fresh. Dare I be afraid? Amid the shock of battle, and the stress of life, and the overwhelming perplexities of things, Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and to-day and for ever.

March on, my soul, without fear or faltering, for the Pierced Hand holds the sceptre of the Universe! All is well!

The Tripod and the Kingdom

An Address Delivered at the Texas State Convention of Disciples, Held at Gainesville Last Month.

BY EDWARD McSHANE WAITS.

THE oracle of Delphi was the avant courier of the modern press. For a thousand years this shrine was held sacred and through it the Greek god uttered what was best for the Greek nation. Great men like Lycurgus, Solon, Socrates and Alexander the Great were on terms of intimacy with this oracle. It spoke for the unity, harmony and brotherhood of the Greek-speaking world. The priests of Delphi sought to express what was universal in the Greek soul. They saw in vision and uttered in totality what would be best for the people. When Greece was divided and the oracle had to take sides with Greek against Greek, the unity for which it stood was broken; Delphi no longer felt for the whole of Greece, but only for a part; it ceased to command the worship and confidence of the Pan-Hellenic world. It was no longer united, but dismembered, and from this hour its influence declined.

CLASSIC GREECE VS. COMMERCIAL AMERICA.

It is a far cry from classic Greece to commercial America, the meeting place and "melting pot" of the nations; from the Delphic oracle to the "Associated Press" with its 25,000 newspapers aggregating an annual output of five billion copies. Nowhere in all the world has journalism so large an audience. The poorest are rich enough to buy and read a newspaper.

The editor mounts his pulpit to speak to an audience daily aggregating from fifty thousand to a half million. "What a pulpit!" exclaimed Lowell. "The editor takes his text from the open volume of the world, a Bible that no priestcraft can shut and clasp from the laity."

The province of the press is to give news, express public opinion and to create public opinion. The editor of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat says that "the successful newspaper editor is he who knows where hell is going to break out next and is on the ground with a reporter." Some of our irrepressible editors have gone beyond this and when the oracle seems dumb overtime have a method of "playing up" his Satanic majesty's strange fire.

As an educational force for good or evil the press transcends every other force in the world. Napoleon said that he feared four hostile newspapers more than one hundred thousand bayonets.

Rev. E. M. Waits, of Ft. Worth, Tex., who thinks that the Disciples papers should have enterprise, vision, a big program and soundness of faith.

It wields a power well nigh omnipotent. Like Puck, it can "put a girdle around the globe in forty minutes." It has its ambassador at every court, its representative in every army, its courier on every road, its agent in every council, its reporter in every court of justice and social function. The press is king, and if journalism is so all-powerful, who will save us from journalism?

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The children of light may not be as wise in their generation as the children of this world, but they have been wise enough, aggressive and appreciative enough to realize the value of the religious press. It is among us a mighty force to reckon and to be reckoned with. The Disciples' Year Book reports "fifty-seven varities," and these like all Gaul may be divided into three parts—except when biliary disturbances seem to shift all gall into one part! Usually there is the radical, the conservative and irenic. This is an inevitable classification, since all people are divided into these three classes. The religious press is a scriptural institution; we read in Mark 2:4 that the people could not get near Jesus because of the press. When Reginald Campbell was asked what he thought was the greatest hindrance to the progress of the gospel in England, he said, "The religious newspaper." Nothing is a greater menace to the peace and prosperity of a church than a tumultuous, turbulent, contentious, rancorous, cantankerous individual, and a religious newspaper that is contentious and intolerant is a greater menace because its influence and responsibility are more far-reaching.

Looking at this matter from a philosophical standpoint, the tragedy is in its psychology. It is not the condition of the press so much as the condition of the brotherhood that warrants its present condition. Whitelaw Reid said: "The secular press is measurably what its audience makes it. It is what its constituents call for and sustain, and however faulty the press, the paper is always better than its audience and is usually the best that its audience will tolerate." These are hard sayings. Who can accept them? Is the voice of the press the voice of the brotherhood? I answer yes, measurably so. The editor of a religious paper is a sort of human document. He reasons, in substance: "I will not refuse to produce what people want because they ought to want something better." There is the everlasting spirit of commercialism that will not down. Newspapers are not run as philanthropies, but for dividends, not perhaps on the paper itself but its by-products.

WHY OUR PUBLICATIONS LACK UNITY.

The crux of the whole matter is that in our brotherhood we lack a universal basis of public opinion. The press as an interpreter of public opinion among us must of necessity be provincial and sectional, because our common denominator as a brotherhood has not been discovered. Therefore our religious papers, reflecting the conditions and appeals of the brotherhood, are working separately, often pulling apart. The Christian Century is appealing to the public opinion and taste of one group; the Christian Standard to another set; and the Christian Evangelist to an altogether different class. Each group believes its opinions represent a real understanding of the needs of the people. Like the Prodigal and Kipling's good ship, we must "Find Ourselves." When our brotherhood can orientate itself, our religious journalism will orientate itself. When our brotherhood finds a moral equivalent for internecine war in its missionary, educational and benevolent enterprises; when the sense of the brotherhood is aroused within us and we cease to spend ourselves on the petty selfish issues of life, we will be ashamed of our divisions, and strife and partisanship will cease and we shall be compatriots. Then, and not till then, can we all enlist under one journalistic flag and all march away.

A REMEDY PRESCRIBED.

So much by way of diagnosis. Can we suggest a therapeutic? If the disease is in the brotherhood, with its manifestation in the press as an objective, we suggest that the brotherhood agree upon four moral imperatives which it shall present to the religious press for its consideration and agree in turn to patronize and foster the first journal that takes the remedy.

1. Let us demand that our religious newspaper shall be enterprising. Enterprising as news gatherers, giving us the news while it is news, giving us the news of the whole brotherhood. Let us have the tidings from afar; for we would know how goes the day of battle in China and Tibet. Let us occasionally have a survey of what our religious neighbors are doing; perhaps it may provoke us to similar tasks.

The religious newspaper ought to be enterprising in its mechanical make-up; even its covers should be attractive and changed at least once every fifty years. A colonial coat in a modern parlor is out of date, yet the paper need not affect slit skirts in its dress. It must be enterprising in its supplies. If the Syndicate excel our supplies in pedagogical value and attractiveness, the thing for our publishers to do is not to get angry but to move up. If you say this costs, I say success everywhere costs. Put some of the dividends into improvements and make the product and the by-product the best that can be had. Make it unnecessary for us to take the Congregationalist, the Christian Work and the London World in order to get what our own papers ought to give us and for which we are willing to pay.

2. Our religious editors must be prophets. They must see visions and dream dreams. They must not be content with being mere annalists. They must report the battle before the first gun is fired. They must point to fairer worlds and lead the way. As Talleyrand said, they must keep their watches ahead of the rest of mankind. Let them be leaders and shapers rather than followers of public opinion. Who can measure the influence of a man like the recent Jonathan Brierly, of the London World, with 1,300 editorials back of him touching every phase of human interest and inspiration and not an ounce of poison in all!

A BIG PROGRAM NEEDED.

3. The religious newspaper needs a big program. We cannot build a St. Peter's on pebbles. We should have done with a basis of minimums and talk for awhile about a basis of maximums. Our movement is a world movement, and our people should be interested in a world program. It is time to have done with trifles, trifles, trifles. Our children and grandchildren in forty years will be studying with painful and curious interest these questions that are distracting and dividing us today, wondering what grown-up men could have found in such trifles to have fought, bled and died for them.

In a picture gallery in Brussels there is a painting by Wiertz representing the man of the future and the things of the past. A naturalist holds in his right hand a magnifying glass, and in the other a handful of Napoleon and his marshals, guns and battle flags, tiny objects swelling with meaningless glory. He examines these intensely while a child at his side looks on with open-eyed wonder. This is a parable showing the point of view of the man of the future. The picture was painted a dozen miles from Waterloo battlefield, within a dozen years after the great battle.

The program of our religious press should include: the progress of knowledge, the promotion of justice, the reign of peace and the realization of human brotherhood. These make the climax toward which all Christian activity should converge. Surely, there is potential divinity in an appeal like this.

4. The religious press should be sound in the faith. It should speak "sound words that cannot be condemned." The editor must know God and know God's Book and know God's world. He is a leader and educator of the people. How could the oracle of Delphi speak until the prophets had drunk of the Springs of Castaly? The religious paper that does not stand four-square doctrinally on the Incarnation, Atonement, Resurrection and Deity of our Lord is a menace. We want men to strengthen our faith in God and the Bible; we would have them tell us their beliefs and hopes rather than their doubts and despair. We want men who know the tragedy of the backward glance, whose faces are toward the morning and the morrow rather than yesterday. The religion that harks back to yesterday for its inspirations, that gathers around the campfire to rehearse only the stories of yesterday's battles, has lost its message and the conquering power of its Leader who sent disciples forth as world conquerors.

LET STRIFE CEASE!

The call of the hour is peace. The world is calling aloud, says John R. Mott, for apostles of peace and reconciliation. The greatest heresy of the centuries is reading the New Testament with the New Commandment of love left out. Love is the cure for all hatred and bitterness; love will conquer where all reason and argument fail; love is God's irenic because love never faileth.

Back in the eleventh century when mediæval Europe was exhausting itself in unseemly warfare, the good monks of Cluny proclaimed a dogma which they called the "Truce of God." There should be a cessation of strife from Wednesday till Monday of each week that the influence of the arts of peace might be cultivated. Retaliation and revenge were forgotten, and so beneficent was the measure that even Henry III called a Diet to foster the observance of this truce. Great spirits of other communions are even calling us to join them in a "Conference on Faith and Order." Is it not time that we who claim to be God's specially chosen apostles of reconciliation and unity should proclaim through our journalism as well as all our other enterprises that we are ready for the "Truce," and to pray in the language of Whittier:

"Forgive, O Lord, our severing ways,
The separate altars that we raise,
The varying tongues that speak thy praise.
Suffice it now. In time to be,
Shall one great temple rise to thee,
Thy Church our broad humanity.
White flowers of love its walls shall climb,
Sweet bells of peace shall ring its chime,
Its days shall all be holy time.
The hymn, long sought, shall then be heard,
The music of the world's accord,
Confessing Christ the inward word.
That song shall swell from shore to shore,
One faith, one love, one hope, restore
The seamless garb that Jesus wore."

The Building of the Panama Canal

BY PERCY MACKAYE.

[Read by its author at the presentation of the Civic Forum medal to Col. Goethals, engineer of the Panama Canal.]

A man went down to Panama
  Where many a man had died,
To slit the sliding mountains
  And lift the eternal tide;
A man stood up in Panama,
  And the mountains stood aside.

For a poet wrought in Panama
  With a continent for his theme,
And he wrote with flood and fire
  To forge a planet's dream,
And the derricks rank his dithyrambs
  And his stanzas roared in steam.

Where old Balboa bent his gaze
  He leads the liners through,
And the Horn that tossed Magellan
  Bellows a far halloo,
For where the navies never sailed
  Steamed Goethals and his crew.

So nevermore the tropic routes
  Need poleward warp and veer,
But on through the Gates of Goethals
  The steady keels shall steer, [peace
Where the tribes of man are led toward
  By the prophet-engineer.

The Paramount Mexican Issue

A Message For the Times.

BY LUCIA AMES MEAD.

WHETHER war is declared or not, one matter is paramount: a definite pledge by Congress that we will never take a foot of land by conquest. At this moment we stead of the prevalent pseudo-patriotism and stupid apathy.

We defeated Mexico in a war which General Grant, who fought in it, pronounced "one of the most unjust wars ever waged by a stronger against a weaker people." "It was," he asserted, "a political war," and "our troops were sent to provoke a fight." These words were echoed by Zachary Taylor and Henry Clay. We annexed territory, then largely unpopulated, which strengthened slavery and made our Civil War longer and harder than it otherwise would have been. Possibly without the Mexican War the Civil War itself might have been prevented. Had we annexed populated Mexico, which the jingo press assumes we now shall do, a worse result than even the Civil War would have ensued.

Said President Wilson, in his noble address last autumn at Mobile, "The United States will never seek a foot of land by conquest." Just before our Spanish War, Senator Teller of Colorado, as everyone recalls, introduced a resolution which pledged us not to take Cuba. Had this not passed Congress, the United States to-day would be holding down a resentful Cuba which we should have annexed by force. By magnanimously assisting the oppressed country to attain self-government, we won the confidence of the world, aided a struggling nation, and disarmed the cynics who had prophesied that American pledges would not withstand American greed.

PARALLEL SITUATIONS.

When we entered Cuba we found a welcome from its people, which would have turned to hatred had we come to stay. The moment we order troops across the Rio Grande and face seventeen millions of people, who regard us as old invaders of their land, every loyal or courageous Mexican becomes an irreconcilable foe, unless we solemnly pledge ourselves to withdraw as soon as law and order are established.

Three weeks before Kruger's ultimatum, Joseph Chamberlain gaily flouted the proposal to let the remaining modicum of difficulties be arbitrated by four chief justices of the supreme courts of South African colonies—two Dutch and two English—with the chief justice of England as umpire. In October, the 25,000 British soldiers, at once despatched to conquer a little nation of 100,000 Boers, were told they would eat Christmas dinner at Pretoria. Christmas passed, and more men were sent to fight the unseen foe entrenched behind the kopjes. Lying prone on the open plain, their glistening accoutrements as sparkling targets under the hot African sun, they sweltered and cursed and inched their way along under no shelter of smoke, in days of smokeless powder, and every now and then a bullet, from only God knew where, left a mangled English lad beside the one who dragged himself over the burning sand toward the peasant riflemen who were fighting for their homes.

The moral set-back of the English people during that bitter period when all internal reforms were paralized, the Mafeking orgies and hysteria, the silencing of every one who, like Cornwright Schreiner, a British subject, came to tell the facts—who that saw it all can ever forget? The press had fed the mob on lies. Every Boer was transformed in English eyes to a "filthy brute," as every Mexican will soon be characterized in our yellow press. Whether the war were justified no one cared except the brave little group, contemptuously dubbed "Pro Boers," who were not fooled by lies nor swept off their feet by mad revenge, and were loyal to England's highest self. Their courage was like that of Pitt and Fox and Burke in "rejoicing that the colonies had resisted" in 1776.

After 400,000 British soldiers had been sent to Africa, and 400,000 horses perished, after the women and children in the reconcentration camps were dying much faster than their husbands in the army, the Boers surrendered. Great Britain had spent a billion and a quarter dollars and fought two years and a half, and was victorious. Many volunteers returned to find their places filled, or were diseased or crippled, and many thousands did not return. Then began the payment for this "victory." It will be finally paid for only heaven knows when. To-day, the general whom Great Britain conquered rules, not only the Transvaal, but all South Africa, and Britain is helpless when he arrests English agitators and sends them back to England without a word of warning.

England conquered Ireland three hundred years ago. She held by force her sullen subjects down, and they have made her squirm many a time since. It is the sixty Irish members at Westminster who have for a generation held the balance of power on all English questions. Every interest has halted that Home Rule might be settled. The conqueror has suffered with the conquered for the ancient conquest.

The Dutch for sixty years fought a barbarous people, the Achinese in the Far East. They spent much blood and treasure, but in spite of Dutch modern weapons the nimble brown men in their pestilential jungles could defy them. The Germans tried to subjugate Prussian Poland, to compel school children to say their prayers at school in German; but commands and whippings have only made an embittered youth more actively non-German. Two thousand years of outside government has not made Albania any less loyal to her blood, her traditions, and her fierce, proud nationalism.

They reckon ill who fancy that the subjugation of a proud people of Spanish and Indian blood, with long memories and vindictive passions, is anything less than the most stupendous military project this country has ever undertaken. A Mexico united against us means a country backed by the sympathy of all Latin-Americans. Just when our commerce should expand, and the glad hand of the big brother be extended to all the younger brothers of the South, the tocsin sounds a knell to progress. Sullen suspicion, more "insults to the flag," conquests in guerilla wars in mountain and tropical swamps, are only a few of the things which such a war will mean which the war plotters for months have schemed out for us. It will swell their dividends, and mean more contracts for powder, guns and khaki; it will "circulate money" out of the pockets of grocers, teachers and other tax-payers into the pockets of the shrewd men who sent out from Washington Thursday night's telegram: "That the United States could finance a war with Mexico and scarcely feel it, is the view authoritatively expressed here to-day."

Let every patriot, loyal to conscience and the ideals of his country, rather than to party or any administration, religiously weigh the following facts:

THE COUNTRY AT PEACE AND AT WAR.

Last year, 600,000 American citizens died of preventable causes—about as many as were lost, all told, on both sides in four years of bloody civil war. We shall have more excitement about those killed this week than about the next 600,000 dying at home this year, because of accident, fire, typhoid, tuberculosis and other things which money could prevent. We have so much money, forsooth, that Congress has just voted our National Children's Bureau $25,000 with which to save the 300,000 babies who will die this year!

The flag of our country is valued more than the country itself, just as the Sicilian bandit worships his crucifix, and ignors the teachings of Jesus Christ.

The two hundred Americans killed in these years of civil strife, while 60,000 Americans were in Mexico, is marvelously few, considering that during the last three years we have had about 27,000 murders in our republic.

"Let us have hell," yelled a Yale student when ex-President Taft confirmed General Sherman's judgment on war. His college culture had left him with the sentiments of an Apache. Unless stern condemnation of wild, wicked talk is heard from courageous men at this moment, our grandchildren will not be able to pay the cost of the conflagration begun last week.

The imperative duty of the American people, both now and later, until it is accomplished, is to demand of congress that this government explicitly pledge itself that it will never take a foot of land by conquest.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

How Anna A. Gordon "Made a Beginning"

The Story of the Introduction of the New President of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union Into Public Work.

"Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it."

The words rang out in the crowded church. They were the text of a noonday evangelistic meeting led by the famous Dwight L. Moody many years ago.

Among those who heard the words and to whom they came with special force was a young woman. She was short and slight, with a sweet face lit by large blue eyes and a pleasant smile. She was dressed in black, and she carried a music-roll in her hand.

Ever since she was twelve years old this young woman had been a Christian and a church-worker. She had taught in Sunday-school and led young people's meetings. But never before had the gospel meant so much to her, says a writer in the Christian Endeavor World.

For the first great sorrow of her bright and happy life had just occurred. Her younger brother, Arthur, eighteen years of age, her chum and playmate, who was preparing for college and the ministry, had suddenly died.

Touched and saddened by this great grief, she leaned heavily on "the everlasting arms." Today she had resolved to devote her life, not to the musical career of which she had previously dreamed, but to Christian service. She promised in her inmost heart that by God's grace she would try to do helpful things as the opportunity offered.

THE VOLUNTEER.

"Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it."

The words still rang in her ears as she sat a few hours later in the crowded Berkeley St. Congregational Church, in Boston, where a thousand or more women were gathered for the women's evangelistic meetings. The leader (a slender woman, with keen, bright eyes, and a crown of wavy, sunny, light-brown hair, parted in the middle above a high, noble forehead, stepped briskly to the desk on the platform, and asked persuasively for a volunteer to play the cabinet organ.

There was a painful pause. Then the slight figure in black, with the little music-roll in her hand, came shyly down the aisle.

Modestly she whispered:

"As no one volunteers, I will do the best I can."

The leader was none other than the (afterwards) famous woman reformer, Frances E. Willard, who was just at the beginning of her phenomenal career of service to humanity. She had come from Chicago at his invitation, to Boston, to aid Mr. Moody in the women's meetings. And it was thus that Anna Gordon, too, began the work of her life. She not only played the organ that day, but she played it every day during the meeting.

Helpful opportunities came quickly. And they came constantly. Miss Willard's strength was taxed by the big meetings. So she turned over her letters, messages, etc., into Miss Gordon's care.

So promptly and accurately was the work done that Miss Willard was greatly pleased. Her letters were well written. People were met by the courteous young woman who won them by her tact and grace. When one day Miss Gordon brought to Miss Willard a little book ruled in red and black ink, showing the town, the hostess, the place of meeting, the time and place of trains, in fact, every detail regarding her speaking-tour all through New England, the leader was overjoyed.

"If I should only pin Anna's directions on my back, I could go the country over in the capacity of an express package!" she declared laughingly. "Little Opportune" Miss Willard called her.

During the twenty-one years that she was Miss Willard's constant companion in traveling, whether at home or abroad, she became an expert in doing deeds of kindly helpfulness to all with whom she came in contact. She learned to be quick in thought, ready in wit, and to make the best possible use of every minute.

Modest and shy as she naturally was, the hardest thing for her to do was to learn to speak in public.

But with that ideal in mind, "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it," she overcame this difficulty at the very outset, sweetly and simply giving her testimony in public at one of those early Boston meetings. Later she began to hold children's temperance meetings, and to make many bright plans for the great Loyal Temperance Legion of children, of which she was chosen the leader.

She wrote temperance songs; she wrote temperance stories, too. She was the originator of the plan of putting the "cold-water girl" fountains in London, Chicago and other cities for which temperance children everywhere gave their pennies.

THE WIFE AND THE PURSE.

It is said that France is more distinctively the land of household thrift and saving than any other country, because the French wife has the care of the purse, and because she puts away the sous, one by one, instead of spending them as fast as they come in, so declares the Youth's Companion.

No doubt there are French wives that spend and French husbands that save, as in America there are wives that save and husbands that squander. Nevertheless, painstaking care about domestic economy is not the thought that springs first to mind when we think of the average American housewife of today.

Usually the husband is to blame—at least in part. He marries a young girl who has been used to comfort, and he wants to keep her comfortable. He thinks highly of her judgment; what she says the house needs, the house must have. He takes pride in her beauty, likes to exhibit her to his friends, and encourages her to dress and to entertain a little better than his friends' wives do. He feels also that what she spends helps his business; if she keeps up with the fashion and rides in a handsome automobile, men will infer that his business is prospering.

The wife naturally accepts this attitude, and grows to look upon her husband as the provider, and upon herself as the steward who is to spend, with judgment, but lavishly, for the good of both. If she has children, she holds that point of view even more tenaciously. She is not spending now for herself at all. It is her duty to give her children health, friends, amusement, education, a permanent position in life, all on a scale that is somewhat above her husband's and her own, and that costs a little more.

That method of living does not always end disastrously, and it makes a nation that collectively, at least, appears to be very progressive. But it has its terrible dangers, and may prove in the end not to have been progressive at all. It is not safe to take only the grand collective view; we must look also at the individual cases. Every happy wife knows that her husband loves her and believes in her, but not every wife realizes how much more of a comfort she would be to her husband if he felt she were a force for saving, instead of for spending.

OF INTEREST TO WOMEN.

By a vote of 168 to 39 the Massachusetts house passed a resolution on March 27 to amend the constitution in favor of woman suffrage. The resolution had previously passed the Senate. If it passes the Legislature next year, it will then go before the voters. This is the first time in the history of the state that woman suffrage has won such a clear-cut victory.

Prof. Marion Talbot, dean of women in the University of Chicago, had direction of a group of several hundred women students from the university in the division of college women that marched in Chicago on Suffrage Day, May 2. Dean Talbot was also in command of the college battalion in the division. The students marched in cap and gown.

Two women, Miss Catherine Goggin and Mrs. Grace Wilbur Trout, were appointed by Mayor Harrison as members of the Chicago City Council's permanent charter commission, a body composed of fifteen aldermen and fifteen private citizens.

There was held in Chicago on May 10 a memorial service for Mrs. Corinne Stubbs Brown, prominent Chicago educator, woman suffragist and Socialist, who died recently in New York.

The International Council of Women has appealed to the women of Mexico to use all their influence for the restoration of peace in their unhappy land.

The Society of the Garden of Jenny gives to Paris shop girls each year over a million gifts of plants, statues, theater tickets, seeds and flowers.

Syracuse, N. Y., has a woman's club which has no name, by-laws, constitution, or officers.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

EDITORIAL

TRUE IN EVERY WORD.

THE long baffling mystery of the disappearance of Rev. Louis R. Patmont, well-known Disciple evangelist among slavic immigrants in this country, has been cleared up by the reappearance of the man himself with a story to tell that not only makes "every separate hair to stand on end" but sickens one at the heart for sympathy with the helpless victim who was made to suffer such astounding cruelty. The suggestion vaguely hinted at by one or two newspapers that there may be a streak of yellow in the tale, and that possibly Mr. Patmont may have been not altogether an unwilling participant in the "alleged" kidnapping, is as heartless and wicked as was the foul deed itself. Such a suggestion is absolutely preposterous and without a shred of fact to support it. Mr. Patmont's story is true in every word. The Christian Century extends its unrestrained sympathy to Mr. Patmont and congratulates his family and himself that his life was spared. We hope for his speedy recovery to health and an early return to his important work.

Meantime such men as J. F. Bickel, Disciples pastor at Danville, Ill., and others of that city, deserve to know that they have the earnest support of their brethren everywhere in their difficult effort of keeping the authorities at work upon a case which sheriffs and detectives and police are significantly disposed to let pass by.

A DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

PROBABLY the Presbyterian General Assembly which adjourned last Friday after ten days' meeting in Chicago is the most democratic body in American church life. There were 988 commissioners or delegates. They represented every presbytery in the northern territory of the United States, and every local Presbyterian church in that territory is represented in its presbytery and so participates in the selection of its commissioners.

The Presbyterian system is more democratic than the Episcopalian and Methodist systems because these latter systems recognize a permanent House or "College" of bishops as well as the delegates chosen by the churches. In the Presbyterian Assembly every commissioner is on a level with every other commissioner, all having been elected democratically by the people.

The Presbyterian system is more democratic than the Baptist and Congregational and Disciples' systems because the conventions representing these bodies do not so adequately represent them. A very few Disciple churches are represented in a Disciples' convention. Not much better off in this respect are the Baptists, though it must be said that Congregational churches come nearer to Presbyterian efficiency in this respect than do either Baptists or Disciples. A large convention is not necessarily a democratic one. A mob is not democratic at all.

A truly democratic church convention is a convention constituted so as to truly represent the churches on whose behalf it is to take action.

The Disciples are happily coming to perceive this principle. The progress of the arrangements for a much more democratic convention at Atlanta next October than we have ever had before is very heartening. The opposition to the General Convention of Churches of Christ is fast dying out and the societies are working heartily in coöperation with President Bell and Secretary Frank to induce the churches to send delegates to represent them at Atlanta.

"DENOMINATIONAL LOYALTY."

SOUTHERN Methodists at their recent General Conference voted by a small majority not to substitute the phrase "the Church of God" for "the holy catholic Church" when they recite the Apostle's Creed. In commenting upon this action the Central Christian Advocate of Kansas City resents the popular monopoly of the term "catholic" by the Roman church and claims that it is especially appropriate to apply the term to the Methodist denominations. "No Protestant communions are so fitted," says the Advocate, "by their universality, their numbers, their apostolic character, their comprehensiveness and their scriptural basis to bear aloft the name of Holy Catholic Church as are the great Methodist communions."

In almost the same words Rev. Dr. William Henry Roberts, the venerable stated clerk of the Presbyterian Assembly just held in Chicago, claimed the same precedence for his own denomination in a sermon delivered on the Sunday before the Assembly convened.

The claims of the Episcopal church to be the simon pure article when it comes to catholicity and historicity and primitivity are well known. And Baptists likewise, and Disciples —God bless us!—we are all more catholic, more apostolic, more primitive, more scriptural than all the rest!

So broadminded a leader as Prof. Shailer Mathews recently said that the reason there was less difference between Baptists and others today was not because Baptists have changed but because others have changed! And he counselled his Baptist brethren to hold fast their distinctiveness until Christendom comes their way!

All of which is sheer provincialism, partyism, lack of perspective, and the sectarian spirit. It is condoned only because it goes under the respectable title of "denominational loyalty."

THE SALOON AND THE DRUNKARD.

A MAN'S sobriety is a property right. The saloon is responsible if it destroys that right. Even though the man himself is to blame, as he certainly is, the saloon is responsible. The United States Supreme Court has sustained the Nebraska law under which it is possible for a wife to sue a saloonkeeper for damages if he sells liquor to her drunken husband. The court has upheld the verdict for $5,000 secured by a woman of Nebraska City.

There are similar laws in other states, but the courts are not often called upon to enforce them. They are based on the theory that a man's family has a property interest in his sobriety, and that he who incapacitates a man for work must be held responsible for his acts, even though the man himself, through weakness, coöperated in the incapacitation.

All this is good news. But we need now a new emphasis on the responsibility of the individual. If we can make men sober the saloon problem will solve itself.

THE CONQUEST OF THE AIR.

THE conquest of the air is still far from complete, but some portions of Mother Shipton's prophecy are well fulfilled:

> "Iron in the water shall float
> As easily as a wooden boat;
> In the air men shall be seen
> In blue and red and green;
> And the world to an end shall come
> In eighteen hundred and eighty-one."

It would have improved her reputation both as a poet and prophet if she had omitted the last couplet. It is better to omit predictions of the end of the world from all our prophecies, and stick to matters of which we are more certain. But Mother Shipton's certainly was right about the ships and the airships. The other day Lincoln Beachey whizzed over Chicago's loop close to 100 miles an hour at a height of 6,000 feet. The airship trip covered more than eight miles, and over the loop, where thousands of people walked through the streets—yet Beachey was unnoticed until he glided into his Grant Park landing-place.

The trip preceded an exhibition of spectacular stunts, such as looping the loop, flying upside down and other dangerous feats on the Lake Front, which started at 12:30 p. m.

Beachey, in a new airship, left Cicero Field at 10:01 a. m. He headed directly for the city, and five minutes later had swooped down on the grass-covered inclosure in Grant Park. It was probably the fastest flight ever made over Chicago.

The streets were full of people, and very few paid any attention to this miracle that was happening over their heads in plain sight.

In the May American Magazine Augustus Post writes an interesting article entitled "Experiences of an Airman." He says:

"I am often asked why the aeroplane, which has reached at its very highest a little over eighteen thousand feet, brings back its aviator even from a much lower point, often almost exhausted with cold, when the balloonist floating for hours at a height of over four miles is not overcome by low temperature and hardly inconvenienced. The answer is simple: the aviator rushes upward from the earth, cutting his way in ascending spirals ever against the wind of his own swift flight and the roaring blast of his propeller.

"He is the epitome of action; he is man's supreme defiance of nature's precedents. The nervous strain is something fearful as the machine claws up the side of nothingness toward a mark in the heavens, invisible yet all-compelling, the mark another man has set—the altitude record. Out of sight of the waiting crowds, no longer even a dot in the sky, he may meet opposing air-currents, blinding cloud-banks that muffle him so that he cannot see the tips of his own wings; he may be forced to buck against adverse conditions so that he keeps circling round and round with the barograph lashed to the side of the machine scarcely moving, and then he thinks about the last man's mark and sets his teeth—and sets the mark higher in the heavens.

"He may come back so stiff with cold that he cannot stir from the seat, but a good deal of it will be due to the intense nervous strain, for no one so audaciously affronts gravitation and gets away with it entirely unscathed. Meanwhile the balloonist has been 'wafted to the skies,' if not 'on flowery beds of ease,' at least on an air mattress, with a gas-bag going up in docile agreement with laws governing the expansion of gas. The carburetor freezes at a lower level than the balloonist's water-bottles, because vaporizing liquid in itself produces cold.

"But I have had water-bottles freeze in a balloon often enough, and the temperature has been around zero. The ballast freezes, and, instead of sending it over the side from the scoop in a fine cloud, you have to break up the stony mass with a hammer, lest a chunk fall on someone's head below. One day when we were shivering in the thickest of ulsters and drinking hot soup with a relish, we could have looked over the edge of the basket and seen the farmers in Iowa having sunstrokes in the hay-fields; that is, if we had recognized either sunstrokes or farmers, for at that height a man—who is always hiding under his hat—looks like a period on this page."

DEALING WITH THE DEVIL.

MR. MELLEN used a very unfortunate phrase in his examination in the New Haven inquiry when he spoke of his readiness to "deal with the devil" if it promoted the ends for which his road was working. No man should be judged by a single sentiment which may be easily perverted in quotation, but the country is in no mood to hear a word like this from the responsible head of an organization that has cost so much in life and money as the New Haven. We have the impression that Mr. Mellen has been made a scapegoat in part, for popular indignation; but a very few such utterances as this would change our feeling quite completely. There has been too much dealing with the devil on the part of Mr. Mellen or someone else, and the country is tired of their negotiations.

The enormous possibilities before a Sunday school class of men are illustrated by the actual success of Rev. S. G. Buckner's class in Somerset, Pa. A year and a half ago there was a class of five men and very little interest. It was proposed to organize a Modern Men's Movement to study live social problems. The Gospel of the Kingdom, by Dr. Josiah Strong, (published by the Disciples Publication Society) was adopted as the basis of the studies. The class at once grew by leaps and bounds. It soon had an attendance of over a hundred men, and has had an average of over a hundred for over a year. The class has had an attendance of 252 men. It has a monthly banquet, with an attendance of 150 and sometimes 200. The class was never so strong as it is right now, and the interest is intense in the study of each Sunday's subject. There has been a perceptible change in the thinking and lives of the men. Many of those who were prejudiced against the church are now good members. This is all the more remarkable when one considers that the population of Somerset is only 4,500. They are the first group to propose and endorse movements for community betterment. Somerset is undoubtedly a better town today because of this great class.

The Presbyterian Assembly.

"If one were to glance down the list of subjects discussed at the Presbyterian General Assembly, he would be facing as convincing an argument as one could present that the church is the biggest, broadest institution in the world, instead of the little, narrow organization that some persons think it is." Thus writes Charles Stelzle at the close of the late Assembly meeting in Chicago. These subjects, as Mr. Stelzle points out, covered almost the entire realm of human thought and experience, in so far as they have to do with the daily life of the people, and this is the outstanding impression of the eight days' convention just closed. To a Disciple who has attended the general conventions of his church, the Presbyterian Assembly seems somewhat strange. After one of the sessions of a Disciples' convention the delegates scatter with such words on their lips as these, "Wasn't that a great address!" After a session of the Presbyterian gathering, one does not hear such remarks. This last Assembly gathering impressed a visitor as a great meeting of business men, met together to get things done. When the delegates came to the meeting they were supposed to have thoroughly mastered the points considered in the voluminous book of committee resolutions to be passed on during the sessions. It was usually a matter of a short time getting each resolution voted on and out of the way. The new Moderator struck one as a most efficient business man. He knows how to talk with his gavel, and he knows how to say "Sit down!" when necessary. Yet he was entirely considerate of the rights of all delegates.

Unity in Choice of Moderator.

The city papers had whetted the minds of Chicagoans for a "scrap," when the question of the moderatorship should come up. But any who came to see a conflict were disappointed. The word "love-feast" more aptly characterizes the election. The following men had been announced through the papers as possible candidates for the moderatorship: Dr. Maitland Alexander, of Pittsburg; Dr. Raymond, of Buffalo; Dr. Stewart, of Auburn Theological Seminary; Dr. Stevenson, of Baltimore; Dr. Webb, of Louisville, and Dr. Calhoun, of Knoxville. Dr. George B. Stewart, of Auburn, was the only pronounced radical mentioned. At the hour of election sentiment settled at once upon Dr. Maitland Alexander, of First Church, Pittsburg. As Dr. Alexander's church is preeminently a "social service" institution, his seemed to be the proper name to unite on for Moderator. Dr. S. J. Nicolls, of St. Louis, Moderator of the Assembly forty-two years ago, made the nominating speech. The call for further nominations went unanswered, and the vote for Dr. Alexander brought every delegate to his feet.

Church "Stands Pat" for Social Service.

As stated last week in this department, it has been regarded that the most important question the Assembly was to face at this meeting was whether there should be a continuation of the aggressive fight for social justice that has characterized Presbyterian policy for several years, or should the flag be taken down, or at least hung low? Be it said to the credit of this great church, there is to be no retreat, so far as this fight is concerned. The spiritual and evangelistic notes in social service are to be sounded more clearly, but the rights of men in modern life are still to be demanded. The Chicago Post reports this decision jubilantly, and remarks, in justification of the two-fold obligation the church has put upon herself: "The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church has reiterated its splendid declaration for social justice originally made in 1910. There is to be no retreat. The more conservative element is satisfied with an interpretative report of the committee in which the evangelistic note is re-emphasized strongly. The two utterances are mutually inclusive—there is no conflict between them. The church need not abandon its vigorous defense of evangelical Christian faith in order to occupy advanced ground on issues involving the readjustment of our modern life on a basis of righteousness. The salvation of society is an aim by no means antithetic to the salvation of the individual. Indeed, the one is complementary to the other, and it would be reasonable to question how genuine is the individual salvation that does not manifest itself in a desire and effort to reconstruct society in accord with its changed view of life and human relations."

Rev. John Timothy Stone,
Retiring Moderator.

Evangelism for Students.

The evangelistic committee reported thankfully and hopefully the gains in numbers during the past year. The confessions of Christ in Presbyterian churches between April, 1913, and April, 1914, were 93,000, a much better record than has been reported to any preceding Assembly. And, even more significant in some respects, the total of lapsed members has run down to 48,000. This is far too large a figure yet, of course, but it is a great improvement on former records. Two years ago the number added was 72,000; the number lapsed, 54,000. Evangelistic work in colleges was especially stressed in this year's Assembly. Protest was made against the idea that college students may safely be left unguided to form their own religious life, and steps were taken for more aggressive evangelistic efforts among college young people.

Union Must Wait.

The stated clerk of the Assembly, W. H. Roberts, reported with disappointment the failure of the negotiations for union between the Presbyterian and Reformed churches. In 1911 the General Synod of the Reformed Church in the United States voted almost unanimously in favor of this union, which was then regarded as certain, but the tide turned later, and when the "classes"—the Reformed term for presbyteries—came to record their will, there were only thirteen to vote for union and forty-two voted against it. Thus the negotiations came to naught, although, on the other side, out of 296 Presbyterian presbyteries, the overwhelming majority of 220 were in favor of the merger, and only three were unfavorable enough to record adverse judgments. Dr. Roberts explained that both the Presbyterian and the Reformed committees believed that this union of the two denominations was defeated largely on account of a feeling that some union of the whole Presbyterian family is near, and the Reformed people prefer to wait for that general consummation, rather than go through a temporary adjustment now.

Theological Seminary Question Unsettled.

The quarrel with regard to the standing of the Union Theological Seminary was not settled. This is the institution which is said by some to be turning out "heretics." A few years ago Union Seminary "cut loose" from the assembly because it wished to have greater freedom in selecting its professors, and there has been trouble ever since. Charles Stelzle, in writing of this matter, puts the situation this way: "Some of the commissioners believe that the seminary actually belongs to them and they want it, while others wouldn't take it for a gift under its present liberal management." The committee at work on the task of reconciliation asked for another year in which to make its final report. The chances are, thinks Mr. Stelzle, that the committee will be no nearer the goal then than it was this week.

Some Assembly Achievements.

Some of the achievements of the Assembly, stated in brief, are as follows: The work of home missions was given hearty approval—both in cities and rural districts. A complete reorganization, however, of the home mission board was ordered. Consolidation of some of the other boards made some progress. The "white slave traffic" was discussed, and a committee was appointed to deal with same. The $10,000,000 fund for retired preachers received enthusiastic attention. The Assembly voted itself opposed to capital punishment. The first year of work of the board of temperance was pronounced successful. A special report pleaded with commissioners to encourage restoration to family life of family worship and mid-week prayer service at the home altar. Students in seminaries will not be permitted to preach in future during the seminary terms, as the result of recommendations by a special committee.

Sunday May Come to Chicago.

Whether "Billy" Sunday will come to Chicago's West Side to conduct an evangelistic campaign in the fall of 1915 depends upon how the churches will act upon the referendum submitted to them, according to ministers leading the movement. The churches are not asked to pledge financial support for the campaign, but must unanimously pledge their active co-operation. This is in accordance with the demands of Mr. Sunday. Individual churchmen are expected to underwrite the expense of building the tabernacle to accommodate from 15,000 to 25,000 persons. According to present plans, it is expected that the location selected for the tabernacle will be between Ashland boulevard and Western avenue, south of Madison.

The New World S. S. Secretary.

Mr. Frank L. Brown, who has recently succeeded Mr. Marion Lawrance of Chicago as joint general secretary of the World's Sunday-school Association, has been closely connected with Sunday school work for many years. He has been for twenty-eight years superintendent of the Bushwick Ave. M. E. Sunday school in Brooklyn. For several years past he has been field secretary of the World's Sunday-School Association. He was commissioner for the International Sunday-School Association for South America and the West Indies. Later he was twice commissioner to Japan and the Orient in the interests of the organization of the Sunday-school work of those countries; and in 1913 he was secretary of the commission of the World's Sunday-School Association to the Orient which made the tour around the world under the leadership of the American Chairman, Mr. H. J. Heinz, just before the Zurich Convention. Secretary Brown is the author of "The Superintendent and His Work," "The City Sunday-school" and "The Sunday-school and the Home."

Bibles for Schools, Say Churchmen.

Reinstatement of the Bible in the public schools is asked in the following resolutions adopted last week at the bimonthly meeting of the Chicago Church Federation Council in the Central Y. M. C. A. auditorium: "Whereas, The Bible is regarded throughout Christendom as the very foundation of civilization, social justice, character, morality and religion; and, Whereas, The public curriculum, which includes tales of heathen gods and ancient mythology, but omits the great book which in surpassing grandeur reveals the one true God and inspires in the heart love of all the virtues, deprives the pupil of the most important element in true education; and, Whereas, Although the interpretations placed upon the Bible may be, and in fact are, sectarian, we blieved that the Bible itself is elementary, fundamental and no more responsible for sectarianism than the ocean for the battles which rage upon its surface; therefore, be it Resolved, That we profoundly deplore the decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois which makes possible the exclusion of the Bible from our public schools, and be it further Resolved, That we favor all honorable methods to secure a reinstatement of the Bible into our public schools even to the amending of our state constitution." Three hundred laymen and ministers attended the meeting at which the resolution was adopted. William E. Church and Thomas E. D. Bradley spoke, deploring the fact that the Illinois Supreme Court had made possible the exclusion of the Bible from the schools.

Bibles for the Immigrant.

The Southern Presbyterians, who met last week in Kansas City, report 1,706,459 Bibles distributed through home agencies last year, an increase of 280,222 volumes over the preceding year. In commenting upon the report, Rev. M. D. Porter of Richmond, Va., asserted that the best way to Americanize immigrants is through the Bible. "If we could put the Bible into the hands of every immigrant who enters the country, the immigrant problem would be solved," he said.

William Allen White Preaches.

Twelve Kansas editors delievered lay sermons in the churches of Lawrence on a recent Sunday. William Allen White, of the Emporia Gazette, widely known as editor, author, and political leader, would make social Christianity the heart of the gospel for the present needs. "A god is a living god only so long as the Rev. Maitland Alexander, D. D., elected this year to the moderatorship of the General assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, was born in 1867 in New York City. He was graduated from Princeton University in 1889 and from the Princeton Theological Seminary in 1892. He served his first pastorate in Long Branch, N. J., from 1892 to 1896; New York City, Harlem Presbyterian Church from 1896 to 1899. Since that time he has served the First Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, Pa., of which he is now pastor.

god lives in the emotions and the will of men," declared Mr. White. "When a god appeals only to the mind, to the memory, to the intellectual and physical side of man, the god is dead. Now it so happens that in the civilized part of this world of ours today all the gods are dead—save one—'Christ and Him crucified.' The story of Christ still appeals to the hearts of men, still moves their wills, still influences their conduct. . . . We are beginning to find a new Christ—the Christ with a social message, as well as an individual message. . . . Of course, the social Christ who is stirring the world today with a message of brotherhood, of self-respect, of fellowship, is greater than our age's conception of him. He has been greater than the conception any age has had of him."

Baptists Discourage Unity Spirit?

It is reported that at an adjourned meeting of the B. Y. P. U. and Sunday-school Field Workers' Association of the Baptist Church Sunday evening, May 10, interdenominationalism and the work of organizations which aim at extending it were denounced by members of the association as untrue to the Baptist policy and practice. The declarations grew out of the proposal to adopt the Baraca name for adult classes. It was objected that to this name some term should be added to mark the organizations as Baptist. The Presbyterian Advance remarks that: "If the Baptists should decide to continue these organizations under another name as strictly denominational work it would be on a par with the action of Baptists and Methodists in withdrawing from the United Society of Christian Endeavor while utilizing the Endeavor idea in denominational organizations."

Dr. Gladden on Newspapers.

One of the preachers at the recent conference of editors, held in Lawrence, Kas., was Dr. Washington Gladden, of Columbus, Ohio. His subject was "Tainted Newspapers, Good and Bad." Among other things he said: "The first task of newspapers is to teach the people to avoid exaggeration and violent speech, and to cultivate moderate and rational modes of expression; second, to resist the tendencies which dementalize democracy and which substitute the mob mind for the deliberate habit; third, to hold the popular judgment firmly to the truth that character and manhood, not money and popularity, are the central values of human existence; fourth, to turn the thoughts of men more and more from the negative virtue of detecting and exposing the evil to the positive virtue of discerning and praising good."

Episcopal Rectors to be Pensioned?

Plans made by the Episcopal pension fund commission for the establishment of a general pension fund for the benefit of aged and infirm clergymen were indorsed last week by the Episcopal diocesan convention held at the Cathedral of SS. Peter and Paul. The plans will be voted upon at the next general convention, which will be held in St. Louis in 1916. A resolution favoring the maintenance of peace was adopted, and it was voted to send a copy of it to President Wilson.

No Tobacco for Methodist Preachers.

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in session in Oklahoma City, last week, decided by a vote of 118 to 116, that hereafter candidates for admission on trial in the ministry of that church must promise to abstain from the use of tobacco.

Canadian Church Unity.

The Church Union Committee of the Presbyterian Church in Canada has held a meeting in Toronto, at which it was decided by a vote of 31 to 8 to proceed with the proposed merger of the Presbyterian, the Methodist, and the Congregational churches of the Dominion. As a preparation for the further discussion of the subject the committee requested the other denominations to assist in making a general national survey of the religious conditions in Canada. It is believed that the results of this survey will show a great over-churching in many communities, and it will not be surprising if it also shows great under-churching in many others.

Of Human Interest

"Most Useful Citizen" Dies.

Several years ago Theodore Roosevelt termed Jacob A. Riis America's "most useful citizen." Mr. Riis had distinguished himself by relieving the suffering of the poor in New York, cleaning out tenement pest holes, obtaining playgrounds and breathing spots in congested city districts, bettering the working condition of laborers and by his lifelong fight against the misery of the slums.

Mr. Riis died May 26, 1914, at his summer home in Barre, Mass., after a long illness.

Mr. Roosevelt upon learning of his death wired to the widow from Washington as follows: "I am grieved more than I can express. I feel as if I had lost an own brother. Jake's friendship has meant more for me than I can ever say. I mourn with you and wish I could say anything that would be of any comfort to you."

The career of Mr. Riis is supremely interesting. Here is a brief resume of the chief facts in his history:

BORN—At Ribe, Jutland, Denmark, May 3, 1849. One of thirteen sons of a Latin teacher.

MARRIED—Elizabeth Nielson, his childhood sweetheart, who spurned him when he was 21, became his wife six years later, in 1876. She died in 1905, he and two years later, July 27, 1907, married Miss Mary Philip of St. Louis, who had been his private secretary.

EMIGRATED—To America in 1870 after he had obtained a certificate in Denmark as a carpenter's apprentice. Landed in New York with $40, half of which he spent for a pistol "to fight Indians and desperadoes." He struggled for existence for six years, building miners' huts in Pennsylvania, mining coal, making bricks, driving a team and peddling flatirons and books.

CAREER—Became a reporter on a New York City newspaper in 1876 and began almost immediately his fight for "the other half" by instituting and pushing campaigns for schools and tenement house reform and for small parks and playgrounds. He owned a newspaper in Brooklyn for a few years. After twenty-seven years as a reporter he quit the newspaper business to devote his time to writing books. Of late years he had been a familiar figure on the lecture platform throughout the country, fighting always for the poverty-stricken and the laborer.

MET ROOSEVELT—When the colonel was police commissioner in New York City. He won Colonel Roosevelt's admiration and lifelong friendship by his fight for the poor.

BOOKS—From Mr. Riis' pen came "How the Other Half Lives," "The Children of the Poor," "The Making of an American" (his autobiography), "The Battle With the Slum," "Children of the Tenements," "The Old Town," "Theodore Roosevelt, the Citizen," and "Hero Tales From the Far North."

Two Significant Wills.

Mr. George F. Baer, late president of the Reading Railway Company, stated during the great coal strike that the Lord had placed the management of the coal mines in care of himself and his associates. He leaves an estate of $5,000,000, and it is said that his will makes no bequests. The Watchman-Examiner remarks that, apparently, it was Mr. Baer's opinion that the Lord had entrusted him with the stewardship of the coal mines for the exclusive benefit of his own family! Contrast the coal magnate's will with that of Daniel S. Ford, late proprietor of the Youth's Companion. He left $3,185,092 to religious and charitable objects, and only $150,000 in trust for his daughter, with her hearty consent!

Bishop Chandler Tells Story.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat, relates Bishop Chandler, of Atlanta, apropos of worldly persons, said the other day:

"There was a worldly parson of this type in Philadelphia—a great fox hunter—whom a Spruce St. Quaker took in hand.

"'Friend,' said the Quaker, 'I understand thee's clever at fox-catching.'

"'I have few equals and no superiors at that sport,' the parson complacently replied.

"'Nevertheless, friend,' said the Quaker, 'if I were a fox I would hide where thee would never find me.'

"'Where would you hide?' asked the parson, with a frown.

"'Friend,' said the Quaker, 'I would hide in thy study.'"

One From Secretary Garrison.

Secretary Garrison, apropos of his bill for creating six vice admirals, said at a luncheon in Washington:

"This bill will make things better from a diplomatic standpoint, though the actual working of the navy will remain the same. Yes, the navy itself will remain the same. Yes, the navy itself be like Brown.

"Brown, idle through slack times, started to tramp to Buffalo by way of the Erie Canal to look for a job.

"He met on his way a good many canal boats coming up and down, and finally, stopping a canal boat captain, he offered to work his passage.

"The captain took him on and set him to leading the horses along the tow-path.

"He led the horses for two days, thinking hard. On the third day he had thought it all out, and he resigned.

"'By the powers,' he said, 'I might as well walk as work my passage.'"

W. F. McCombs on Philanthropy.

At a recent banquet in New York Mr. W. F. McCombs told a story of a discussion on public generosity in which several well-known philanthropists were mentioned and praised to the skies.

After they had been speaking for some time a man in the corner remarked: "Your philanthropists are all right, but I think it is only just that my next-door neighbor should be included."

"Is he generous?" asked one.

"I should just say he is," was the emphatic reply. "No matter how many tramps go to his door, he never seems to send one of them away empty-handed."

"You don't mean it!" exclaimed one of his hearers.

"I do," replied the other man. "He always gives them something; he always gives them a letter of introduction to me!"

The World is Growing Better

Free Ice for Chicago's Poor.

In the crowded tenement districts where infant mortality runs high in the hot months tired mothers last week breathed sighs of relief and gratitude. The news spread that Fred W. Upham, president of the Consumers' Company, has pledged through the Record-Herald all the free ice needed by the Visiting Nurse Association, and that Mr. Upham's gift would be supplemented by a public subscription started by the Record-Herald to insure distribution to those living at some distance from the company's yards.

Ministers and physicians have been asked to co-operate in the distribution of free ice certificates. A letter was sent out by Mr. Upham to 8,000 clergymen and physicians reading:

"This company desires to give free ice to the destitute poor of Chicago during the period of extreme hot weather, as we have heretofore given free coal through the severe cold weather.

"We wish your co-operation in this work, asking only that you pass upon the actual necessity of those to whom you wish such relief given. We believe that notwithstanding the many calls upon your time you can find time to aid us in this work.

"By returning the inclosed card with your address we will send you blank certificates, each of which will be honored for fifteen pounds of guaranteed pure ice on any day in the year 1914 at any one of our depots."

Commenting on the free distribution offer Miss Jane Addams said:

"I think it is a splendid offer. Nothing produces more acute suffering among Chicago's poor than lack of ice. It certainly is a very fine thing that Mr. Upham plans to do."

Miss Edna L. Foley, superintendent of the Visiting Nurse Association, said:

"I know from visits to many homes that free ice is a godsend to the poor. Each of the seventy-eight nurses employed by our association has wished for free ice, although we have had but few hot days so far this year. Every nurse will rejoice in The Record-Herald's plan for insuring its free distribution."

For Truthful Advertising.

"Promotion of Truthful Advertising" is the purpose of a distinctly new type of organization now being formed in Cleveland, O., by members of the retail merchants' board of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce. W. J. Noble of the board explains the evils the organization is designed to abolish in the following interview. "One of the evils to be eliminated is the inflation of values—telling the people that an article is a $100 value and advertising it for sale at $37.50. This word 'value' as used in this connection is one of the most deceiving words in advertising. You might as well advertise a loaf of bread as a $100 value, with the excuse that a starving castaway on a desert island would value a loaf of bread at that sum. The time has come to call a halt on the scramble for preferment by means of one merchant trying to outdo the other in extravagant claims." A majority of the merchants are said to favor the movement.

Our Readers' Opinions

RELIGION AND MYSTICISM.

Editor The Christian Century:

The etymology of the word religion indicates that the root meaning of the word is that of re-binding,—a rebinding of the soul to God.

Mysticism signifies "that man may attain to an immediate, direct consciousness or knowledge of God as the real and absolute principle of all truth, and of all essential, divine truth in Him."

These definitions imply the soul's innate power to know God, the recognition of His existence and of allegiance to Him. This, in the truest, profoundest sense, is religion —the communion of the soul with God.

This communion of the soul with God will result in deeds of mercy and every possible form of Christian service, but these things are not religion—they are the fruits of religion.

These reflections are offered as a result of reading the two excellent papers presented by Earle M. Todd and E. S. Ames at the recent meeting of the Congress. While appreciating each of the papers, I find myself in accord with the views presented by Brother Todd, as they seem to me to deal with the deeper and more vital things of Christianity. A. B. JONES.

CRITICISES PROF. STARR.

Editor The Christian Century:

I have just finished reading the article in the current number of The Christian Century on "President Wilson's Mexican Policy," by Frederick Starr. I have no desire to review the article as a whole, but I should like to point out one significant fact, namely: that Professor Starr does not go back to the fundamental question in his discussion of the situation. It seems to me that it is impossible to judge recent events apart from earlier events connected with the Mexican situation. Mr. Huerta has never been the recognized head of the Mexican Republic; the most that can be said of him is that he has been the leader of a faction against which the masses of the Mexican people have been contending since the rise of the Madero revolution. It was impossible for our government to remain neutral under the circumstances. To have recognized Huerta and the government which he established would have been to have taken sides with that faction which, as everybody knows, came to its ascendency by one of the most diabolical acts of treachery that history has ever recorded. On the other hand, our refusal to recognize Huerta meant a degree of alignment with those who opposed him. It is perfectly evident that our government has pursued the latter course, and, to my mind, it was more than justified in doing so. Mr. Starr rather tauntingly says that by our course "we were actively allied with rebels." It is perfectly evident, therefore, where his sympathies lie, and his judgment of recent events must be understood in the light of his evident sympathies with Huerta. There are, doubtless, many people in the United States who quite agree with him, but to those of us who believe that the Constitutionalists have, as the root of their warfare, a just cause, the course of President Wilson, at least in the main, is praiseworthy.

It is impossible to predict what will be the outcome of the present complicated situation, but I am not willing to yield the conviction that a constitutional government will be established in Mexico before many months have passed, and that the friendship which the United States has shown toward the Constitutionalists through all these weary months of struggle will enable the administration to exercise an influence over that government that will go far toward making it stable and secure.

I am inclined to sympathize with the idea that it would have been better for our government to have been less exacting in its demands upon Huerta in connection with the Tampico incident. It is my judgment, however, that President Wilson felt compelled to take the stand he did in order to support the demand which Admiral Mayo had already made, and thus, in part, also, answer the demands of people who were urging even a more radical course. At any rate, I cannot impute to the President the rather low motive that Mr. Starr imputes to him. President Wilson is not engaged in a personal quarrel with Huerta. He is simply standing consistently against the usurpation by which Huerta came to his position, and besides his policy has not failed. It seems to me that a man is driven to pretty desperate extremes when in support of his position he finds it so necessary to assign to our President such ignoble motives as personal pique, and at the same time extol the patience and self-control of a man like Huerta. WHAT IS THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL FOR?

Editor the Christian Century:

The problems confronting Sunday-school work in a great city are legion as compared to those in a smaller town, commensurate to the number of devices that detract from religious activities.

There are a few big problems, however, common to all; and it is with one of these that we would deal at this time.

In the conferences of our Greater Chicago Superintendents, from month to month, has been discussed the problem of attendance; and in the majority of cases, I believe it is a fact that the heavy shortage is in the adult departments. There is a reason for this, and efforts are being put forth to increase the interest.

I am not a believer in the brass-brand, picture-show, clap-trap performances, because this does not appeal to me to be a very religious precedent, and detracts from the solemnity and dignity of the cause. I believe there is a way to build up a school on a sure foundation which will weather the storms.

The ideal Sunday-school, from a theoretical point of view, is one composed of every member of the church, as a minimum; and including all others who will, as a maximum.

It is a fact, however, that the Sunday-schools now do not equal numerically the church membership. There is something radically wrong, and it is the problem to locate the trouble and then overcome it.

The one great purpose in view, or end to attain, in the Sunday-school is a knowledge of the Bible. "Give diligence to present thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, handling aright the word of truth." This is Paul's statement to Timothy, and it is certain that if we would attain to this high standard, we must do so over the inevitable road of "study." Study what? Study the thing of which we desire to know—namely, the Bible. WILLIAM THURMAN, Superintendent Sheffield Ave. Sunday-School.

DEATH OF MISS LODUSKA J. WIRICK.

Miss Loduska J. Wirick, independent missionary in Japan, died Thursday morning, April 30, at the Akasaka Hospital, Tokyo. Miss Wirick had been ill about two weeks but had been cared for in her own home by a nurse from the hospital. On Sunday, April 26, she was removed to the hospital where she died the following Thursday morning. The cause of her death was diagnosed by the attending physician as cancer of the stomach. The funeral occurred Saturday afternoon, May 2 in the Koishikawa Church, Tokyo, a church which Miss Wyrick had been instrumental in establishing. The occasion strikingly revealed the deep esteem and sincere love in which Miss Wyrick was held, not alone by the foreign community, but even more so by the Japanese to whom she had given twenty-four years of her life in devoted and untiring service. J. M. McCaleb, independent missionary, was in charge of the funeral service. The service revealed the varied activity of Miss Wyrick's missionary work. J. M. McCaleb spoke of her consecration to her purely evangelistic work—her unfailing dependence upon God for the things necessary for her life and work, her unfailing love and regard for her fellow-workers and her constant willingness to aid in every way. Fully two hundred and fifty of the students from the school, in which Miss Wyrick has taught for many years, accompanied by their teachers showed by their presence and draped flag their love and respect for their teacher. A representative of the President of the school made an address and one of the students, chosen by the school, read an address in English, both splendid eulogies upon the life and work of Miss Wyrick. Teranishi San, one of Miss Wyrick's converts, and at present one of the Tokyo pastors in the employ of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, told of his deep love and obligation to the one who had brought him to know Jesus Christ and to become one of His ministers. Very touching indeed was the appearance of the little boy who came as the representative of the Sunday-school which met every Sunday in Miss Wyrick's own home. He read an address in Japanese and was followed by a representative from the Leper Home to which Miss Wyrick had given much of her time. The followed addresses by the two most prominent men in the Japanese Empire in the cause of temperance, Mr. Ando, who heads the Temperance Movement, and Mr. Nimoto, member of Parliament and an earnest advocate of all temperance movements. Both these men paid sincere and well deserved compliments to the work Miss Wyrick had done, especially her work during the war with Russia, and the wide distribution of Christian literature.

MISTAKES IN CHURCH BUILDING.

As an architect who is frequently called upon to suggest a remedy for some of the serious mistakes which have been made in the planning of churches, especially baptistries, it may not be impertinent for me to offer some suggestions based upon observation of the wrong methods so frequently employed by church committees, when building a new church, or making changes in old ones.

In most cases lack of funds prevents the doing of all that may be needed, and it is important that every dollar shall be made to count.

Strange to say, the first point of economy has seemed to be dispensing with the services of an architect, not realizing that his employment would probably mean a saving of far more than his fee.

As a matter of real fact, his services at the outset are as important as those of a family physician, when symptoms of illness appear in the home, and the earlier he is called in to diagnose the case, the more intelligently is he able to prescribe. Often in alteration work, much old material can be utilized, and form a general basis of operations, where new material and labor are found to be unnecessary by a competent architect, experienced with similar problems.

Yes, you may say, but suppose such assistance is not at hand; my reply is, the money needlessly expended in doing the thing wrongly and perhaps a second time, will far more than pay the traveling expenses of a wise adviser, as well as a reasonable fee for his service.

When once on the ground, he can make a survey of the situation in conference with the pastor and committee, and is quite likely to offer various different suggestions, from which the church may choose, and which had not been thought of. An approximate estimate of comparative cost of each is an important factor in determining the final choice of the best plans for the least money.

It is not the practice of the better class of architects to furnish sketches for proposed churches until employed to do so, as they cannot offer an intelligent plan until they understand the conditions which are to govern, and which vary in every church.

Disciples Table Talk

Boat Ride For Convention Guests.

Chicago Disciples plan to welcome their brethren who attend the International Sunday-school convention the last of June by giving a moonlight boat ride on Lake Michigan on the Saturday evening of convention week. The steamer Theodore Roosevelt, the largest excursion boat in this harbor, has been engaged for the purpose and local forces are being organized to sell 1,800 tickets. Mr. O. A. Rosboro and Mr. Black, of Englewood and Irving Park Sunday-schools, respectively, are leading in the arrangements.

Houston Entertainment Plan Proves Popular.

Great interest has been aroused by the recent article of Dr. Willett in The Christian Century, on the novel and successful municipal entertainment plan originated by W. S. Lockhart, of Central Church, Houston, Tex. The Congregationalist gives favorable comment to the plan in its social service news department. We note that W. D Ryan, of Central Church, Youngstown, O., is urging a similar plan for the benefit of Youngstown.

Patmont, Sick, Seeks Rest.

A representative of The Christian Century, learning that L. R. Patmont was spending a short time in Chicago, had an interview with the "dry" leader. Mr. Patmont had little to say except that he is sick with heart trouble and nervous prostration as a result of his recent trying experience at Westville, and that he would go into the country for a period of rest. Mr. Patmont expressed himself as very appreciative of the sympathy that has been shown him by the church papers.

Claude E. Hill Suffers Loss.

Lyman E. Page, of the Knox, Ind., Christian Church, sends the information that Claude E. Hill and wife, of the Valparaiso Church, are almost prostrated over the loss of their youngest child, Sallie Mildred, nine years of age, on May 24. Valvular heart trouble was the cause of her death. Her sickness extended over many weeks. The constant care and watching and anxiety have told heavily upon Mr. and Mrs. Hill. Sallie Mildred was born during Mr. Hill's pastorate in Mobile, Ala., in 1905. The funeral was held from the parsonage May 27, the services being conducted by C. G. Kindred, of the Englewood Church, Chicago. The Christian Century joins with the many friends of our National C. E. Superintendent and his wife in sympathy for them in this time of trial.

Some Bethany Park Features.

The Bethany Assembly Program Committee has prepared a rich feast for assembly attendants this year. Program in detail will be printed later, but the following statement of some special features will be of interest now. The Assembly sessions will extend from July 16 to August 14. July 21—31 will be held the first term of the Bethany Assembly Summer School—the School of Efficiency. Its departments will be as follows: Ministerial, Evangelistic Singers, Character Building Studies, Health Culture and Rural Church Work. During this period will be held Pastors' Mass Meetings and Conferences; lectures by Pres. E. Y. Mullins, of Louisville, and President Henry Churchill King, of Oberlin; sermons by Z. T. Sweeney, E. E. Violett and others; Rural Church Mass Meeting, led by J. W. Street. July 26 will be Bethany Assembly Day. August 1 will be Temperance Day, with ex-Governor Hanly and other notables at the helm. August 2, another Bethany Assembly Day, will be marked by two sermons by C. C. Morrison and J. V. Coombs. August 3 will be W. C. T. U. Day, with a gold medal contest at night. August 4—14 will be held the second term of the summer school, with the emphasis on methods. The departments of Sunday-school, Missions and Christian Endeavor will be represented. Of these Garry L. Cook, Bert Wilson and Claude E. Hill will preside, as deans. On August 14 will be held the Commencement Exercises of the Sunday-school Department. Each evening, during the Assembly session, will be given, as usual, lectures, entertainments, etc. W. E. M. Hackleman is chairman of the program committee.

Special Sermons at El Paso.

During May, Perry J. Rice, of First Church, El Paso, Tex., dealt in his morning sermons with the theme, "Finding God in Life's Experiences." The special topics were as follows: May 3, The Man Who Found God In the Offering of a Sacrifice. May 10, The Man Who Found God On the Plains. May 17, The Man Who Found God In the Church. May 24, The Man Who Found God In a Domestic Tragedy. The evening services were distinctly evangelistic. A chorus choir and male quartette lent their assistance toward making these services interesting.

O. A. Rosboro, chairman superintendent's committee of Chicago Disciples Schools. Mr. Rosboro is leading local Disciples in plans for the International Sunday-School Convention.

R. W. Wallace at Hazel Green Academy.

Richard W. Wallace, pastor at Woodlawn Church, Lexington, Ky., delivered the commencement address at Hazel Green Academy, the C. W. B. M. mountain school, of which J. T. McGarvey is Principal. Mr. Wallace reports that the school is splendidly equipped, and is doing a great work for Eastern Kentucky under Prof. McGarvey. Mr. Wallace reports a membership of 350 in the Woodland Church, located in one of the most beautiful residence sections of Lexington. The present pastor has served in this field during four of the six years of its history. Mr. Wallace recently spent a vacation period at Valdosta, Ga., where he served as pastor for over six years.

Roger T. Nooe to Go Abroad.

The church at Frankfort, Ky., has granted its pastor, Roger T. Nooe, a leave of absence. Mr. Nooe will spend three or four months in the following countries: Germany, Austria, Hungary, Roumania, Turkey, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Greece, Italy, France, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium and England. Mr. Nooe recently delivered the baccalaureate sermon at Owenton, Ky., where W. B. Taylor is now preaching.

T. A. Lindenmeyer to Leave Bridgeport, Ill.

T. A. Lindenmeyer has resigned the work at Bridgeport, Ill., and expects to close his work with the church there about July 1, or not later than August 1. During two years of his ministry with this church, which period closed April 1, the congregation under his leadership reduced the indebtedness on the church building $3,780. The church has made contributions also to the various missionary and benevolent appeals of the Brotherhood. There were 125 additions to the church during the two years, 62 of which were the result of an evangelistic meeting which was conducted by H. M. Barnett, of Kansas City during last February. Mr. Lindenmeyer is open for engagement with some good church that is desirous of having efficient and faithful service and anxious for a capable leader in a forward movement. The local paper speaks highly of Mr. Lindenmeyer's work in Bridgeport.

W. A. Fite on "Woman's Sphere."

Discussing "Motherhood" on Mothers' Day, W. A. Fite had something to say of the place of woman in today's life: "It ought to be self-evident," asserted Mr. Fite, "that a woman's sphere, in this age, is not limited to the four walls of her home if she would look after the interests of her children. She must be interested in pure food laws, milk inspection, health regulations, etc. She has a right to demand that the food which her children eat must be free from poison, and the milk they drink as pure as sanitary dairies can produce. She must make it her duty to see that health regulation against contagious diseases and unsanitary conditions be enforced. The true mother will be angry with everything in our modern life which threatens the physical, intellectual, moral and religious life of her child. She should have the weapon with which to fight these evils in our day. The demand for the ballot is not fanaticism but a deep-rooted desire on the part of women who have come into the right vision of the age to protect the childhood of this nation."

Men's Work at Missouri Convention.

"Social Service" at Terre Haute.

L. E. Sellers, of Logansport, Ind., in his response to the address of welcome at the recent Terre Haute convention, made some pointed remarks regarding the church's duty toward society today. "The church must stand for the conservation of health," declared Mr. Sellers, "the abolition of child labor, the protection of the worker from dangers in his task, for the cure of poverty, for the protection of the family against vicious divorce laws, for better conditions of toil for women, for the redemption of the individual and society from the social, economic and moral waste of the liquor traffic, for age pensions for workers, for a living wage, a minimum in every industry, for the application of principles of our religion in the government of the people, for purity in politics, for equal rights and complete justice for all men, women and children in all stations of life." The Fort Wayne Sentinel, commenting editorially on Mr. Sellers' address, says: "This outline of the field of the church submitted by Mr. Sellers may come as somewhat of a shock to those whose views have not enlarged with the trend of the times and the growth of modern thought and modern effort—and yet, what serious objection can be urged against it? Manifestly the causes in which the Logansport pastor would enlist the militant efforts of the church are admirable ones. The program is big enough and important enough, also, to test the mettle of all humanity, both within and without the church. Organized church leadership would do much toward putting it on its way to consummation."

G. W. Watson Discusses Divorce.

"Breaking Home Ties—Divorce" was the subject of a timely sermon preached by G. W. Watson of First Church, La Fayette, Ind., recently. The sermon was the third of a series on "Home Problems." Mr. Watson placed especial emphasis upon the necessity of young people taking time to make the selection of a life companion. Asking the question, "what can we do," at the close of the discourse, the speaker attempted partial answers: "What can we do? We can, by education, help to restore again the sanctity of the married relation, so that men and women will not enter into it hastily or lightly, nor seek to break its ties when once cemented, without just cause. We can place our stamp of disapproval on the many agencies that tend to break down a sense of the pure and virtuous. We can seek to have written in every state and territory a uniform marriage and divorce law and thus remove the stigma of our 'divorce colonies.' We can make more secure the economic foundations of the family, while at the same time we can give more care to the development of the spiritual life of the people, which in the last analysis is the solution of the many ills that disturb society."

G. L. COOK ON SUNDAY-SCHOOL NEEDS.

Garry L. Cook, Indiana's State Sunday-School Superintendent, is one of the leaders who has glimpsed the educational possibilities in Sunday-school work. His point of view is always constructive. He believes heartily in the work being done by the Bible-school department of the American Christian Mission Society. Mr. Cook writes as follows: "There is a great and growing conscience on the part of the Disciples of Christ as to the necessity of trained leaders. The progress of the kingdom is being retarded because there is a dearth of trained men and women to carry on the work. Of course, the colleges are doing their utmost to properly prepare young men and women for the ministry, mission field, and local service, but it is beyond their power to touch the local field save thus indirectly. But there is also a great necessity for adequate means by which it will be possible to prepare men and women in the local church to properly carry on the work of the church.

The American Christian Missionary Society maintains a Sunday-school department so that the local church may have better trained leaders for her Sunday-schools. The Sunday-school has not kept pace with educational ideals, and yet she is divinely committed to an educational program. It is the business of the American Society's department to bring to the schools not only enthusiasm but modern pedagogical methods for carrying on the work. If the Sunday-school department is adequate to perform the task set for it, it becomes necessary first to have in its employ men and women who are specialists in the different fields or phases of Sunday-school work. Not only must the present force be kept at work, but there is ever reason that there should be other specialists added to the nucleus."

T. E. CRAMBLET.

Christian University, Canton, Mo.

The closing days of the school year are upon us and the week ending June the eleventh will mark the close of another year of work in the class room. The year that is just closing marks an important step in the history of the school. Dr. Johann, who for many years has been at the head of the institution, has resigned his office. The care of the school has fallen upon Prof. Garn during the enforced absence and retirement of the president. He has filled the position well and it was under his regime that the awakening has come. The time has come for an advancement along all lines and the demands of the hour have awakened those who are in a position to act, to act, not only for today, but for the future welfare and prosperity of the school. A worthy and capable man is being looked for to fill the president's chair. A movement is on foot to standardize the faculty and to increase the library facilities. This work well done will mean a worthy and successful future for the school.

Commencement week will be crowded full of good things. The exercises will commence on Friday night, June the fifth, when the Zetolophian Society will serve their Annual Supper.

In the afternoon the athletes will assemble on the college athletic field to contest for the honor of their respective classes. A silver loving-cup is given to the class that wins the most points in the meet.

The evening witnesses the battle of the intellectual giants of the various literary societies in the annual oratory and declamatory contest. Gold medals are given to the winners in the contest. Much friendly rivalry and friendly spirit is manifested in this contest by the students in support of their favorite contestant.

THE GREAT REFUSAL.

INTERNATIONAL UNIFORM LESSON FOR JUNE 21, 1914.

Matt. 19:16-30. Memory Verses, 25-27.

Golden Text.—Ye cannot serve God and mammon. —Luke 16:13.

American Standard Bible.

Copyright, 1901, by Thomas Nelson & Sons. (Used by permission.)

(16) And, behold, one came to him, and said, Good Teacher, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life? (17) And he said unto him, Why askest thou me concerning that which is good? One there is who is good: but if thou wouldest enter into life, keep the commandments. (18) He saith unto him, Which? And Jesus said, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, (19) Honor thy father and mother: and, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. (20) The young man saith unto him, All these things have I observed from my youth up: what lack I yet? (21) Jesus said unto him, If thou wouldest be perfect, go, sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, follow me. (22) But when the young man heard the saying, he went away sorrowful: for he was one that had great possessions. (23) And Jesus said unto his disciples, Verily I say unto you, It is hard for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. (24) And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. (25) And when his disciples heard it, they were exceedingly amazed, saying, Who then can be saved? (26) And Jesus looking upon them said unto them, With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible. (27) Then answered Peter and said unto him, Lo, we have left all, and followed thee; what then shall we have? (28) And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that you which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. (29) And every one that hath left houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive manifold more, and shall inherit eternal life. (30) But many shall be first that shall be last; and the last first.

Verse By Verse.

BY C. C. BUCKNER

v. 1. As he was going forth: He had been in a home, blessing little children. Good Teacher: An unusual form of address. The rabbi was ordinarily addressed, "Rabbi."

v. 18. Why callest thou me good? I think Jesus was seeking to learn whether the young man really recognized him as a teacher superior to the rabbis or thought him to be true to the Pharisaical traditions and laws and used this word 'good' to emphasize his belief in Jesus' soundness.

v. 19. Thou knowest the commandments: Jesus mentions the last group of the commandments, which have to do with the relations of man to man.

v. 20. All these things have I observed from my youth: It appears that the young man was surprised the teacher had not made demands upon his heroism.

v. 21. Jesus...loved him: We must not fail to note the compassion of Jesus in his diagnosis of the young man's case. The medicine was bitter but it was prescribed in love.

v. 22. But his countenance fell: It was too much. He loved his wealth more than all else.

v. 23. Jesus looked about, and saith, etc.: "Jesus read their thoughts, and probably they thought their master had thrown away a great opportunity of winning a very rich man to their cause."—Miss Tarbell.

v. 24. Trust in riches: "That is, one who depends for happiness on his riches rather than on obedience to the will of God."—J. W. McGarvey.

v. 25. A needle's eye: Some think this was a very narrow passage way through which a camel could pass with the greatest difficulty. It appears to me more plausible that Jesus was merely using a very strong figure and really referred to the eye of a needle.

v. 26. Who can be saved? They were fearful lest they themselves should not be rewarded for their sacrifices.

v. 27. All things are possible with God: Even wealth worship can be overcome with the help of God.

v. 28. Peter began: How natural it was for Peter, the impulsive, to begin. Have left all, etc.: He wishes the Master to bear in mind all the sacrifices his disciples had made for him.

v. 29, 30. Verily, I say unto you, etc.: We are here told that every investment we make in the Gospel will bring enormous dividends.

At the Heart of the Lesson.

BY REV. A. Z. CONRAD, PH.D.

Perfection is found only in God. Estimates of values invariably have relation to a fixed standard. Good and evil, right and wrong are terms used with relation to a standard. Our measurements have reference to an adopted unit. The English yard, which is the unit of long measure, has a constructed standard. It is a bar made of a kind of bronze called "Bailey's metal." It has a square section of one inch on the sides and is thirty-eight inches long, and at one inch from each end a well is driven, in which are sunk gold plugs. On the surface of the gold the defining lines are marked, which are read by the microscope of the macrometer. The utmost care is taken to have an accurate standard. The value of jewels is determined by comparing with those most nearly perfect.

Now all this has a bearing upon character, upon truth, upon all that is related to the spiritual being. Jesus Christ came into the world with a new standard of character value. He offered Himself as the world's standard of ideal character. Henceforth personality was to be measured by its correspondence or lack of correspondence to Himself. To determine personal worth tests had to be applied, and the narrative before us is the application of the spiritual test.

CONSCIOUS RESPONSIBILITY.

"What shall I do?" is the earnest interrogation of this young man. His inquiry indicates his sense of personal accountability. He recognized that destiny and duty are related vitally. He revealed in his question the fact that he accepted the obligation of determining destiny. This, too, is indelibly written in the human heart. We cannot excuse ourselves for our defects and derelictions. Our very sense of ill desert when we have violated conscience indicates our belief in our ability to enter harmoniously into the purposes of God. He knew he could not throw the responsibility upon the Eternal Father for his destiny. If eternal life was to be enjoyed by him it would be because he had in some way fulfilled a responsibility which conscience urged upon him. So he inquired with zest, "What shall I do?" It implied willingness to perfect obedience. He did not fully recognize himself. He was neither conscious of his full strength, or his possible weakness.

THE SUPREME GOOD.

A further evidence of the intelligence of the young man is the fact that he understood what constitutes the supreme good of life. Notwithstanding his wealth, notwithstanding his high position, he was an unsatisfied man. He had not realized the best and he knew it. The human heart never rests until it rests in God. Soul satisfaction and peace are found only in the assurance of eternal life. Whether directly recognizing it or not the human heart carries its own consciousness of sin and alienation from God, and without any theological definitions and explanations man is conscious that personal felicity is impossible without complete harmony with the eternal Father.

THE COMMANDMENT TEST.

In order that the young man might discover himself and if possible realize certain personal defects which would demand the pardoning grace of God, Jesus propounded to him the commandment test of character. "Thou knowest the commandments, 'Do not kill, Do not commit adultery, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Do not defraud, Honor thy father and thy mother.'" Would he claim that upon the basis of full obedience he was entitled to eternal life? This was exactly what he did claim. "All these things have I observed from my youth up." As a literalist he had been a seeming success. Tested by legal requirements and measured by Pharasaic standards, he thought well of himself. And yet, he knew there was something wanting. He did not feel assured of eternal life.

LOVABLE THOUGH LOST.

"Jesus looking upon him loved him." There are many lovely lost people. We often meet non-religious people who are admirable, and moreover agreeable. There are many among the unattached and indifferent whose attractive personalities awaken admiration. It is easy to confuse things and allow geniality to take the place of godliness, and sweetness and suavity to take the place of soul salvation. The love of Jesus, however, did not go out alone to lovable people, but even his enemies were objects of his pity, his sympathy and his concern.

THE SPIRITUAL TEST.

Jesus well knew that this young man did not in reality stand the commandment test. He also knew that he was blinded to his own defects, and he proceeded to apply another test which would reveal the glaring imperfection and defects of his life. "One thing thou lackest. Sell whatsoever thou hast and give to the poor and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me." This was, indeed, the supreme test and when the young man was weighed in the balance he was found wanting. It is much easier to measure up to some program than to live up to a high and holy principle. Jesus revealed the weak link in the chain. He exposed the flaw in the diamond. He showed the spot on the sun. He went to the heart of life and unveiled the concealed motive. The life of the young man was egocentric. He had not been conscious of it himself until now he was compelled to make the great test. He had not been conscious of his devotion to wealth. He would probably have denied it had he been accused of worshiping wealth, but when the Lord undertook to separate him from his wealth it was too much. We are not for a moment to assume that the same test is to be applied to all, except as a spiritual principle. Every man must be willing if the demands of the Kingdom require it to be parted from his property in the interests of piety. Many things which we are willing to do we are not required to do. It comes back again to the great question of first place. The second feature of the requirement was more severe than the first. "Come, follow me." He was not only to leave his wealth but his associations, and invest his personality in the new kingdom.

THE GREAT REFUSAL.

The supreme opportunity of life had come. He was compelled to declare himself. But, his countenance fell at the saying and he went away sorrowful. Here is the great refusal of life, the refusal of a complete consecration, the refusal to obey when the vision has been given. The quest had been right. The discovery had brought disappointment. The quest might have been followed with splendid conquest, a victory over self and selfishness, but it was not. There was quest but no conquest. Following every true quest there is either conquest or inquest. The issue is life and death. It is life with victory or death with inquest. Because he declines to follow Jesus the world has ever since held an inquest upon the young man's spiritual death.

Said Jesus, "Hardly shall they that have riches enter into the Kingdom of God. It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." All speculation as to the term "a needle's eye" results in no benefit or blessing. The manifest purpose of Jesus Christ is to declare the impossibility of serving two masters. The passion for wealth destroys the purpose of piety. When gold is worshiped God is forgotten. Jesus uttered a perpetual warning against absorption in material interests which would leave God out of consideration. What is impossible with man is possible with God. There are no limits to be placed to the spirit's influence. None are to be regarded as beyond hope. All things are possible with God.

TOPIC FOR JUNE 17.

Vocation and Avocation. Lu. 2:49; Jno. 4: 38; Col. 3:17.

"What is your business?" inquired an acquaintance of a man who was giving much of his time to the Sunday-school. "My business is serving the Lord: I am selling shoes to make a living." Jesus put it: "Seek ye first his kingdom, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you." Our vocation, then, is to live the abundant life.

We serve God by doing specific things and by having definite employments. Vague talk about sprituality may easily be allowed the place that belongs to discussion of plain duty. It has been difficult for us to keep religion down where it belongs. We make it a luxury, a mark of superiority, a support of privilege. With Jesus it was for every day use. If our vocation does not express faith in God and minister to man, the less we say about religion the better will be the reputation of religion in our neighborhood.

"IF ANY WILL NOT WORK."

Paul advised severe measures against the Thessalonians who refused to work. Herodotus says that king Amasis of Egypt "established the law that every Egyptian should appear once a year before the governor of his canton, and show his means of living; or, failing to do so, and to prove that he got an honest livelihood, should be put to death. Solon the Athenian borrowed this law from the Egyptians, and imposed it on his countrymen, who have observed it ever since. It is indeed an excellent custom." The killing of loafers may be contrary to our notions of justice; we are allowed to keep them from thinking too well of themselves. We can use plain speech about men who inherit property and who do nothing to justify them in holding it.

"IN THE NAME OF THE LORD."

We may be sure that the apostle was never interested in a form of words merely as a form. The life that is lived in the spirit of Jesus has power. There is something wrong when we have to announce to our friends periodically that we are disciples of Jesus. Either our friends do not know what it means to follow Jesus or we are following with uncertain steps. The disciple will often mention the name of the Master. There are occasions that call for definite statement of belief. But it is the life as a whole, and not isolated statements, that fixes our standing before the world.

ENLARGEMENT.

"About every five years I take up with a new hobby," said a teacher of chemistry in an Illinois college. "I hope to have a variety of interests when I am too old to engage in my profession. An avocation may be as important as a vocation. Everyone must know his own trade and his self-respect depends upon his skill and energy in following it. A satisfactory life, however, is one that has many interests. The garden, hunting with a camera, the study of a subject that does not seem to be closely related to the main business of life, and other ways in which men seek recreation keep their minds alert and their sympathies human. After the disciple finds Jesus has chosen the occupation which he thinks is best suited to his powers, he has still the privilege and the duty of finding how to get relief from the strain of work. He chooses wisely his avocations, he will find not only to the joy of his life but also to the sanity of his judgments, and he may be saved from vicious practices. The man who does not know how to turn aside from his regular employment and enjoy himself instantly is in danger of mental and moral deterioration.

Mark 6:31-32; Phil. 4:20-21; Gal. 2:20; Jno. 5:30; 6:38; Matt. 26:39; 1 Cor. 10: 31; I Pet. 4:11.

NOT INVESTIGATING

Educational Talks on Bonds

After all of the warnings that have been given against different types of investment (and it would be wiser for you to secure the last seven copies of THE STANDARD if you have any money to invest)—the average man will begin to feel as if he ought to put his money under a loose board in the floor, where he can see that he has it whenever he wants to look.

Don't do this, however, for some day your hiding place will be discovered by a thief, whereupon money, thief and all disappear. This is the poorest type of investment, is NOT INVESTING.

The MEANING of BAPTISM

By Charles Clayton Morrison About 250 pages, $1.25 net

The most important work treating of the characteristic teaching of Baptists and Disciples that has appeared in this generation. It deals with a theme that is peculiarly alive to every mind that has had any part in the Disciples' reformatory movement. The author writes with conviction, but wholly without partisanship. He states issues incisively and faces them squarely. He holds an original and independent point of view for the treatment of the subject of Christian Baptism. He accepts the position of the Disciples as to the practice of immersion only, but rejects much of the reasoning traditionally put forth by his brethren and the Baptists in support of this practice. The book is refreshingly frank. Mr. Morrison does not believe that immersion is baptism. In the opening chapter the author puts himself squarely in opposition to Alexander Campbell's argument.

This notable volume is now in press. A very large edition will be run at the first printing. It is expected that the book will have a wide sale throughout the Christian world. Baptists will read it. Pedo-baptists will read it. Certainly every minister and earnest layman among the Disciples will wish to read it.

The publishers wish to receive one thousand orders for this book before it comes from the press. That means within the next twenty days. They therefore offer to send the book absolutely free with a new subscription to The Christian Century at the regular rate of $1.50, plus 10 cents for postage on the book, provided order is received before the book comes from the press. After that this offer will be withdrawn and the book will be sold for $1.25 net. Character Talks

By Austin Hunter, Pastor Jackson Boulevard Christian Church, Chicago

Rev. Austin Hunter.

COURAGE

AN important element of a strong character is courage. Not the empty bravado of a mouthing Falstaff, but the stout-heartedness of Pilate's great Prisoner. Perhaps no feature is more common among strong Bible characters than courage. The successor to Moses was exhorted, above all things, to "be strong and of good courage." So all the way through the world history, the men and women who have achieved were "not afraid." God can not use a coward. Our courage is grounded upon our faith in God and our confidence in truth. Jesus was above all things a man of sterling courage, notwithstanding the conception that too often obtains that he was effeminate. He "steadfastly set his face" toward the greatest dangers even when his disciples lost heart. There is no conflict between courage and meekness; they go hand in hand. Courage is not rashness. There is no virtue in rushing into unnecessary danger. But where a principle of right is involved one should never flinch. Martin Luther said, "Here I stand; I can do no other. God help me." The very first thing which we are to add to our faith is virtue or courage.

"The Conquest is just what you say it is—'a journal of character-building,'" writes one of our superintendents. "The Conquest" takes itself seriously. That's why its readers take it seriously. Is the paper your school is taking one that emphasizes the things that should be emphasized in a Sunday school—serious Bible study, religious ideals and Christian service? "The Conquest" has as its aim not simply to give schools what they have been used to—small talk of school work; but to publish such material as will actually GROW CHARACTER.

This is a regular feature of our paper for Adult and Young People's Classes, "The Conquest." Have you seen this live weekly? Send for free copy today.

Disciples Publication Society - 700-714 E. Fortieth St. Chicago

"CLAPTRAP" METHODS

of promoting Sunday school work are rapidly passing. The pronouncements of the late meeting of the Religious Education Association, held at New Haven, indicate that fact. Our constructive leaders are deploring the shouting and "boosting" methods of contests and special days. The Sunday School is coming to a sober realization of its responsibility for the building of Christian character and the inculcation of spiritual ideals in those to whom it ministers. Thoughtful leaders know that these can not be secured by noise and clatter and inflated attendance. It is to be hoped that the Disciples of Christ will not fall out of line with the sane, sensible Sunday school army that is now looking toward other goals than "great reports," big attendance and weighty offerings.

We call your attention to the BETHANY SYSTEM OF SUNDAY SCHOOL LITERATURE which has for its purpose the BUILDING OF CHARACTER:

I. THE BETHANY GRADED LESSONS, the superior in quality, we believe, of all other similar systems of literature. Compare it with others. We would prefer that you do this.
II. THE "CONQUEST" and other WEEKLIES, attractive but constructive and sober.
III. THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM, a magazine of social service.
IV. THE LIFE OF JESUS, a thorough, constructive review of the life of the Master.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

* * *

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

* * *

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

WHY The Bethany System of Sunday School Literature Demands Your Attention!

1. It is the product, not simply of the talent of our own brotherhood, but of the expert workers and writers of the ENTIRE SUNDAY SCHOOL WORLD.
2. Mechanically it is the most nearly perfect of all the systems of graded literature produced to date.
3. Because the use of the Bethany lessons will make it possible for your school to co-operate in graded union activities. With other literatures, you will be handicapped in such co-operation.
4. It represents a notable achievement in Christian unity, for which principle the Disciples as a people stand. The Bethany literature is the joint product of five Protestant bodies.

We do not ask you to use the "Bethany." We do ask you to compare it with other systems. If it does not prove to be the Best, after a careful examination, use the system that IS the best.

Loyalty to Faith's Legacies

"And Moses took the bones of Joseph with him: for he had straightly sworn the children of Israel, saying, 'God will surely visit you, and ye shall carry up my bones away hence with you.'"

That seems to us a very grewsome burden, but it was an inspiring one, nevertheless. A dead man's bones are not very cheerful company, but those of Joseph more than repaid all the labor involved in their removal from Egypt to the land of promise.

The children of Israel were making their hasty flight from Egypt. There were years of wandering before them, and behind was a pursuing army. They were carrying as much as possible of their own belongings, and were further encumbered by those enforced loans by which they were hoping to make good something of the unrequited labor of almost 400 years. They had flocks and herds also, and each man, besides his care for his own household, had responsibility for the common subsistence and defense. Yet in their haste of flight and their excessive burden, they found time and strength for an added load. The body of Joseph, buried more than a century before, they exhumed and carried with them.

Joseph's tomb in Canaan cost his posterity many a weary day's labor, and the shoulders of hundreds of men ached before the travel and conquest were completed. But it cost Joseph something, too. He might have had a splendid tomb and monument in Egypt. Pyramids already hoary with antiquity were there testifying to the high esteem with which the noble dead were held in the land of Egypt, and his might have been among them, but it was not so. His sons, inheriting his wealth and their mother's official dignity, might have risen to honor in Egypt. To make this impossible to them was Joseph's desire. If Joseph's body had been the only consideration, the pharaoh in whose reign he died would have buried it in Canaan, as he did the body of Jacob. It was Joseph's plan that his children themselves must take it there, and that only when they made Canaan their own permanent habitation. It was determination never to let them rest in Egypt or the wilderness which made his bones restless in their Egyptian tomb. The scores of times in the forty years of desert march and sojourn, the living query was whether it was worth while to march on. Each well in the wilderness, with its oasis, was an invitation to remain. Each space of grass for their flocks raised anew the question of farther progress; but beside Moses with his inflexible will there was a silent member of the company whose voiceless protest against content with the wilderness could not be gainsaid or argued down. They might make homes for themselves there, but where would they bury the body of Joseph? For him there was no resting place short of Canaan, hence no home for his children. Thus Joseph's dying request became an eloquent testimony to his own faith in the deliverance of his people—effective against content in Egypt or the wilderness, a powerful incentive to the fulfillment of the hope which he cherished for the nation, but died leaving unfulfilled.

It was the forgiveness, the fidelity, the magnanimity of Joseph that kept the nation alive in Egypt. Gratitude and truthfulness bound them by the strongest ties to keep their promise to him. It was the legacy of his faith, preserved after he was dead, which kept alive in captive Israel the hope of escape.

We do not always realize as we should the value of historic continuity in religious effort. There is a righteousness which is sporadic and a righteousness which exists in continuity of effort. Blessed is the righteousness which joins together in one the labor of fathers and sons. It is a pitiful thing when the religion of the father makes no appeal to the conscience of his son. It is sad when that which the father has borne courageously and hopefully through a long life is transferred to his son and is received by him only as a burden to be shoved from his shoulders and buried in neglect as the corpse of an outlived obligation. How many men there are who need to be inspired with this conception of family loyalty to a great moral and religious interest, whose fathers and mothers toiled and labored through the wilderness, bearing that which they had received from their ancestors, and which they carried loyally not for their sakes only, but for themselves. What have you done with your father's religion? What use have you made of your mother's Bible? Your name was written in hope and pride in the record between its Testaments. How loyal have you been to your father's faith? What answer have you made possible to your mother's prayers? Have you counted all this a dead weight and superstition, well enough for the past, but of no interest to you? Shame upon your own disloyal, spiritual laziness. There may be some who have done even worse than this. Some who faithfully promised fathers and mothers, Christian friends now gone, to be true to God and faithful to the Christian life, but who have forgotten all this, proved false to their pledges, and buried in the wilderness of sin and neglect the memories that once were sacred.

Religious Unrest and Heresy

A Sermon Preached at First Christian Church, Louisville, Ky., on the Text: "And this word once yet more signifieth the removal of those things that are shaken, and of things that are made that those things which cannot be shaken may remain."

BY E. L. POWELL.

IT has been affirmed that we are living in an age of doubt, and that our religious unrest is to be traced to the pain and weariness and impoverishment born of doubt. It has been claimed that the church has drifted from the great fundamental truths which have been brought to us in the one and only supreme revelation. On the contrary, we are living in an age of religious unrest, but the religious unrest is born of faith, and is the most hopeful sign of our advancing and conquering Christianity. It is true that so far as traditional theology is concerned, there has been much of it denied and much of it which we have simply outgrown. In no spirit of pride, and yet with a feeling of very great rejoicing, I think it may be affirmed that the old theology which was unrelated to life has passed, and that in its place has come a new theology, whose justification is found in the acceptance of its duties and obligations and privileges in relation to the world in which we live, to the earth upon which we tread.

SOME THINGS THAT HAVE PASSED.

One would be regarded as a heretic today in any church circle, in any theological realm, who should declare that he no longer believes that the parable of Eden is not history. One is not tabooed as respects his genuine faith because he does not accept the seven days' theory of creation, or that creation was the work of a moment instead of an evolutionary process back of which was God.

We do not today believe in any mechanical theory of inspiration. Gone forever are the dogmas of material heaven and a material hell. Gone forever is the dogma that an angry God was placated and made favorable to man through a contractual arrangement entered into between God, the Father, the party of the first part, and his Son, the party of the second part. We do not believe—and I speak for the leaders and thinkers and the intelligent and thoughtful constituency of the church—we do not believe any longer in a salvation by magic. We do not believe in a righteousness that by some mysterious method is imputed to us to cover up our unrighteousness, making God to accept our sin because it is covered by the beauty and glory of the character of Jesus Christ. The old notion of a God as presented to us in the Augustinian theology, who is little other than a representation of irresponsible almightiness choosing arbitrarily whom he will to be saved and assuming arbitrarily those whom he will because of his own good will and pleasure apart from any character in the individual thus chosen or condemned—that conception of God has given place to what is almost modern, the fatherhood of God, with all of its infinite tenderness, and its mercy, which transcends our deepest needs and our greatest sins. Our religious unrest does not come from the loss of this traditional theology. We are not unhappy that it has gone. The church has not been impoverished through its departure, for the great fundamental essential truths of revelation remain, as the everlasting lights in the firmament. The things that are made, made by man, and having the human stamp upon them in every line and lineament and feature, have passed away in order that the things which are unshakable shall stand forth the more clearly and definitely and with greater assurance on our part as to their reality and their tremendous grip on our hearts and lives.

GOD, A GOD OF LOVE.

The God of Calvinism has been supplanted by the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. The commercial theory of the atonement has been supplanted by the infinitely precious truth that God loved us, not because he was paid to do it, but because he is love and could not help himself unless he was other than a God of love.

Rev. E. L. Powell.

In the place of a mechanical salvation, purely magical and miraculous, we have a salvation made possible only through character that has been fashioned in harmony with the mind and spirit and will of Jesus Christ. There has been no loss anywhere; there has been almost infinite enrichment, and the faith of our church today was never stronger, never richer, never more sure of itself. We are not living in an age of doubt. We are living in an age of faith. Our religious unrest is not because of a sense of bereavement coming as a result of the surrender—shall we say of very much of a hard, mechanical, metaphysical and utterly unrelated theology to life?

What then is the explanation of our religious unrest? You will find this to be true as you study for yourselves the situation. Our religious unrest is born of the new and more comprehensive vision which has come to the church as the result of its new faith, and the feeling on the part of the church that it is so far removed from overtaking its vision from the realization of the splendid territory that has in these opening years of the twentieth century been laid bare to her hand and to her reach. I mean this:

We have come—I speak now of the Church—to recognize that our gospel has a claim upon all of life, upon society, government, politics, business, home, education, and that it is the province of the Church so to proclaim her gospel as that the power of that gospel shall be dominant over all of the interests, all of the concerns, all of the relationships of life. The Church has barely gotten away from the medieval conception that her province was a cabined and confined and pinioned province, her gospel imprisoned within the four walls of a temple and concerning itself with little more than what we denominate religious exercises; whereas now the Church begins to see that it is within her province to settle the question of labor and capital, that it is within her province to deal with all of the relationships existing between man and man, in all of the realms in which these relationships exist at all. And we feel somehow that we are not doing that thing. We feel somehow that we are being kept imprisoned. We feel that, with the power of that mighty vision calling us out of all that is narrow in our ideas of service and duty, we are not making the progress that we should. We feel that we are inocuous, when we should be aggressive; we feel that we are timid and impotent when we should be lifting the banner and going out into the battle; we feel that the great commission bids us go into every port along the whole shore line of humanity, and that we are remaining within a landlocked bay in sight of shore. The port of government—the Church must go hither. The port of business, with all of its maladjustment—the Church must go hither.

WHAT THE SOCIAL UNREST MEANS.

The port of lands where light has never shone in the face of Jesus Christ—the Church must go thither. There is no relationship, there is no department of human life with which the Church and her gospel are not concerned. Holding fast, so far as America is concerned, to the separation of Church and state, standing for that principle as never to be abrogated so long as we shall put any sort of reasonable construction upon liberty and democracy, none the less the church, through her spirit, through her gospel, through her principles, must influence and must leaven the whole lump of society and must permeate all relationships. Our religious unrest springs from our failure to do this thing.

The church today, as it has been for a long time past, is just getting away from the idea that religion is worship toward God while it has no relationship to man that can be denominated religious. I would say that the social unrest, the industrial unrest, the political unrest, is but a recognition by these various departments of human activity, the recognition of the claim of the church's work upon these several departments, these several realms of human endeavor.

Politics is not comfortable and cannot be comfortable until it recognizes the principle of righteousness in all political affairs. By the way, that was an admirable statement made the other day by our president in addressing a company of representatives of foreign trade, when he said to them: "Gentlemen, it has long been a wish, dear to my heart, that there should be on the part of America a righteous conquest of foreign trade." Mark the language. "A righteous conquest of foreign trade." These various departments of activity are all astir today, restless, unhappy, uncomfortable, just in proportion as they deny the claim of the Church, which is the claim of the Church's gospel, upon the conduct of all their affairs, upon the carrying forward of all of their enterprises. The Church asks of this country that it shall not be divorced from righteousness. The Church asks of the government that it shall not make of itself a mere machine without any regard to human life and human welfare. The Church asks of all the relationships that exist between man and man that there shall be the recognition, and the recognition shown in active effort, of the golden rule, which is nothing more than the square deal. The Church has been largely kept within the confines of a monastery and she is coming to break away into the open. She is tired of her confinement and her imprisonment. She is not concerned about dissent from dryest theologies. She is not concerned or troubling herself at all in regard to the fact that very much of this old theology has gone into the dump heap of dead systems, but she will not be happy until firmly, strongly, gloriously she moves out into this larger realm of duty and privilege which her commission bids her occupy. There has been a failure of the Church to live up to her commission which is nothing less than the salvation of the world.

THE AGE'S CHIEF HERESY.

Go into all the world and build churches that companies may be gathered together to say prayers and listen to sermons and be delighted with sweet music. Was that the commission which the Man who spoke from the mountain height gave to his disciples? No. Go into all the world and speak the gospel to every creature that the Son of Man has come to seek and save the lost everywhere. How shall we save the world unless we can put our hands on institutions to save individuals and save the institutions? How can we save the world until we can save men so fully and completely as that we shall save the customs that are men's creations? How shall we save the world unless we shall bring Christian civilization to the world? And what is Christian civilization if not bringing the spirit of Christ and the will of Christ into everything that a man has to do with?

So I would say that perhaps the principal heresy of the age in which we are living (from which we are rapidly getting away, however), is the divorce of religion from all of life save that which has to do with the religious exercise of the sanctuary. We have come, many of us, to believe that, if one is orthodox as respects the acceptance of a certain creed, and orthodox as respects the conduct and faithful observance of certain religious ceremonies, he is religious even though he is dishonest in business, even though he is malicious in his relationships with men.

We have virtually in very much of our theology declared that God Almighty broke his heart to set up luxurious institutions of religion that have no sort of relationship toward the betterment of industrial conditions, of sanitary conditions, of educational conditions, or any of the things that do wrong and that make the world so wretched and so miserable.

TWO KINDS OF SERVICE.

Jesus Christ came on earth that you and I might come here Sunday night after Sunday night and listen to a sermon and sweet music and say our prayers and go home, and that great big word of religion, "Christianity," has been minimized until it has come to pass that there is no function for religion to discharge. I accept the definition of heresy which I am fully aware is not given as a definition of heresy by Jesus Christ; it is implied, however—heresy is the collective state of mind and heart or individual, as the case may be, which leads us to ignore in our lives the meaning of love, the interpretation of love in terms of service. One may be orthodox in regard to his conformity to the creed which he has accepted, and if there is unwillingness, through lack of love, to take an interest in the world's work in the sight of Jesus Christ, he is a heretic. You remember those extremely orthodox personages who were making their way from Jericho to Jerusalem, and passed a man who had fallen among thieves, and who had been beaten and desperately wounded.

Those men had the same notion that I have been talking about. They felt that it was not their business to help a wounded man; that it was no part of religion to deal with secular affairs; that they were concerned, and properly concerned, about the exercises of the temple.

The priest said, "I am faithful in the discharge of my priestly office," and the Levite, no doubt, said, "I am strictly attentive to my duties in my office. What more does God require? Let somebody else take charge of this business of binding up the wounds of this man, and besides that, he is a heretic; he does not belong to our company. He does not belong to our religious organization," and so they pass by on the other side. And then there came the man who was not orthodox, so far as ecclesiastical standards were concerned, and without any question at all as to his orthodoxy, and not considering the fact that his religious dignity might not be impaired, he got down from his beast and went to the help of this poor fellow, bound up his wounds, poured oil and wine into them, put the poor fellow on his own beast and sent him to an inn and made proper provision for his comfort, and Jesus Christ virtually answers the question for all time as to who is orthodox and who is the heretic, and he gives to the Samaritan, nameless though he be, an immortality of fame, and has made the priest and Levite to come down through the ages and centuries with the condemnation of a wholesome Christianity resting upon them.

NO RELIGION WITHOUT A HEART BEAT.

I affirm that religion divorced from life is heresy. I affirm that your religion is nothing short of contemptible hypocrisy if it has not a heart beat in it that will lead you to go out into the world of need and give help. I affirm that any church to whom need anywhere makes no appeal, by virtue of refusing to be a missionary church, is branded by high heaven heretical, though it may subscribe to the Westminster Confession or to the Augsburg Confession, to the Nicene Creed, to the Apostles' Creed and to all of the theology that has ever been written by learned and honest men.

And then I believe, furthermore, that we get mighty close to the heretical when we not only deny God entrance into all places save churches, and keep him out of all the enterprises of life save those which we call religious exercises, but when we also virtually affirm that God has gone silent since the Bible was closed, and that there is no longer any God who speaks to men. That to me is a most desolate and awful conception, yet not very long ago it would have been regarded as heretical to affirm that any message had ever come from heaven since the canon was closed. Today we ask such a question as this: Did not God speak to man before the Bible was written? Unquestionably, or else there could not have been any Bible.

WHAT IS THE BIBLE?

The Bible is the record of what God said to the people concerning himself and concerning duty. If God spoke to the people before the Bible was written, making possible the Bible, then has he exhausted himself in his utterances to the few whose names and whose writing constitute the Bible? Is there no longer any word except that which we shall get from the printed page of the book of all books? If you claim that the Bible holds potentially all his truth, I grant you that we have the limit of revelation in the book because we have the limit of revelation in Jesus Christ, the man in the book. But if you mean to say that there is, through experiences of life or through science and art and literature and all the fine things that have been wrought by humanity, no history from God, I not only deny the statement as a reflection upon God, but I would declare that to be very closely akin to what I have in mind as heresy. For me no dead deity, but one who is living and speaking today. Better that there should have been no message at all—perhaps that is rather a strong statement. Better that there should be no God at all than a dead God or a silent God.

"WHERE IS YOUR GOD?"

In our great stress and strain of suffering and service, we look to the heavens, and there comes no response that day, as mockingly Elijah suggested to the worshipers of Baal. "Where is your god? Perhaps he has gone on a journey; perhaps he has other employment; he certainly hasn't any concern so far as you and your affairs may be brought under his cognizance." No, friends, God hath spoken, God speaks, God will speak and in many a still hour, when you can scarcely see your way there shall be heard a voice, not audible, but clear and distinct, saying, "This is the way, walk ye in it!" God speaks through the conscience enlightened by the great revelation given in Jesus Christ. God speaks through the pain and the sorrow and the misery of humanity. God speaks through such a disaster as that of the Titanic or the later disaster of the Empress of Ireland. God speaks through his mighty whirlwinds, through his cataclysms in nature, through all of the fearful experiences that represent the redemptive process going on in humanity. God himself speaks to us or we perish.

So I conclude this sermon by the encouraging word that instead of living in an age of heresy, so far as doctrine is concerned, we are living in an age of faith, because of the higher vision of the church. I affirm that to depart from that higher vision is the real heresy, and that we are departing from that higher vision if we shall fail to claim all realms as the province of the church and her gospel. That we are departing from that programme, that new spirit which is nothing other than the old spirit of the Master, when we divorce religion from life, and thus try to build up a religion upon other foundations of morality and righteousness; that we are departing from that new spirit and that new faith when we fail to be serviceable, when we fail to lend a helping hand, when we pass by on the other side. Heresy is of the heart rather than of the head. Heresy is to be unloving. Heresy is to selfishly claim your religious privileges and make no use of them. Heresy is being content to come to church and to get inspiration and then let it dry up.

Heresy is getting all you can from the preacher and from the music and from the book and then putting it in cold storage. Heresy is that miserable, narrow, limited conception of religion which gives it nothing to do and takes it out in simply glorifying and crowning it with trust. Heresy is to be no account religiously. Heresy is to boast of your being orthodox in the faith and keeping your orthodox faith so that nobody knows whether it is orthodox or heterodox. Heresy is denying God entrance into all life and keeping him shut up within your little limited sanctuary. Heresy is saying that God hasn't anything to do with humanity now, that once he spoke to men, but that he has gone silent, and that in the hour of my agony, although he may have comforted Isaiah, or he may have comforted Moses or Peter or James or John, he does not know that I am here.

THE REAL HERESY.

Heresy is to make out of our thinking and living an indifferent God, and to have as a substitute a Deity to whom we deliver addresses on occasion, and stated occasions at that. We come together and say we do not believe that you are other than one who desires this etiquette to be observed, and we are willing to be proper. God save us from such a life as that; and I thank God that the church of today is living as never before. Observe the actions taken by recent great religious gatherings, such as the Northern and Southern Presbyterian Assemblies and the Southern Baptist Convention. Those gatherings say in no uncertain tones that our religion, the gospel of our church, has to do with all of life, and so it dares to express itself in regard to these questions. Heresy sometimes consists in being silent when you ought to thunder. We are getting out of the provincial.

We have laid aside our luggage, our encumbrances, we have gotten away from our hard and fast and crass and almost cruel theologies. We have gotten our stride. We feel the mighty winds of the great ocean playing upon our faces as we go bounding over the sea knowing that we have world relations. We are not satisfied with the prim and the proper, but we want the glory of conquest of souls, that through conquest of souls institutions and laws and customs and societies and civilizations may be redeemed. We have gotten the Pauline spirit which represents the gospel of Jesus Christ as having to do with the groaning creation, creating the pain of birth, travail with pain, a groaning for deliverance into the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

And as sure as there is a living, present, speaking God today, whose sweet messages enable us to interpret the message which has been given us here on the pages that never grow old, so surely instead of there coming to the church a time of decadence, there is coming to the church, and has already come, a period of triumphant and advancing democracy, and a triumphant and advancing democracy represented by a universalism of rights and privileges and duties proclaimed in the great commission given us by Jesus Christ. May God keep us so thoroughly unhappy and keep alive so continuously this religious unrest as that we shall find ourselves leaping forward to overtake the vision of the mighty new territory more and more, faster and faster until the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ.

The Festival of Lights, Madura, India

BY A. J. SAUNDERS.

"ARE you going to the 'Festival of Lights?'" "Yes, we are thinking of doing so." "Sure, you must go. Why, everybody goes. It is the most beautiful religious spectacle that Madura has to offer." "When is it to be held?" "I am not certain of the night at present, but you will soon learn from the preparations and interest of the natives."

And we did, for days before the festival the whole atmosphere was charged with a spirit of expectancy. In many respects India is an empire of child races. Western people are prone to think of the Indian as a well matured man, a deep thinker, a profound philosopher. Some, no doubt, are—a very few. The great majority of India's millions are children in thought and action. They love bright colors, the spectacular, the tawdry. The dress of the little Hindu women is often a blaze of color.

All is noise and confusion out in the street. Immense cannon crackers are being let off. There is shouting and a medley of voices. The shrill native band is playing, and the energetic drummer is having a really good time, the admiration of numerous small boys. The Tamil word for small boy is decidedly pretty—thumby—and means: a little brother. The great car goes by. It is an object of awe. It is a sacred thing. For in that car is the goddess, and she reigns supreme over the life and death of her teeming devotees.

But here is old Jumbo—the elephant, a very necessary part of the performance. The little, tinkling bell the while makes music to his measured tread. He is a stately old fellow, once the monarch of the jungle. He is, however, only one of many in this procession. A number of these great beasts are kept at the Temple for such occasions as this. They always add novelty and interest to any parade. But ask, what is it all for? To stir up interest, to inspire enthusiasm, to satisfy the love of the spectacular which is inherent in all children. These particular processions were to beat up enthusiasm for the festival of lights.

THE TEPPAKULAM.

The scene of the famous festival of lights is the big Teppakulam at Madura. The name itself means "raft tank." It was built by one of the greatest kings of Madura—King Thirumalai Naik, to whom we also owe great portions of the beautiful palace, and extensive Temple, which attract so many tourists every year. Mr. W. Francis, of the India Civil Service, describes this picturesque place in this language:

"This Teppakulam is an artificial reservoir made by Thirumalai Naik. It is filled by a channel from the river Vaigai and lies at the extreme south-east corner of the town. It is almost a perfect square, measuring along the outside of the parapet walls, 1,000 feet on the north and south and 950 feet on the east and west, and is the largest of the kind in South India. The sides are faced with cut granite and surmounted by a handsome parapet of the same material, just outside which a granite walk, five feet wide, runs all round the tank. Flights of steps, three on each side, run down at intervals to the water's edge. In the middle of the reservoir is a square island, also faced with cut granite, on which, among green palms and flowering trees, is a small white temple with a tower of the usual kind, flanked at the four corners of the island with graceful little Mandapams. The whole is exceedingly well proportioned and graceful in effect. The story goes that this spot was the place at which the bricks for Thirumalai Naik's palace were made, and that, when the clay for them was being dug out, the stone image of Ganapathy now in the Temple was found buried underground. Realizing that the discovery showed that the spot was holy ground, the king turned the excavations into this beautiful tank."

It is indeed a beautiful place. The water may not be so fresh and pure as it might be, but the broad roads on its four sides, a number of typical Indian bungalows surrounding it, and tall cocoanut trees, graceful palms, with numerous native trees everywhere all give a setting to the picture which is at once varied and rich in color and truly oriental.

THE FESTIVAL.

The Festival of Lights is an annual affair, held on the anniversary of King Thirumalai Naik's birthday. Toward evening of the day set for the celebration every street and road leading to the Teppakulam is filled with a crowd in holiday attire the like of which is to be found only in India. Some are on foot, some in gaily decked typical bullock bandy, others in horse carriages, others again in the latest design motor cars. All are in good spirits and filled with evident expectancy.

The enclosure around the tank is a spectacle to see. The whole landscape is literally black with people. Not only is it a religious festival, but it is a fair as well. And traders, side-shows, booths of all descriptions are doing an enormous business.

As night deepens lights begin to flash out everywhere. Thousands of little open oil wells are lit on the walls and in special little niches all round the tank. The island is just a blaze of light. The reflection of the myriads of lights upon the water and the seething background of dark-skins form a sight that one shall not soon forget.

Then occurs the great religious event of the whole festival. For weeks before there has been in preparation a huge, ill-constructed raft of bamboo, decorated in the most gaudy manner. On this barge are placed the presiding god and goddess of the great Temple. A strong and long rope is attached, and thousands of devoted Hindu drag the raft with its precious freight all round the tank in the presence of multitudes of the Hindu faithful. Meanwhile there is playing over the whole scene a perfect cannonade of fire-works. The falling stars of the rockets add the crowning glory to this spectacle of color, light and life.

But now, what did it all mean to India's people? It meant honor and worship to their gods. This thing was not play to them. Religion is a real part of and has a definite bearing upon their whole life. They went home that night tired, but happy. They had given their god and goddess a free ride round the sacred tank. Wonderful. To us, my friend, to you and to me, what is it? It is a pathetic sight. It is a spectacle over which the angels may well weep. Fancy that god, that religion. My friend, there is only one thing in all the wide world that can change this condition, and it is doing it,—Christian education.

"Let us seek the desert spaces where the Christless hordes are waiting.
Let us journey to the needy lands we know,
There's a whisper in the midnight, there's a star above to guide us,
Oh, the East is calling, calling; let us go."

Charles Stelzle, "Apostle of Labor"

A HUMAN INTEREST STORY.

ONE of the leaders of the Presbyterian General Assembly held in Chicago was Charles Stelzle, who until a short time ago was the superintendent of the Presbyterians' Department of Church and Labor. Although Mr. Stelzle is without an office now, the Assembly recorded distinct victories for labor and for Mr. Stelzle. The church decided to continue an aggressive fight for the rights of the laboring man.

The friends of Mr. Stelzle, especially those who know of his rise from a New York newsboy to high church position, will hope for Mr. Stelzle's reinstatement to the important position from which he was removed a few months ago.

Mr. Stelzle tells this story of his early days:

"I lived in a rear tenement over near the river on the East Side of New York, where people are huddled together like animals, when I was a boy, with my mother and four sisters. We were very poor. My mother sewed wrappers, for which she received two dollars a dozen. It took her three days and three nights to finish a dozen wrappers, and sometimes I would awake toward morning to see her still sitting at my bedside, sewing. Often she had to go supperless in order that we might have something to eat. We had only a stale roll with a little salt sprinkled upon it, and frequently that was all we had for weeks at a time. It was years before we tasted butter or fruit. We hardly knew what they were. I went to work at eight years of age in the basement of a New York tobacco shop—a sweat-shop you would call it now. I know what it means to suffer for want of the barest necessities of life. If I felt that the church had no message concerning child-labor, if it had nothing to say concerning the securing of a square deal for women, and had no care for the unsanitary conditions in shops and factories, I would line up with some other organization outside of the church. I need simply think of my mother, broken in health and sometimes crippled in body because of the awful suffering of those early years when she worked to keep us from starving, and of my four sisters and all that they passed through, to make me a labor agitator on the other side against the church and against every condition and every institution in society today which stands in the way of my people—the working people—if the church did not care. But the church does care; if it didn't, I would be working elsewhere."

It is the knowledge of men which Mr. Stelzle gained on the streets and in the machine-shop that makes him the power that he is among men of all classes. Workingmen know that he knows what he is talking about. When he steps out on the platform, at one of his big mass-meetings, the crowd cheers him in anticipation, for they know that it is not an academic discussion of their problems, or a theory for the future welfare of mankind that he is going to present to them. Any man who would appear before a crowd of trades-unionists of this country with a visionary scheme would most likely be laughed out of the meeting. Workingmen do their own thinking, and they are not easily convinced. But they have faith in Mr. Stelzle's sincerity.

"Bob" Burdette's Faith

A LETTER AND A CONFESSION.

READERS of the Christian Century will be interested in the following letter of Robert J. Burdette, famed printer, poet, and preacher. Dr. Burdette is now on his death bed, in his California home. The letter was written to a friend in New York:

Ever since June, 1912, when I made my last public appearance, we have been living in our summer home down here by the sea. "Eventide," Mrs. Burdette named it, because it faces the sunset. It is very pleasant, this "afternoon land," in spite of sickness. I watch the sunset as I look out over the rim of the blue Pacific, and there is no mystery beyond the horizon line, because I know what there is over there. I have been there. I have journeyed in those lands. Over there where the sun is just sinking is Japan. That star is rising over China. In that direction lie the Philippines. I know all that.

Well, there is another land that I look toward as I watch the sunset. I have never seen it. I have never seen any one who has been there; but it has a more abiding reality than any of these lands which I do know. This land beyond the sunset—this land of immortality, this fair and blessed country of the soul—why, this Heaven of ours is the one thing in the world which I know with absolute, unshaken, unchangeable certainty. This I know with a knowledge that is never shadowed by a passing cloud of doubt. I may not always be certain about this world; my geographical locations may sometimes become confused. But that other world—that I know. And as the afternoon sun sinks lower Faith shines more clearly, and Hope, lifting her voice in a higher key, sings the songs of fruition.

R. J. Burdette.

My work is about ended, I think. The best of it I have done poorly; any of it I might have done better. But I have done it. And in a fairer land, with finer material and a better working light, I will do better work.

Good-bye, God bless you, and keep you day by day. ROBERT J. BURDETTE.

Kipling Discusses Spelling.

At a dinner attended by Rudyard Kipling one of his fellow guests started a discussion concerning the spelling and pronunciation of the English language.

"Have you ever noticed, Mr. Kipling," he asked, "that in the entire English language there are only two words beginning with 'su' that are pronounced as though beginning with 'sh'? Those two are sugar and sumach. Having made an exhaustive study of the subject, you may take it from me that this is so."

"Are you sure?" was Kipling's only and sufficient response.

Albright, Painter of Children

A Man Who Believes that "An Artist is Revealed Not So Much in What He Puts Into His Picture as in What He Omits."

BY MILTON AINSLIE.

I ASKED Mr. Albright whether he painted children because the models cost him less, or whether he had children of his own whom he had to tend and found that the easiest way to keep them still. He said those were good guesses, and had in them elements of truth, but that if I wanted to know the real reason, I should have to guess again—he painted children because he loved children. That was to have been my next guess. His are no dressed up children painfully sitting with pitchforks back of their heads and frozen stiff with self-consciousness over the idea of having their pictures taken; they are natural youngsters, engaged in the normal joys of boyhood and girlhood. They are so natural and so lovable that people like to look at them, and care to buy them. That is why almost every exhibit of American artists now has one or more of his pictures, and why around each of them can be seen a little interested group of admirers.

IN "HUBBARD WOODS."

I met Mr. Albright in the Art Institute, among his pictures in the Exhibit of American Artists. Then I met him some other times. Then I went to see where he works. He said simply that he lived in a log house in Hubbard Woods. Hubbard Woods is a strip of territory lying in Winnetka and Glencoe, or somewhere near the old Skogie, and if a man gets on the train for Evanston and forgets to get off, he alights at Hubbard Woods and is glad of it. We found the log house. We were looking for a one room cabin with an earth floor, and the patent evidences of artistic poverty, and that was not exactly what we found.

It required 270 great trees, each one 60 feet long, to build Mr. Albright's hut in the wilderness. It is a house built like the letter H. The connecting bar between the two equal parts is an entrance hall with a great big open fire, and a stairway built out of oak beams like railway ties. From this central hall you may go to the right or the left. In one of these two houses he lives, and in the other he moves and has his being. The right wing is the family residence; the left wing is his studio, a one-story structure rising to the height of the two stories of the other wing. The entire structure is 48 by 84 feet. One may stand in the studio and look across it and through the reception hall and dining-room, and the whole 84 feet of distance are his. If he is content with one room at a time, the studio is 32 by 48, all in one room, and has another big fireplace at one end, with most of the north side taken up with windows.

AN ARTIST WITH "TREASURE ON EARTH."

He said he succeeded in getting it as he wanted it by having no architect and no landscape gardener. Thus he saved the triliums and the jack-in-the-pulpits and the cranebills and the wood violets and the prairie roses, and did not permit his trees to be trimmed all the way up to heaven.

The logs of his house are 10 to 14 inches in diameter, and are chinked and plastered. He used sixty bales of oakum to chink the cracks before the plastering was put on; but this was an extravagance.

I asked him how he, a mere artist, could afford such an establishment, and I said to him that if he were only a millionaire I should feel different; but I rejoiced to think that a man who gave his life to a non-commercial pursuit should have laid up for himself so much treasure on earth. I could but rejoice to think how well his brush had served his purse.

BUSINESS AND ART.

He said that he discovered some time ago that no matter how dearly he loved to paint, he could not paint very long if he did not sell his paintings, and he resolved to sell them. Evidently he sells them, for I see them in good homes and in fine galleries. But he tells me he does not try to paint many in a year, for he cannot paint many and keep up his standard.

He said he formerly had a small log studio in another place, and being about to establish this new home he thought of the kind of house and studio he would like to build. Then he said to himself, "Adam Emery Albright, you know what the preachers do when they want something very much. They have faith that they are going to get it and then they hustle around and get it." So he resolved to do likewise and there is the house.

He paints children—country children. Not slum children nor spoiled children, but happy outdoor children.

There was one entitled "An Enchanted Hour" which took the Martin B. Cahn prize. It is a painting of two youngsters in a boat. The sky line is well to the top of the painting, so that one sees much more reflected in the water than he sees in the field above the boat. It is an ingenious pushing up of the horizon for the sake of revealing a little more than one expects to see in the water. But what one sees in the water is not the main thing. The children are the main thing.

He spoke about his backgrounds. He said he could not often use large objects, because they dwarf the children. Yet here and there he brings in a scene with children at the root of a gnarled old tree, as in "The Old Ford," or boys around a large rock, as in "The Cave," where the object does not throw them into insignificance, but serves as a contrast to their youth and wonder.

THE SCIENCE OF COLOR.

"One must sacrifice something in painting," he said. "The very lightest medium we can get is white paint. Any color of any sort darkens it. Yet white paint held against the sky, even a dark gray sky, is dark. So black paint is the darkest medium we have, but is less than absolute dark. Our range of colors is very narrow. If an artist were to paint all the colors in a pile of hay, it would take everything on his palette; and what would he then have left for the rose that grows beside the hay? One must sacrifice much. The artist is revealed not in what he puts into his picture so much as in what he omits. If art were a mere reproduction of nature, the camera has us hopelessly at a disadvantage. We must choose what, out of the bewildering and impossible variety, we will attempt to interpret in our very narrow range of colors and in our very small space. I sacrifice everything else to childhood. That is my choice.

"In making this choice I must sacrifice themes and backgrounds and motives that do not lend themselves well to this main intent.

"Color? Yes, I have gone the full range. Here is one in which the colors run riot. I painted it years ago. Gradually I toned my colors down. Here is one in which the tones are the very lowest I can strike; the keynote is an almost complete absence of color. It is called 'Waiting for the Elephant.' A rich man looked at it and said, 'I wish I could give that boy a half dollar.'"

"That," said I, "is one real test of art. The test of a sermon is not whether it is understood or enjoyed or remembered, but whether it makes men who hear it say, 'I wish I were a better man.' So the question is not whether you paint that in dull grays and sober browns, or whether you put it in the colors of the national flag, nor whether you put on your paint with the palette knife or a toothbrush or a mop, but whether you make a man want to give that boy a half dollar to get in and see the show. But are you intending to keep your pictures down to a low color scheme?"

"MORE COLOR AND CONTRAST.

"No. I am swinging back. I have gone round with the wheel, and am coming back to more color, and stronger contrast. You can see it in 'Berries from the Mountain Top' and in others of my more recent paintings. I do not pretend to put in the real colors of nature; any artist who attempts that is foolish. He can never do it. But I am putting in more of them than at one time I did."

A Minister Who Refused a Pension

A Story Found in the Records of the Rev. Dr. Jeremiah.

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

ONCE upon a time there was an aged minister whose name was the Rev. Dr. Jeremiah. He had been the pastor of the First Christian Church in Jerusalem, but had been ousted from his pulpit and for several years had led a precarious life, at times being dependent upon his friends for food and shelter.

After he was an old man, and most people thought him quite behind the times, he was offered a Carnegie pension and refused it. He declined it because of the way in which it came. The story of it is highly to his credit, and shows how high-minded and honorable a man he was. This is the way in which he happened to be offered the pension, though not regularly entitled to it as a minister.

The city of Jerusalem was captured and destroyed in the siege of Nebuchadnezzar. Jeremiah had been about the bravest man in the city, and had done innumerable things for which the people ought to have held him in the very highest honor, but with strange perversity they blamed the minister for nearly all their misfortunes, and when the city fell and they were being led away captive they said all sorts of bitter things about him.

Now it came about that the captain of Nebuchadnezzar's guard, who had Jeremiah in charge, hearing them say so many harsh things about Jeremiah, felt that Jeremiah was really a friend of the Babylonian cause. It was known that he was a mugwump in politics, and the Babylonian captain felt that Jeremiah was entitled to no little consideration because he had discouraged the people in the time of the siege. So he hunted up Jeremiah, and said to him: "Behold, I loose thee this day from the chains which were upon thine hand. If it seems good unto thee to come into Babylon, come, and I will look well unto thee; but if it seem ill unto thee to come with me into Babylon, forbear; behold, all the land is before thee: whither it seemeth good and convenient for thee to go, thither go." (Jeremiah 40:4.)

AN OLD AND FRIENDLESS PREACHER.

Surely, it must have been a temptation. Jeremiah was old and friendless. Babylon had pleasant climate and modern plumbing and great libraries and many advantages. Jeremiah had been hearing now and then from an acquaintance of his, Rev. Mr. Ezekiel, who had been living some time in Babylon and had attained to a very considerable popularity. Here was his chance. He could go to Babylon and draw his monthly salary and be perfectly free to come and go as he liked.

But Jeremiah refused. He would not accept a Carnegie pension with any implication that he had earned it by disloyalty. He knew that no one would ever give him credit for self-denial, for few people have given him any credit down to this day. They have thought of him invariably as a kind of weak, weeping sort of man. On the contrary, he was brave enough in his old age, in poverty and neglect, to refuse rather than eat bread out of the hand of his country's enemy, and this he did with no expectation that anybody would give him credit for it.

"BACK TO JERUSALEM."

The captain of the guard argued the matter a little with Jeremiah. He asked where he intended to go? Jeremiah said he was going straight back to Jerusalem or as near it as possible. The captain of the guard reminded him that conditions in Jerusalem were very much disturbed. The church building had been very badly damaged and nobody there wanted to hear Jeremiah preach, anyway. He asked Jeremiah how he expected to get a living, and Jeremiah said he did not know. The captain of the guard sincerely disliked to see the brave old man going with nothing but trouble ahead of him. But as Jeremiah insisted, the captain gave him a letter of introduction to the Babylonian governor in Mizpah, near Jerusalem, a certain Mr. Gedaliah. Said he, "If you will go back, introduce yourself to Gedaliah, whom the king of Babylon hath made governor over the city of Jerusalem, and dwell with him among the people." So the captain of the guard fitted Jeremiah out with provisions and let him go back to Jerusalem, and the poor old minister trudged wearily back to the city where he once had been a pastor, but whence he had been thrust out, hoping to find in the now pastorless church, which nobody wanted, some opportunity of preaching the gospel.

The Enchanted Hour. By Adam Emery Albright.

Governor Gedaliah received Jeremiah courteously. Jeremiah said to him that he had not come back to live in the palace. He merely wanted an opportunity to visit round among the refugees of the people and gather together a little church and comfort and help them where he could. Gedaliah said he was wholly in sympathy with the movement. He said in substance, "I want these people to prosper. They have been having a hard time, and they have brought it upon themselves, but I think the people who disrupted the church and drove you out have mostly gone to Babylon, and there is a real opportunity here now for you to do something. The city and the church are pretty badly torn up, and you better make your headquarters with me at Mizpah, but come and go as you like and visit among the people, and if I can help you in any way I will."

So the weary old man gathered what courage he could, and began to do such pastoral work as he found opportunity at Mizpah and in the neighborhood of his old church. It was discouraging work, but it had some elements of promise. Governor Gedaliah seems to have been a broad-minded man, not a member of the church himself, but a man who liked the minister and wanted the church to prosper. He was a man free from petty suspicion, and that fact was his undoing. When something told him that there was a conspiracy against his own life and named the conspirator, he refused to believe it, saying that he would not think of such a thing as believing a man he trusted was really plotting against him. One of his captains by the name of Johanan warned Governor Gedaliah. He said, "You better let me go and arrest Ishmael, for I believe he intends to murder you." But Gedaliah said, "Thou shalt not do this, for thou speakest falsely of Ishmael." Ishmael did commit that terrible crime in which Gedaliah was murdered and the principal Jews who were nearest to him. It is one of the most dastardly deeds in all history. It wiped out in a night the whole official board of Jeremiah's little church, and his chief supporter, and left him and the little remnant of his flock paralyzed with fear.

HOPES BLASTED.

Oh, it was murder—cruel, horrible, bloody murder; the murder of a gentleman, high-minded and magnanimous, the best friend the minister had on earth. You can hardly believe that so horrible a thing could have happened. It all came about so wickedly, and dashed to the ground hopes that had begun to rise again. For it is evident that whatever hope there was of settled order and good government in Palestine at that time centered about the good and wise reign of Gedaliah, and the sagacity and righteousness of Jeremiah. You will not believe it if I tell you. I must tell it in the very words of the Bible. This is what

A WEEK'S DEBAUCH

WHAT a debauch the people of this nation had last week—what a debauch of mind and emotions! It seems as if every court in the land was hearing a divorce suit and our newspapers made the most of it. In a Pittsburgh paper last Thursday there were detailed stories of eighteen divorce and breach of promise cases involving in most instances the most exciting unexpurgated tales of marital infidelity that could be imagined. These eighteen "stories" by actual measurement included fully two-thirds of the entire space devoted to reading matter.

The next morning on opening the Chicago paper that stands for the highest type of journalism in this city it was found that three out of five of the scare-head "stories" on the front page were divorce cases, besides others rehearsed and headlined in the inside pages. There was Madame Schumann-Heink; there was Billy Sunday's Rodeheaver; there was Sears, the "New Thought" cult leader; there was that blazé millionaire in New York who confessed that he had already paid $40,000 to hush up the story of his adventures, and there was Illinois' State Auditor Brady, whose "wife" brings suit for breach of promise!

This is the subject matter of our daily reading these days. It is almost impossible to escape it. The newspapers are the carriers of this poison everywhither. Young minds are depraved by it and the oldest and strongest of us are not immune to its contamination. Why does a Christian civilization tolerate it? The Presbyterian Assembly recently passed resolutions against the suggestive dress of modern fashion and against a whole round of evil customs tending to erase the fair line of modesty and chivalry and virtue. Last week Chicago Baptists passed similar resolutions.

But their resolves sound so impotent! They sound as if they weren't intended to be taken too seriously. They remind one of Billy Sunday's violent denunciations of popular sins.

The great fact is that condemnations and excoriations and mere vehemence will not cleanse society. Only a quiet folding-in of a lump of real leaven into the dough of our social order will transform it. Our vehemence betrays our lack of positive religion. The Church is keeping alive today on vehemence and high-pressure.

We lack religion.

We need to find Truth, if we would be made free from lust and the pride of life.

AN "INSPIRED" SECRETARY.

ARRIVING on the third day of the Ohio convention of Disciples last week one heard the echoes of what everybody said was a great address given on the day before by Secretary George W. Muckley. Our national secretaries have spoken during so many years to the state and national conventions that their hearers incline to take for granted the excellences of their addresses. It was not so with Mr. Muckley this time. Evidently he made as deep an impression as if he had been a fresh voice instead of one that has been heard at nearly every convocation of his brethren in all parts of the land for the past twenty years. He spoke on the Men and Millions Movement, coming direct from Texas, where the Movement had just been launched.

The glow and zeal of the Movement was upon him. He confessed with eloquent sincerity that his own soul had "caught" something from the atmosphere in which the Movement is being carried forward. It is an atmosphere of devotion, of dependence upon God. There is a seeking for the deeper springs of wisdom and consecration. It is not simply a money-getting affair by the use of hurrah methods; it is a spiritual revival.

This was the way Mr. Muckley, administrator of church extension funds, the champion money-getter of the brotherhood, interpreted the Men and Millions Movement. His hearers said that he talked like one who had seen a vision, like one inspired. They said that his tone and carriage and words all combined to convey the impression that he, the dollar and cents man of Church Extension, felt that the quarter million dollars signed up in the first three weeks of the effort was not to be compared in importance with the spiritual benediction the churches and each one of the score of workers are receiving.

It grows in certainty every day that the deposit of real religion to be left in the path of the Men and Millions Movement will infinitely outweigh the total millions of money which the Movement will gather up.

JUST SUPPOSE!

MR. MUCKLEY'S impressive success as the interpreter of another enterprise than his Church Extension suggests that the churches are missing a large portion of the ministry of the secretaries by hearing them only in their professional capacity as interpreters and pleaders on behalf of their particular societies. Suppose the secretaries should all be shaken together in the same basket, and a program committee draw upon the contents of the basket, "on sight and unseen," for speakers for the various great causes that deserve interpretation at their state convention. And suppose it fell to the lot of Secretary S. J. Corey to talk on Church Extension and Secretary Grant K. Lewis to talk on Foreign Missions and President A. McLean to talk on the care of the orphan and aged, and Mrs. Anna R. Atwater to talk on Ministerial Relief, and Secretary Abram E. Cory to talk on Christian Endeavor. Just suppose!

Would the people go to that convention? It would be the largest in the history of that state. And they would return home amazed at the wide range of sympathy and knowledge and spiritual insight possessed by these men who have always stood to them as symbols of one cause only.

THE SLOUCH POSE MUST GO.

GOOD news comes from the advance agents of fashion. They tell us that the coming styles are to call for an erect pose in woman. We do not know how they know, but we hope these heralds who peep over the horizon and tell us from time to time what is to rise above it in women's garb are correct. Whatever may be said of the present styles in women's dress, there is nothing to be said in favor of the pose which they assume. It will be impossible to show the fashion plates of 1914 to women fifty years from now and make them believe that women voluntarily assumed such ungainly postures. These humpbacked styles, with the skirts drawn at the bottom would cause a woman who shuts one eye to look like a needle, except for the fact that a needle is straight. A recent "beauty item" in the daily press gives to the woman who would be beautiful according to next week's styles the following good advice:

"Stand against a door in such a position that the back of the head, the shoulders, the elbows, the back, the heels and the palms of the hands will all touch it. And it must not be just an almost-closeness, but a real pressure, so firm there can be no doubt as to one's erectness of bearing.

"Easy? Not a bit of it. If you can hold the position a full minute after a month of daily practice, you are doing well. Doing well in more ways than one—not only succeeding in the exercise, but gaining strength and poise and muscle control.

"The secret of grace is complete control of the body, and all the queer poses in the world won't make that statement any less true.

"Not long ago a noted physician was talking about the modern woman. He said: Unless she learns how to hold up her head and keep the poise of her body, I fear for her mental future. It is a great pity that at a time when women are so capable and so prominent they should throw their entire beings out of harmony by adopting such outlandish poses as one sees on the street, in the ballroom, on the stage."

"Go to the nearest art gallery and look at the 'Golden Stairway,' the beautiful picture by Burne-Jones of lovely women coming down a stairway. There you will find the ideal pose in each figure. It is well worth studying—especially at this critical moment in the pose of womankind. It is deserving of a place in every boudoir."

No one, man or woman, has any right to assume a slouch pose. Stand straight, no matter how tall you are. Any fashion that compels or suggests an erect carriage is so far desirable. We do not know what these new fashions are to look like; they may be in other respects almost as unlovely as those of today; but the erect pose is something much in their favor. Stand straight; and having done all, stand.

THE INADEQUACY OF MERE PHILANTHROPY.

A WISE word was spoken by Bishop W. A. Chandler in the episcopal address before the general conference of the Methodist Church, South, concerning the inadequacy of a philanthropy that has no root in religion. "The church cannot encourage the groundless hope that any transitory philanthropy, the mere fashion of the hour, uninspired by love for God or faith in Christ, can be relied upon to care for even the physical needs of the unfortunate classes of mankind, to say nothing of higher things. She knows her own history too well to indulge for one moment such a notion. When she began her ministrations of Christly compassion in that 'hard heathen world' of the first century, she found in it not a single house of mercy, although it boasted of its arts, its philosophies, and its literatures. Grecian refinement never built a house of refuge for the outcast, and Roman civilization never opened a door of hope for the despairing. Neither the pages of Publius Victor, which describe the public buildings of Rome, nor the Byzantine Chronicles, which picture the public edifices of Constantinople, record the existence of a single purely charitable institution. Ancient paganism, having lost the knowledge of God, the Father, failed to recognize man, the brother. The first public collection ever made in the heathen world for a charitable object was made by the church of Antioch for the poor saints of Jerusalem, the Antiochene Christians for the love of Christ forgetting the unfriendly attitude of the Jews toward the Gentiles and relieving the wants of men and women whom they had never seen, and whom they knew only as members of the Christian household. A Christian widow was the first individual to build a hospital in our sick and suffering world. In the language through which the church first proclaimed the gospel of salvation, she found no terms with which to designate adequately her houses of charity. The pagan world lacked speech to express the superhuman benevolence which it had not been able to conceive. And modern paganism is not less sterile of works of mercy. Except where the influence of Christ's Church has extended and His merciful Spirit has penetrated, the heathen world of the twentieth century is as barren of humane institutions as was that cold and heartless world into which the Babe of Bethlehem was born and laid in a manger because there was no room for Him elsewhere."

"The secularism found within the limits of Christendom, parading its gifts as higher than godliness, lauding its philanthropy as purer than piety, and exalting its benevolence as better than holiness, knows not how dependent it is for its inspiration to render useful service upon the stimulating moral atmosphere and the constraining public opinion which Christianity has created. . . . From the withered breasts of arrant godliness, whether in our own or other lands, the milk of human kindness trickles very stingily, if at all. They who fear not God do not regard man; and if they heed the cries of importunate want, it is that they be not wearied with the calls of distress rather than that they be careful to do justice and mercy. . . . In the household of faith the world must find the main supply of brotherly kindness for the relief of the needy when he crieth and the consolation of him that is ready to perish."

A GRACIOUS AND EFFICIENT SERVICE.

IT IS a gracious service being rendered these days by Rev. Carey E. Morgan, of Nashville, to the American Missionary Society. Since Doctor McCash's resignation a year ago the society has been seriously crippled in executive leadership. While the committee of the Board of Directors is seeking the right man upon whom to bestow the responsibilities of the great task, Mr. Morgan has been meeting the spring and summer conventions in various states and speaking a great message on behalf of Home Missions. His addresses at the Indiana, Ohio and Maryland conventions recently were full of sensible counsel and searching entreaty. He believes the American Society, the Mother society, has been ill-treated by the churches, and that the day of her rehabilitation must be at hand. He brings a persuasive message, speaks it with unction and power and leaves upon the convention an undefinable but very real spiritual glow. No advocate of this neglected at-our-door task in many years has been met with such responsiveness from the people as has Mr. Morgan. His Vine St. Church in Nashville deserves and does receive the grateful appreciation of all her sister churches throughout the land for loaning him thus freely, and no doubt at some cost to herself, to this great and needy work in this the most critical moment of its history.

THE TRUTH AS A COMMERCIAL ASSET.

THAT truth-telling is in high favor among the advertising men is matter for surprise to many people, who hardly expected thus to find Saul among the prophets. A recent utterance of The Churchman is in point:

Advertising is not usually regarded as a field where ethical sensitiveness is cultivated, so it is an agreeable surprise to find that one of the speakers at the recent convention of advertising men proclaimed that being believed was the foundation of success. As a matter of fact, if different periods are compared, truthful advertising is more insisted upon now than in the days when the custom began of proclaiming the value of the wares that were offered to the public. Old advertising was almost as imaginative as the old circus posters. Experience has shown that statements made in advertising must be truthful or the reaction will work harm. It is not known who is responsible for this moral advance, but it is certain that with the improvement of style and language in advertising in recent years the standards of truthfulness have risen. Modern advertising and journalism are closely related. The old party organ which defended its favorite allies through thick and thin can no longer exist. In a rough way, the plea for "square dealing" is universally an effective one. Indeed, oftentimes the disadvantage of the reforming movement is that the masses are apt to lose their sense of proportion in the energy of their moral judgments. Misstatements of fact are not tolerated with complacency. It is held that truthfulness is the bond which preserves the social structure. How great a part is played by the acres of advertising that daily greet the people cannot easily be determined. In any case we do know that two men of conspicuous position in the business world have served terms in prison for misrepresenting stocks in their circulars.

The Larger Christian World

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Methodist Church, South, in Convention.

The big issue at the General Conference of the Methodist Church, South, which met at Oklahoma City was the question of union with the other Methodist bodies. The editor of the Central Christian Advocate (Kansas City) reports that the desire for union amounted to a passion. The report of the Commission on Federation and Organic Union was adopted by a unanimous rising vote. The Methodist Episcopal Church (of the north) has been notified plainly that if union does not come between the North and South branches the responsibility will be upon the former. The editor of the paper above referred to writes that one of the leaders of the conference and the denomination said with decision to him: "It is now up to the Methodist Episcopal Church to say what the future shall be. If your church votes for this plan of organic union we will be one denomination in less than four years. The details of readjustment may take a little time, but the big work will be done if your next General Conference votes as we voted. Bear in mind, it is now up to you." The editor adds that "there is not a particle of doubt that organic union is now up to the Methodist Episcopal Church. She is now at the bar of judgment. And history will not fail to take note of what is done when in two years our General Conference meets and faces fate." Another overshadowing question of the conference was that of the Vanderbilt University case, reference to which has already been made in these columns. There were only 331 delegates in attendance at the conference, which fact is reported with some disappointment by Methodist editors. Very few of the old leaders were present; the meeting was notably in the hands of new men.

Southern Presbyterians at Kansas City.

The most important action taken at the meeting of the Presbyterian Church, South, according to The Continent, was that "all matters pertaining to union with other Presbyterian churches were referred to the Council of Reformed Churches in America holding the Presbyterian system." This council will work out some plan for "more effective co-operation between the several Presbyterian churches." As was stated in last week's issue of The Christian Century, William H. Roberts, Stated Clerk of the Presbyterian General Assembly, holds that this step is not considered unfavorable to union, but that it was taken in the feeling that a general union of all the Presbyterian bodies is expected, and that it was thought best by the Southern Presbyterians not to take any step that might prove out of harmony with future actions of other bodies. The Assembly adopted the recommendation of the council that: "1. The supreme judicatories direct their synods each to appoint three representatives to act with representatives of other Presbyterian and Reformed bodies in constituting a joint advisory committee of comity, for the purpose of effecting a fair exchange of churches, to discourage overlapping of home mission forces, to settle cases of friction, and promote other phases of co-operation in home mission work. 2. In any city of less than 100,000, where any Presbyterian or Reformed Church is at work among foreign people, no other Presbyterian or Reformed Church shall open a work for the same people in that city, until other cities and towns, where such work is needed, have been occupied. 3. In case of any denomination contemplating opening work for foreigners in such cities already occupied by one of the constituent churches of this council, this matter shall be referred to the committee of comity."

International Sunday-school Convention.

Sunday-school leaders from all over this continent will gather in Chicago from June 23 to 30 for the fourteenth International Sunday-school convention, to consider the conquest of North America for Christ. Four thousand four hundred regular and alternate delegates will bring credentials from their respective state and provincial Sunday-school associations. Other thousands will attend to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded them of participating in the monster parade in which 50,000 men are expected to march Saturday afternoon, June 27. "Jesus shall reign," the keynote of the convention, will be sounded in the songs that will be sung by the great choruses and in the addresses that will be delivered by Dr. F. B. Meyer of London, Marion Lawrance, Bishop J. C. Hartzell, J. A. McDonald, editor of the Toronto Globe; Fred B. Smith and a host of other speakers. Not only will the new Medinah Temple, Ontario and Cass Streets, with its seating capacity, filled to its limit of about 6,000, ring with the slogan of the convention, but twelve of the largest churches in Chicago and suburbs will be the scenes of the simultaneous duplication of the convention program the evenings during the convention. Thus the people of Cook County, who desire to hear the speakers of the convention, will be enabled to do so. Every phase of Sunday-school activity will be considered in the various conferences of the convention under the guidance of the experts of the International Sunday-school Association and of the denominational Sunday-school board. Besides these regular conferences to consider graded lessons and the work of the different departments of the Sunday-school, there will be conferences on evangelism, rural Sunday-schools, Sunday-school music, social service, temperance, and purity. Special conferences will be held for workers among college students, among foreign speaking people, for ministers, superintendents and field workers. In preparing the program, the program committee kept in mind the varied needs of the seventeen million members belonging to the 173,459 Sunday-schools spread over the whole North American continent and directed by 1,670,846 officers and teachers. Fred A. Wells is chairman of this committee and Marion Lawrance, recognized as the best informed Sunday-school man in the world, is the secretary. Only once before, in 1887, has the International Sunday-school convention been held in Chicago. Chicago Sunday-school history is interesting. The first Sunday-school institute was held in Chicago in 1865; the first system of Uniform Lessons issued in North America was produced in Chicago in 1866; the first Sunday-school Teachers' Journal was published in Chicago in the same year, the first general secretary in North America to give his full time under pay to Sunday-school work was employed by the Cook County Sunday-school Association, of which Chicago is the larger part; and the first central offices of the International Sunday-school Association were located in Chicago in 1907.

Chautauqua "School of Religion."

With the summer come vacations and the possibilities of summer schools. One of those which is attracting wide attention at the present time is the School of Religion at Chautauqua, New York. This school is but one expression of the abounding interest of Chautauqua in religion. In 1912, a special director of religious work was appointed, Dean Shailer Mathews, president of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. Dean Mathews not only plans the entire religious work of the institution, but himself teaches for four weeks in the School of Religion, and conducts the Ministers' Institute with which the season closes. During the coming summer the school will hold its sessions daily from July 6 to August 14. Successive one-week courses will be given by Rev. G. Robinson Lees, Vicar of St. Andrews, Lambeth, London, England; Dr. Peter Ainslie of the Christian Temple, Baltimore; Dr. Charles F. Wishart, pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Chicago; Dr. Washington Gladden, pastor of First Congregational Church, Columbus, Ohio, and others. The program also includes courses by Professor Charles Foster Kent, of Yale University, three weeks in Hebrew Lyric poetry and three weeks in "The Use of the Old Testament in Religious Education;" Professor Shailer Mathews, four weeks in "The Life of Christ," and three weeks in the "Social Aspects of Christianity;" Dr. Jesse L. Hurlbut, three weeks in the Apostolic Church, and three weeks "Preview of the International Uniform Lessons for the coming year," as well as lectures on the remarkable model of Palestine which is a feature of the landscape at Chautauqua; Miss Georgia L. Chamberlin, three weeks of "Practical Studies in the Old Testament in Religious Education," and three weeks, "The Origin and Growth of the New Testament," a survey for Sunday-school teachers. In addition to these regular courses in classroom work, there will be almost daily conferences, opportunities for observation work in playground, kindergarten, boys' and girls' clubs, etc.; Sunday sermons by some of the greatest preachers in this country and England, and a Sunday morning study hour in grades for all classes from the kindergarten to adults; a junior congregation, a children's choir, daily devotional services and special vespers on stated days. The school has its headquarters in the Hall of Christ, one of the most beautiful buildings at Chautauqua, which is equipped with a good working reference library and art room. Members of the school have access to all the public features of the Chautauqua program as well as to the classes of the school. Churches or other institutions desiring to send a delegate for the purpose of attending the School of Religion may secure a special scholarship for the entire period of six weeks, July 6 to August 16, for $45. This amount will cover board, room, registration and ground fees, thus giving the benefit of the program and all the features of Chautauqua in addition to the work of the School of Religion. Application must be made at once to Chautauqua Institution, Chautauqua, New York. Requests for more complete information may be sent to the same address.

Charles R. Brown in Tour.

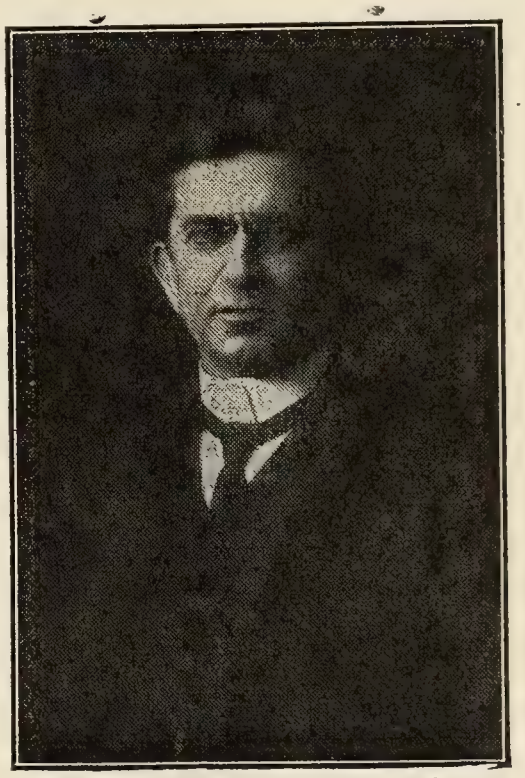
After giving thirty addresses in nineteen different states, including those delivered before fifteen colleges and universities, Moderator Charles R. Brown, of the National Congregational Council, is back at New Haven for the Commencement of Yale Divinity School. He also had personal interviews with scores of students. He spoke before the St. Paul, Minn., Congregational Club and at the Michigan State Conference. He went as far south as Vanderbilt University at Nashville, as far west as Doane College, Crete, Neb., and the State University at Lincoln and as far north as the State University in Minnesota.

Two St. Louis Churches Unite.

Baden Presbyterian and Windsor Memorial Methodist churches, St. Louis, situated in the same part of the city, have been merged into one, with Rev. Otto Duecker, formerly pastor of St. Stephani Evangelical church in Baden, as pastor. The people of both congregations have shown great enthusiasm concerning the union. The church will become Methodist, but the young people will all be Christian Endeavorers. It will stand as a community church, and will welcome all of every name and congregation.

"Church Awakening," Says Marshall.

Vice-President Marshall's declaration that one of America's ills today "is that there is too much science in the so-called educational system and too little God Almighty" occasioned comment in Washington a few days ago. The statement was made at a church gathering in the Capital city. "There is this thing wrong in many of the churches," said the vice-president, "that because church and state are separate and the state makes the schools, the church feels itself absolved from any duty in the direction of education of youth. The state is permitted to mold children from the age of six up through the time when they are going through colleges, where many of the professors are agnostics and atheists. But now the church is awakening to the fact that children should be reared in the way of Christian faith from the nursery upward. I believe that there is in this country today a great spiritual awakening, and the church is beginning to see that it has turned over entirely too many of its functions to the state." The vice-president also let it be known that some day he would forget all of the other political parties and join the Socialist. "But," he added, "I should never do this until it becomes a friend of the church; never while it flaunts on the streets a red banner in the face of faith in God and the marriage service. The socialism in which I believe, and to which I hope some day to adhere, is not that which concerns itself with consideration of power and property, but that of spirit."



Dr. Charles R. Brown, moderator of the Congregational National Council, who has just completed a Western tour.

Bible Teaching in Schools Urged.

The movement for Bible instruction in the public school is gaining in impetus. A recent union meeting of boards of education of evangelical churches of the United States appointed a committee on Bible reading in schools chiefly for the purpose of finding how such readings may be more effective. In Australia such a plan has resulted in a largely increased and much more effective use of the Bible in the schools. With this in mind, Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts was asked, as an associate member of the committee, to collect all books and lists of Bible selections for use in public schools. Doctor Crafts has compiled a series of Bible readings for schools and colleges with the aim of driving home some one great Bible truth each week. An examination of these readings shows that they are well adapted to the end in view. Consideration has also been given to the literary value of passages, especially in the Bible poetry listed. Teachers and others who are interested in this matter would do well to investigate these readings. They are published by the International Reform Bureau, Washington, D. C.

Anglican Church on Healing.

The Church of England has delivered itself on the matter of spiritual healing. The Northwestern Christian Advocate reports that ten medical men, under the chairmanship of the dean of Westminster, have spent many months upon the subject, with the following conclusions: They believe in the efficacy of prayer, but that divine power must conform to the operation of natural law. Spiritual ministration is recognized equally with medical ministration. The body and mind can be influenced by the spirit. Spiritual healing is not found to be different from mental healing or suggestion. Suggestion is more effectively used by some persons than others. While religious influences do not necessarily differ from non-religious influences, yet the former have more power. The committee discriminates between functional and organic ailments, concluding that spiritual influences can be usd to great benefit upon the former, while the latter are beyond the reach of spiritual suggestion. The committee expressed a desire to see increased importance given to spiritual ministrations in the matter of recovery from sickness, but strongly deprecate the independent treatment of disease by irresponsible and unqualified persons.

Civic Center at "Five Points."

The famous "Five Points Mission House" in New York City is to be torn down to make way for the new civic center and courthouse, reports the Northwestern Christian Advocate. At one time the Five Points was considered the center of New York City's criminal activities. The police endeavored in vain to clean up the district and then the women of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church took the matter in hand. They started here a mission to teach the children and to minister to the community. The character of the place straightway improved. The criminal community at the Five Points first gathered about the "Old Brewery" built there in 1792. It was the most infamous building ever known in New York. In 1850 Henry Ward Beecher, Daniel Drew, John B. Gough, and others raised money to buy the "Old Brewery" and to erect a new building. This new building housed the Five Points Mission House, which was dedicated June 18, 1853.

Baptists Find Cause for Rejoicing.

The Watchman-Examiner is finding some pleasure in noting the fact that "the two greatest investigations and revelations of commercial corruption in the history of this country have been conducted by Baptists—Hon. Charles E. Hughes, now associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the life insurance cases in New York City, and Hon. Joseph W. Folk, chief counselor of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the laying bare of the dealings that wrecked the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad."

Of Human Interest

Two Roosevelt Stories.

When he owned a ranch in the West, Theodore Roosevelt, as he says in his "Autobiography," "could chop fairly well for an amateur," but he admits that he could not do one-third of the work that his men did.

"One day," he writes, "when we were cutting down the cottonwood trees, to begin our building operations, I heard someone ask Dow what the total cut had been; and Dow, not realizing that I was within hearing, answered, 'Well, Bill cut down fifty-three, I cut forty-nine, and the boss, he beavered down seventeen.' Those who have seen the stump of a tree that has been gnawed down by a beaver," adds Mr. Roosevelt, "will understand the exact force of the comparison."

In later years, after his experiences with the Rough Riders, Mr. Roosevelt says the men of the regiment always helped him enthusiastically when he was standing for office. One of them accompanied him on an electioneering trip, and made a speech that concluded, "My fellow citizens, vote for my colonel! Vote for my colonel, and he will lead you, as he led us, like sheep to the slaughter!"

Dr. Parker As Lecturer.

I once heard Doctor Parker deliver his famous lecture on "Clocks and Watches," writes T. G. Dickinson. It made such a vivid impression upon my mind that I could almost repeat it word for word, illustration for illustration. This one was among the best: "A dainty little watch, dissatisfied with its little sphere in a lady's pocket, envied Big Ben, as one day it passed with her ladyship over Westminster Bridge. 'I wish I could be there,' said the little watch. 'I could then serve the multitude.' 'You shall have your opportunity, little watch,' said the doctor. 'Come down, Big Ben, and go into the lady's pocket.' He dramatically described the little watch being drawn up the tower by a silk thread. 'Where are you, little watch? I cannot see you,' he finally exclaimed; then, pausing, in his dramatic style, he said, 'Its elevation has become its annihilation!'"

William Lorimer—Roman Catholic.

The press of Chicago gave a front page notice, a column and a half in length, to the announcement of the fact that Mr. William Lorimer had joined the Roman Catholic Church. It is interesting to quote from his published statement of the reasons leading to his "conversion."

"For more than fifteen years I have read every book on the subject of controversial theology that I could get. I felt, at last, that the only thing for me to do was to become a Catholic because of my honest convictions. I have traveled over the same route that many others have gone. I did not want to join the Catholic Church, but I felt compelled to investigate, and the deeper my research the more settled my convictions became. So I am a Catholic in spite of myself.

"I became convinced that when one starts out to find truth in religion one will come at last to the Catholic Church, no matter how strong one's prejudices may be.

"Year after year I read all the books I could get. I studied the life of Cardinal Newman. I devoured his 'Apologia,' and I found out how he struggled for two years after he left the Church of England before he finally did the thing he hoped not to do, and became a Catholic. I read of the conversion of Cardinal Manning and many others. And then, of course, I had the example always before my eyes of my wife and children, who were Catholics and attended strictly to their religious duties.

"Recently I have seen upon the billboards pictures calling upon men and women to take their children to church. Catholics need no such appeal. They always go to church as a part of their religious duty in which they cannot fail. I found my admiration growing and my conviction strengthening until at last I, too, had to do the thing for conscience sake that I had struggled against doing for fifteen years, because for all that time I have felt that I ought to do the thing I have just done."

The President on "Religion."

Often Mr. Wilson has spoken his mind on the need of religious influence in education, but never more eloquently than he did on the 150th anniversary of Princeton. On that occasion before a distinguished audience representing many countries, he sketched the history of Princeton, saying: "She has always been a school of religion and no one of her sons who has really lived her life has escaped that steadying touch which has made her a school of duty. Religion, conceive it liberally enough, is the true salt wherewith to keep both duty and learning sweet against the taint of time and change; and it is a noble thing to have conceived it thus liberally, as Princeton's founders did. . . . Duty with them was a practical thing concerned with righteousness in this world, as well as salvation in the next. There is nothing that gives such pith to public service as religion. A God of truth is no mean prompter to the enlightened service of mankind; and the character formed, as if in his eye, has always a fiber and sanction such as you shall not easily obtain for the ordinary man from the mild promptings of philosophy. . . . The college must use learning as a vehicle of spirit, interpreting literature as the voice of humanity, must enlighten, guide and hearten its sons that it may make men of them. If it give them no vision of the true God, it has given them no certain motive to practice the wise lessons they have learned."

A Respectable Attendance.

Sydney Smith, once entering a drawing room alone in a fashionable mansion in the west end of London, found it lined with mirrors on all four sides. Finding himself reflected in every direction, he remarked: "Ah, I see. There appears to be a meeting of the clergy here and there seems to be a very respectable attendance!"

MINISTER WHO REFUSED A PENSION.

he said. They were wise and reassuring words:

"I will dwell at Mizpah, to stand before the Chaldeans that shall come unto us; but ye, gather ye wine and summer fruits and oil, and put them in your vessels, and dwell in your cities that ye have taken."

Likewise when all the Jews that were in Moab, and among the children of Ammon, and in Edom, and that were in all the countries, heard that the king of Babylon had left a remnant of Judah, and that he had set over them Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, then all the Jews returned out of all places whither they were driven, and came to the land of Judah, to Gedaliah, unto Mizpah, and gathered wine and summer fruits very much.

You see things were beginning to look prosperous; but a warning came to Gedaliah.

Johanan, the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were in the fields came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, and said unto him, "Dost thou know that Baalis, the king of the children of Ammon, hath sent Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, to take thy life?"

But Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, believed them not. Then Johanan, the son of Kareah, spoke to Gedaliah in Mizpah secretly, saying, "Let me go, I pray thee, and I will slay Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, and no man shall know it: wherefore should he take thy life, that all the Jews that are gathered unto thee should be scattered, and the remnant of Judah perish?" But Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, said unto Johanan, the son of Kareah, "Thou shalt not do this thing, for thou speaketh falsely of Ishmael."

Now it came to pass in the seventh month, that Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, of the seed royal and one of the chief officers of the king, and ten men with him, came unto Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, to Mizpah; and there they did eat bread together in Mizpah. Then arose Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, and the ten men that were with him, and smote Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, with the sword, and slew him, whom the king of Babylon had made governor over the land. Ishmael also slew all the Jews that were with him, to wit, with Gedaliah, at Mizpah, and the Chaldeans that were found there, the men of war.

Ishmael was of the seed royal. He was a descendant of David, and he thought he had a right to the throne. That was his excuse for that bloody murder. He did all this and more, and he did it in the name of the kingdom of David. In a sense I suppose he thought he did it in the interest of religion.

But everybody with any sense knew that it would bring the king of Babylon down with an army to hunt out the last wretched man who had any share in the murder, and perhaps wipe out the whole population in the bargain.

It was a time of terror, and everybody was frightened for his life. A panic seized the whole community.

Well, and what then?

Jeremiah had to keep right on preaching.

No matter whether things go well or ill, the minister had to have a sermon next Sunday, and to tell people that God is good, and that they ought to be sweet and gentle.

Would you not like to know what Jeremiah preached about just after that, and where he preached?

He preached in a summer hotel.

You don't believe it?

Well, go look it up in the Bible, then. That is where I learned about it.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by
Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

The Month of Youth

As the month of March is the time when the children have the right of way in the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, so the month of June is assigned to the work of the Young Women's Mission Circles. The children's work was the subject of all auxiliary programs at the beginning of spring time, and now, in this first month of summer, the minds of all our great membership are turned to the young womanhood of the church. How appropriate it is that June, month of roses and lilies, loveliest flowers that blow, should be set apart for our girls! The sweetness, the freshness, the beauty of these rare June days is of the very essence of youth; it is the season of courage and optimism, and takes no account of midsummer's blighting heat and drought, of autumn's chill and frost, of winter's death and cold.

THE FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH.

As the auxiliaries consider the work of the young women of the church in their monthly meetings, it should not only be in the spirit of appreciation of what may be accomplished by this new and indomitable force in our ranks, but a renewing of their own youth, as though they had bathed in the fabled fountain of old. Even though many of the veterans have been chastened and disheartened by time's hard blows, yet it is well to hold fast to the dynamic force of this golden season of life, its high spirit, its fearless outlook on the world, its sublime willingness to attempt the impossible, coming from untainted belief in the ultimate victory of all good. Does not the gospel of our Lord and Master breathe the very spirit of perennial youth?—the spirit that hopeth all things and believeth all things, and says, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me."

The great movements among the young people of the church, the Student Volunteer Movement, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Society of Christian Endeavor, have been notable contributions toward the attainment of some of its highest ideals, and we have faith to believe that our Christian Woman's Board of Missions will be enriched and uplifted by our ever growing Young Women's Mission Circles.

THE WORK OF THE CIRCLES.

But these groups of girls that are springing up all over our land as auxiliaries to the Woman's Board, are not only an inspiration to those who have been long in the ranks, but stand for definite achievement of their own.

They are the fruits of the higher education of women; many of them are college graduates, and bring to the work a trained mind, and a wealth of information that was denied to the older women in the organization. The Mission Circle furnishes an outlet to this superior mental equipment, and gives to these eager young spirits a task that is worth while—and that is what they are all longing for. We expect from them a type of service, that will enable them to carry on to greater heights the enlarging enterprises of our board, when the mantle of leadership falls on them.

Our Mission Circles are therefore training schools for the missionary army of the future. In their meetings, they study the methods and effective machinery of the Woman's Board, our missionary work both home and foreign, our hopes and ideals for future growth. Above all, they grow in such knowledge of Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour as shall tend to fulness of life and development of character, and make them meet for the Master's use in the splendid task of the extension of the kingdom of God over the whole world.

And in these circles we hope to find the great recruiting stations for volunteers to the foreign mission field. The very heart and climax of our Men and Millions Movement is the call for one thousand new missionaries. These are to be the choicest spirits of our church—in Mr. A. E. Cory's picturesque phrase, "We want them handpicked." Youth is an essential for volunteers to the foreign field—the usual limit being between twenty and thirty years of age. In our circles, we have the great requirements for the making of women missionaries—youth, Christian character, missionary information, and the resulting missionary zeal.

And so in these perfect June days, our hearts go out to the growing hosts of young girls, gathering in earnest groups all over our land. May they catch a world vision from their work, which will make life ampler and nobler, and fit them for better service for their Master, and those for whom he died.

WOMAN'S STATUS IN INDIA.

Discussing woman's status in India, a New York suffragette, on her return from a tour of the world, said at the Colony Club:

"I was surprised to learn while in Bombay that woman's position in India is the means of depriving all natives—even native princes—of membership in the smart English clubs.

"Most of us attribute the exclusion of Indians from English clubs to snobbishness; to contempt for an inferior, subject race. In this we are mistaken. The reason for this exclusion is revealed in a discussion between a British army officer and a married Indian nobleman. The army officer, annoyed at the Indian's attentions to a young English girl, said to him irritably:

" 'How would you like it if we flirted with your women as you flirt with ours?'

" 'Ah,' the Indian replied, with a sneer, 'we see to it that you have no chance to flirt with our women. If you don't take the same precaution you have only yourself to blame.'

"This is the explanation of the exclusion of the Indian from English club life. High caste Indian women are not permitted to mingle with English women, let alone with English men; they are not taken by their husbands and fathers into society. Therefore the English club officers decided, and I think, they were wise, that the Indian has no right to expect entertainment from the English women at club balls, dinners, etc., when he takes good care that his own women shall never as much as be seen by Englishmen."

UNMARRIED WOMEN WHO ACHIEVED.

On the honor roll of humanity are the following famous women who never married:

Queen Elizabeth, in whose reign England reached her golden age.

Florence Nightingale, angel of mercy in the Crimean War and establisher of organized nursing in war times.

Dorothea Dix, pioneer of reform in prison and reformatory methods.

Frances E. Willard, founder of the temperance movement.

Rosa Bonheur, who opened new artistic fields in the representation of animal life.

Clara Barton, founder of the Red Cross Society and savior of thousands from death and suffering.

Joan of Arc, one of the important factors in French history.

Susan B. Anthony, pioneer in efforts to procure more equal rights for women.

Jane Austen, whose pen pictures of English village life promise to be immortal.

Jane Addams, first citizen of Chicago and head of Hull House.

Julia Lathrop, chosen from among the women of America to lead in preserving child life and happiness throughout the country.

SONG FOR YOUNG WOMEN'S MISSION CIRCLES.

Tune, "Ancient of Days."

By Ida Withers Harrison.

"And it shall be in the last days," saith God, "I will pour forth of my spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy. . . . and also upon the servants and upon the handmaids will I pour out my spirit." Joel 2:28.

Prophet of old! we hail the gracious vision
That unto thee was given in days gone by;
Young men and maidens in life's early morning,
Marching to battle and to victory.

Father of gifts! we praise thee for thy mercies,
That to thy handmaids thou hast given a place
In thy majestic plan for earth's redemption,
That every soul may find his Father's face.

Spirit of God! crown us with thine anointing,
Help us to speed this glorious prophecy,
When all the earth shall call on our Redeemer,
His Holy Kingdom spread from sea to sea.

In New Zealand, the number of women voting has increased at each triennial Parliamentary election. In 1893, 90,290 women voted; in 1896, 108,783; in 1899, 119,550; in 1902, 138,565; in 1905, 175,046; in 1908, 190,114; and in 1911, 221,858.

In Australia, in 1903, the first national election in which women took part, 359,315 women voted; in 1906, 431,033; and in 1910, 601,946.

"An ounce of fact is worth a ton of theory."

Disciples Table Talk

Men and Millions Wins in Texas.

A telegram from A. E. Cory, sent from Houston, Tex., June 3, brings the good news that success has come to the Men and Millions team in their Texas campaign. In three weeks a large number of young people have pledged themselves to be among the one thousand volunteers, and many churches have promised to take the every member canvass. Personal pledges of nearly $350,000 have already been made. Other gifts are pending. Only a few of the large towns and cities that have asked a visit from the team have been solicited. Further campaigns in Texas will be postponed until next fall. By that time it is believed Texas subscriptions will far exceed a half million dollars. Mr. Cory reports that results have been obtained in spite of unfortunate weather conditions. Ministers and members have been loyal. A significant sentence of Mr. Cory's telegram is that "Prayer and the spiritual note have been dominant."
